This sound business judgment on the part of the cooperatives and R. E. A. has not been confined to the State of Oklahoma. R. E. A. approval of all such loans is made upon the basis of careful studies, valuations, and appraisals by competent engineers, taking into account all of the factors which bear upon a sound determination of value, with special reference to the utility of the property to the needs of the particular cooperative. It is true, of course, that many of the properties available to these cooperatives are not among the most prosperous electric properties in the country. That, however, is entirely beside the point. These cooperatives operate, for the most part, with respect to all of their business, in areas in which private capital has been unable or unwilling to serve, and these acquired properties fit into the picture of adequate rural electrification in the areas in question. In each case provision has been made in the loan for such rehabilitation as may be necessary, and the advantages of the acquisition at the prices paid, together with the economies of cooperative operation, have resulted in an improvement of financial condition.

6. The Grimes Pass case. Without commenting in tedious detail upon the so-called Grimes Pass case, which is one of the four loans discussed specifically by Mr. BOREN, the following explanation of this loan may be helpful to the committee.

The electric facilities of the Grimes Pass Power Co. were acquired by the Long Valley Power Cooperative in Idaho for $42,500. The property consisted of a dam, hydroelectric generating equipment, and 40 miles of electric lines. This cooperative, contrary to its expectation, had been unable to purchase energy from any source and had been supplying its consumers through mobile generating equipment—a temporary method of providing power. One purpose of the acquisition was to acquire a more adequate and less costly source of energy, and for this reason the property had a special utility and value for this particular cooperative. This would have been accomplished by building a connecting line of 22 miles. The other purpose of the acquisition was to serve 87 unserved consumers who could not feasibly receive service except as a result of this transaction.

Originally, negotiations for the acquisition had centered about an asking price of $75,000. However, when orders of the War Production Board caused the closing down of the mines which the Grimes Pass Power Co. had been serving, negotiations were dropped. The letter of Mr. Falkenwald, dated November 23, 1942, to which Mr. BOREN refers, was based upon the price originally contemplated and, furthermore, was written at a time when other arrangements for a permanent source of energy were under negotiation. When efforts to obtain wholesale energy at a reasonable price were unsuccessful, the Grimes Pass transaction was reopened by the cooperative and finally closed on the basis of a greatly reduced price, to wit, $42,500. The financial and operating studies indicated that this method of solving a critical power problem of this cooperative would be economically feasible under R. E. A. requirements. Mr. Falkenwald, by memorandum dated February 10, 1943, stated his approval of financing the acquisition at a price not to exceed $42,500, and the directors of the cooperatives at a meeting held April 27, 1943, indicated a strong desire to acquire the properties.

The implication that the dam was inadequate and not constructed according to sound engineering principles is not substantiated by a careful study of the facts. Dams made of wood are recognized as an efficient type, particularly under the conditions here prevailing. An engineering report, after inspection and studies of the cost of certain repairs, indicated that the property was worth the price paid.

Our investigations indicate that the flood was a flash flood and unforeseeable. It is not true that the washing out of the dam will ruin the cooperative or seriously impair the security for the Government loan. On the contrary, it is estimated that the salvage value of the generating equipment is $20,000 even if it is decided not to restore the plant. This leaves a balance of $22,500 of the purchase price to be allocated to the lines. As stated above, the acquisition included 40 miles of distribution line and $22,500 is a reasonable price for such property. In connection with this matter of financial condition it should be noted that there is the prospect that the gold mines will again become consumers after the war.

7. The Sho-Me case. This was an acquisition by the Sho-Me Power Cooperative in Missouri, which Mr. BOREN discusses from the standpoints of legal power and policy determination. It is our unhesitating opinion that this loan qualifies under the powers conferred by the Rural Electrification Act as interpreted by the Comptroller General and the Solicitor's opinion, discussed later in this statement.

From the point of view of policy determination, it is opinion that this transaction will constitute a godsend to several thousand unserved farmers in southern Missouri who will ultimately be reached as a result of this acquisition by the local cooperatives which are members of the Sho-Me Cooperative. The system of the Missouri Electric Power Co. is typical of those utility systems which have served chiefly the more densely populated areas and neglected the farmers in more sparsely settled areas, the service of whom is the primary function of R. E. A. and the cooperatives. In these Missouri areas, as in many other States, the only solution of the problem of adequate rural electrification is the combination in integrated systems of the better areas with the poorer areas, because of the resulting advantages in physical lay-out, engineering design, efficiency of operation, and solution of the economic problem of electric service in sparsely settled areas.

These farmer cooperatives fought aggressively for the right to consummate this purchase in the face of vigorous opposition of 14 utility companies which intervened in the proceeding for approval of the transaction before the Missouri Public Service Commission. We emphasize the fact of this opposition because it is highly significant with respect to one of the basic issues in this matter of cooperative acquisitions. Not a single one of these intervening utilities desired to buy the system, all of which had to be sold under an S. E. C. order. Two of them had offered to buy certain portions of the system, but very small portions only. Their case before the Public Service Commission was an amazing attitude of "dog in the manger." They had no interest in serving the unserved rural population of the areas through which the lines of the Missouri Electric Power Co. had been built. It is an absolutely fair characterization of their attitude to say that their case boiled down to this—namely, a feeling that there is something presumptuous in a group of farmers seeking to do business in the normal fashion in the electric light and power field. This point of view was reflected throughout several days of hearing in the sarcastic—and, at times, sneering—attitude of the many lawyers for the utility companies and in their 125-page brief. The Public Service Commission by a unanimous decision of all the commissioners who participated in the proceeding, reached the conclusion, in a careful 22-page opinion, that this purchase by the cooperative was in the public interest.

This is a good example of the value to the rural electrification program of the acquisition by cooperatives of properties which had served largely a succession of towns and had neglected the farm population.

8. The Indian Electric case: As indicated previously in point 2 of our statement, this acquisition by an Oklahoma cooperative was vigorously opposed by the Oklahoma Gas and Electric Co. which was a belated competitor for the purchase. The cooperative purchase was approved by the Securities and Exchange Commission over the vigorous opposition of this power company despite the fact that the power company offered $13,000 more than the price already contracted for between the cooperative and the seller. The Commission, in approving the cooperative purchase, referred to the fact that the Oklahoma Gas and Electric Co. had shown no interest in the purchase of the property until after the contract with the cooperative had been closed.

The interest of this farmer cooperative in acquiring the property against aggressive opposition tends to answer the point made by Mr. BOREN with respect to the fact that the urban consumers will outnumber farm consumers. As this cooperative expands in the future this ratio will probably shift, but the fact would seem to be unimportant. The acquired properties fit definitely into the rural economy of this area, and it is obvious that the farmers themselves have sought and welcomed this integration of facilities.

Mr. BOREN'S point with reference to two towns of approximately 2,500 population has been discussed in point 1 of our statement, where we pointed out that such an acquisition is sound policy for the benefit of unserved farmers and that its financing is within the legal power of R. E. A.

Mr. BOREN refers to this fact of purchase by the cooperative at $13,000 less than the offer of O. G. & E. Co. as an odd factor that has never been satisfactorily explained, and infers that there was something sinister in the motives of the seller. We cannot see anything in this fact that is odd. On the other hand, it tends to indicate that this cooperative and R. E. A. were conservative in their business judgment in the transaction. The simple explanation of the attitude of the seller is the fact that it had accepted the cooperative offer, and being bound by the resulting contract, was not free to accept any other offer. There is certainly no undisclosed secret deal" involving the sale of additional properties to R. E. A.

9. A legal argument challenging the soundness of the legal position taken by the R. E. A. legal staff and the Office of the Solicitor of the Department: A comprehensive opinion of the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture which has been filed with the House Subcommittee on Agriculture Appropriations, speaks for itself and there would seem to be no necessity for repetition here. It is our well-considered, honest, and definite opinion that each R. E. A. acquisition loan has conformed to the principles and standards set forth in the letters of the Comptroller General which are discussed by Mr. BOREN. We have disapproved many proposed acquisition loans on legal grounds, including some which we felt would qualify, but which we elected to disapprove because in doubtful cases we decided to maintain a considerable margin of precaution. We claim no infallibility, of course, with respect to the legal decisions that have been reached. We state, however, with the utmost earnestness that the decisions were carefully and honestly reached and represented the unanimous conclusions of a considerable number of attorneys of ability and experience having responsibility in the matter.

In his statement Mr. BOREN refers to the Solicitor's opinion in 1942 as an "afterthought opinion" coming after R. E. A. had made 245 acquisitions without any legal consideration of this question. The facts are that every acquisition loan had been supported by a carefully considered legal opinion, as shown in the first paragraph of the solicitor's opinion. When acquisition loans were first made R. E. A. was an indipendent agency and legal opinions were given by the general counsel and his staff. Even after the transfer of R. E. A. to the Department of Agriculture in July 1939, the legal division continued to be a part of the R. E. A. organization and was not incorporated in the office of the Solicitor of the Department until later. The Solicitor's opinion on this subject, issued in November 1942, was merely a part of a policy of the Solicitor to review a number of major matters that had received R. E. A. legal attention in the past. This problem first emerged in June 1937 and has received extensive consideration by the ablest members of the R. E. A. legal staff in connection with the general principles involved, and in connection with each particular fact and situation as it was presented. The Solicitor's opinion, instead of being an afterthought opinion, was merely a compendious treatment of the subject, embodying the legal principles which had governed R. E. A. action in this field from the beginning.

The above summary covers the matters which are chiefly emphasized in Mr. BOREN'S 33-page statement. We desire, however, to be as helpful as possible in a comprehensive consideration of every question that has been raised and the following is a discussion of Mr. BOREN'S statement, page by page.

The policy of making loans to finance the acquisition of existing electric facilities is not a change of direction and policy within the past 2 years. Allotments for these purposes have been spread fairly evenly over the past 6 years as appears from the table on page 3 of this statement.

It is not a fact that any of the funds earmarked by Congress for the extension of electric service to unserved persons in rural areas have been diverted to any other purpose. The sole purpose of every acquisition has been to make it possible for the cooperative to reach a considerable and significant number of unserved farmers who otherwise would probably be denied the benefits of electricity. There are many sections of the country where the only possibility of reaching unserved rural areas is by means of the incorporation into a cooperative system of facilities previously constructed by utility companies. In other words, the cooperative, by means of the acquisition, accomplishes what should have been accomplished by the utility company in the interest of the widest possible service to unserved persons. The only reason for the rural electrification program in all of its aspects has been the fact that private capital has been unable or unwilling to solve the problem of rural electrification in the United States. Exactly the same reasons which have justified the construction of new lines to reach unserved persons justify the acquisition of existing properties which have not adequately served rural areas in order that thereby such adequate service may be extended as widely as possible.

It is not a fact that "stock-market speculators, electric-utility holding companies, and political middlemen or brokers" are the beneficiaries of these loans. Unserved persons in rural areas who receive service as a result of the acquisition are the essential beneficiaries under the controlling purpose of the R. E. A. loan. The cooperatives have employed no middlemen or brokers in the negotiation of any of these loans, and we have no knowledge of such arrangements on the part of the selling companies. In all instances, the negotiations have been directly between the cooperatives and the executives of the selling companies. In any event, the matter in which the cooperatives are interested is the obtaining, at a fair price, of properties highly desirable for the furtherance of the rural electrification program. They are not concerned, naturally, in the distribution of the proceeds. This distribution in practically every instance is governed by State or Federal regulatory bodies. Instead of this program being for the benefit of utility companies, the fact is that there has been a widespead opposition on the part of utility companies to these acquisitions for the reasons set forth in point 2, page 2, of the preceding summary.

It is not a fact, as disclosed clearly by the financial record of the cooperatives involved, that these acquisitions have imposed a burden of debt which will "perpetuate economic enslavement of rural-electrification cooperatives." Exactly the opposite is true, as indicated by the financial studies to which we have previously referred in point 4 (p. 4).

There has been no ex post facto explanation or justification by the Solicitor's Office of the Department of Agriculture with respect to R. E. A. loans for acquisitions. As set forth in the preceding summary (point 9, p. 10), every acquisition loan from the beginning has received careful legal attention and the legal policies applied have been consistent throughout.

It is not a fact that financing of electric facilities in towns or cities has been a major activity of R. E. A. To date the entire amount of the purchase price of all acquired facilities financed by R. E. A. has represented only about 4 percent of total R. E. A. allotments. The total allotments have been approximately $480,000,000 and the total amount of loans for the financing of acquisitions has been approximately $21,350,000. This figure represents all such acquired properties, the greater portion of which have been distinctly rural. It is a fact that there have been a few very small cities, such as the two in Oklahoma mentioned by Mr. BOREN, but these acquisitions have had the same purpose and result as all acquisitions, namely, the service of unserved persons in rural areas. (See our summary, point 1, p. 1.)

We desire, emphatically, to disclaim any statement by way of half truth, and therefore actual falsehood, in the testimony before the Subcommittee on Agriculture Appropriations last year. We insist now, as was stated then, that the 4-percent ratio between loans for acquisitions and total R. E. A. allotments is a significant figure indicating that this so-called acquisition program is a minor part of the whole R. E. A. program. We are in no sense apologetic with respect to these loans and have no desire to belittle their importance. In many communities such loans have been highly important and indispensable for the achievement of adequate rural electrification in line with the responsibilities imposed upon R. E. A. by the Rural Electrification Act of Congress. We only wish it were possible for a larger number of cooperatives to avail themselves of this means of reaching thousands of unserved farmers who probably will not be served otherwise, at least in the near future. The fact is, however, in the broad perspective of the entire R. E. A. program that these loans in dollar volume play a minor and wholly incidental part.

It is not a fact that, in the fiscal year 1943, 66 percent of all R. E. A. loans were for the purpose of financing acquisitions. The total allotments for that year were $8,225,379.55 and allotments for acquisitions were $1,763,550, or 21.4 percent. It is not clear whether Mr. BOREN is referring to allotments or to moneys actually disbursed, some of which were under allotments for prior years. The figures on actual disbursements in fiscal 1943 are: total disbursements—$14,357,155; disbursements for acquisitions—$3,946,142 or 27.5 percent. Total allotments which involved acquisitions were, of course, considerably larger than the purchase price of the acquired properties and the greater part of such allotments was for new construction. This fact may be responsible for Mr. BOREN'S confusion on this matter.

It is a fact, of course, that loans for acquisitions during the war period have represented a larger percentage of total loans than was the fact before the war and will be the fact after the war but this is not because of any change in R. E. A. policy. Loan applications for new construction, totaling approximately $100,000,000, have been processed and are awaiting allotment when war conditions permit.

It is not a fact that the genesis of R. E. A. acquisition loans was in the fall of 1941. The first such loans were made in the fiscal year 1937 and some of the largest and most important acquisition loans were made in fiscal year 1939. For example, one of the most important of these transactions involved the purchase by several cooperatives in Tennessee and Georgia of the rural systems of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. for which allotments were made in May 1939. These allotments totaled $2,640,100.

We deny, completely and emphatically, the charge that R. E. A. "hoarded copper" and "recklessly ignored War Production Board orders." Mr. BOREN'S statements in this regard are based upon a report of certain members of Special Committee No. 3 of the House Committee on Military Affairs, commonly known as the Faddis Committee. The issues and the facts concerning these matters as we see them are set forth in the "additional views" of seven members of the House Military Affairs Committee and the minority report set forth on pages 185–197 of the printed report submitted under date of June 23, 1942. These matters were considered at length in several quarters, including hearings before the House and Senate Subcommittees on Appropriations. We feel that no useful purpose would be served by further detailed discussion of matters that have already been thoroughly canvassed and charges that have been completely disproved.

We desire, however, to deny with the utmost vigor any policy or action inconsistent with the war effort or the orders of the agencies primarily charged therewith. R. E. A. has never hoarded any materials for the simple reason that it has never owned any materials. With respect to the instance referred to on page 4 of Mr. BOREN'S statement, the copper conductor in question was not even owned by the cooperative. It was owned by the contractor who had purchased it in normal business practice before Pearl Harbor. It is true that further construction on many R. E. A. projects was ordered to be discontinued by the War Production Board just as was true of a large amount of construction by private-utility companies and by government agencies. These orders were duly observed by the cooperatives and R. E. A. cooperated to the full with the War Production Board. The inventories of the cooperatives at the time of Pearl Harbor (vastly less than the inventories of most utility companies) have been made available to the war effort to the extent that the War Production Board and other agencies directly responsible for the war effort have desired.

Mr. BOREN makes adverse comments with respect to the financing of cooperative generating and transmission facilities and to the development of central cooperatives which he refers to as the "holding-company type." At this point he departs from a discussion of acquisition loans and deals with an entirely different aspect of the rural-electrification program. The facts are that loans for the construction of generating and transmission facilities have been approximately 7 percent of total loans. It is not the fact that such financing is the result of any new policy within the last 2 or 3 years. Some of the most important of such central cooperatives supplying a group of local cooperatives with generating and transmission facilities were financed 4 and 5 years ago, involving particularly such facilities in the States of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.

There have been two reasons for the desire of these cooperatives to have their own generating and transmission facilities, and these reasons are exactly within policies that have prevailed generally in the successful development of the electric power and light industry. The first reason was inability in many cases to purchase wholesale energy at reasonable rates and the other reason was the desire to be independent in their business operations. In connection with this second reason, we might cite a typical example involving a number of cooperatives in Texas. The power company which had been serving these cooperatives insisted upon a clause in the contract preventing the cooperatives from serving any industrial or other loads in excess of a 25-kilowatt demand, even though these loads represented new consumers located along the cooperatives' lines. These farmers felt that they had just as much right to do business in a normal way in the State where they lived and worked as a utility company, most of the stock of which was owned outside the State. If the utility company did not want to sell electricity at a fair rate and under reasonable contractual conditions, it had a right to refuse, particularly in a State where an electric utility is not subject to the orders of a regulatory body. The farmers, however, on their part, had an equal right, in the face of such refusal, to do business in the normal way and to own and operate a self-contained electric system. It is not only the right, but the duty, of R. E. A. to honor such loan applications under appropriate fact conditions and to exercise the authority conferred by section 4 of the statute, "to make loans * * * for the purpose of financing the construction and operation of generating plants, electric transmission, and distribution lines, or systems."

These central cooperatives are exactly the opposite of a holding company set-up. The central cooperative does not own the stock of the member cooperatives but, on the contrary, the member cooperatives own the central cooperative and are in control of its management. These cooperatives have always preferred, and still prefer, to purchase energy at wholesale when such can be accomplished at a fair price and under reasonable contractual conditions. They have the same right, however, as all other citizens to do business in the best interest of their enterprises under such State regulation as may be applicable.

It is not a fact that the production costs of these cooperative generating plants have been greater than the cost of energy available at wholesale purchase. In this connection it is important to note that the cooperatives in building their own generating and transmission facilities are thinking a long time ahead. As the demand increases the cost per kilowatt-hour of energy generated and transmitted by central cooperatives will correspondingly decrease. In this connection we cite the highly successful record of the Federated Cooperative Power Association which generates power for six local cooperatives in northern Iowa, serving about 10,000 rural consumers. Over a 6-year period it has provided power to the local cooperatives at a lower average cost than would have been the cost of purchased power from any available source. In addition to these savings the association, on March 1, 1944, had an earned surplus of $98,673, which of course, is an asset of the member cooperatives. This power association, as of January 1, 1944, had repaid the Government $106,775 in principal and interest, including $39,600 advance payments of principal. It has $20,899 invested in War bonds.

Mr. BOREN expresses disapproval that R. F. C. has no discretion in passing upon the loan policies of R. E. A., followed by a statement that the cooperatives and their farmer members are being loaded down with debts which they will have difficulty in paying off. The fact is that borrowings from R. F. C. have been merely a device chosen by Congress under several appropriation acts for supplying the R. E. A. program with funds rather than appropriations directly from the Treasury. R. F. C. has been well content with the soundness of the cooperative obligations pledged as security for R. F. C. loans to the R. E. A. Administrator as indicated by recent public statements of representatives of R. F. C.

Mr. BOREN refers to the "very satisfactory record in financial statements of existing cooperatives" but expresses a fear that future operations will not be so satisfactory. The fact is that every single trend constituting an index of financial condition indicates an increasing improvement. Such indexes include ratio of operating expense to gross revenue, ratio of net earnings to total indebtedness, density of consumers per mile, average kilowatt-hour consumption, percentage of minimum bills, and average revenue per mile. Under all of these indexes the trends continue to be consistently upward (even with respect to cooperatives that now have a life of 6 years or more) and there is no indication as yet of a leveling off.

Mr. BOREN states, or implies, that the War Production Board halted certain construction on R. E. A. projects in the Southwest because of a report by the Military Affairs Committee. The fact is that the action of W. P. B. had absolutely no relation to the report of this committee. The R. E. A. project which received the principal attention of this committee was one located in Arkansas for the purpose of serving a Government aluminum plant at Lake Catherine, and the War Production Board, after extensive study, ordered this line to be built by the cooperative. This action was concurred in by the Defense Plant Corporation and the Federal Power Commission. The two projects to which I assume Mr. BOREN refers are located in Texas. One is a transmission system to connect a number of cooperatives in the Brazos River Valley and to distribute power purchased from the agency owning the Morris Sheppard Dam. The other was a generating and transmission system to serve a group of cooperatives in east Texas, centering around Upshur County. The construction of these projects was halted merely as a part of a W. P. B. policy applicable to the entire electric industry throughout the United States. Projects that were not more than 40 percent completed as of Pearl Harbor were halted, and there were hundreds of such projects among cooperatives, public agencies, and private utility companies. There was nothing special or unusual with respect to the R. E. A. projects in the Southwest. These had been begun before the war and, after a finding by W. P. B. that construction had not progressed to a completion of 40 percent before Pearl Harbor, further construction was halted, except for certain facilities to serve war industries.

Mr. BOREN refers to alleged efforts of R. E. A. to avoid any shrinkage of the agency. The fact is that the R. E. A. program during the war has been subject to the policies and regulations of the agencies directly responsible for the war effort, particularly W. P. B. The Bureau of the Budget and the Congress have approved loan funds and administrative funds necessary to continue the R. E. A. program within the limitations imposed by the war effort, and R. E. A. has adjusted itself with the utmost cooperation to these limitations. The R. E. A. staff, at its maximum, on December 11, 1941, comprised 1,092 persons. Since that time the agency has reduced its personnel to a present number of 646, including 9 on terminal leave.

We have already discussed the charge that R. E. A. has been financing the "cats and dogs of the utility industry" representing "obsolete and junk-pile properties" (p. 6 of this statement).

With reference to the charge that the "present group running the R. E. A. is nothing more than a conspiracy to capture rural America and perpetuate it in economic serfdom," we feel that it is unnecessary to burden this statement with anything more than a simple but emphatic denial of any such purpose or result. We wish to avoid any spirit of boastfulness, because we are just an average group of people inspired, however, with more than average devotion to the program for which we are responsible. There seems to be ample evidence to support a belief that public opinion generally, in private and in public life, warmly endorses this program conducted now, as at all times, under policies which have prevailed from the beginning.

PAGES 7–10

The Grimes Pass case: We have already discussed this loan in point 6, page 6.

PAGES 10–16

The Sho-Me case: We have discussed this loan in point 7, page 8. Certain cooperatives in Missouri desired to purchase this property in order to do a good job of rural electrification in farm areas which the former owner of the property had neglected and failed to serve. Mr. BOREN suggests that this acquisition will be prejudicial in some way to these cooperatives and their farmer members. The farmers certainly have had no such thought. They fought vigorously for their right to consummate the purchase against the bitter opposition of 14 utility companies in proceedings before the Public Service Commission of Missouri. The commission, which had the responsibility of deciding the question, had no such thought. It decided that the public interest (including the interests of the cooperatives and the consumers on the acquired lines) would be served by the purchase.

Mr. BOREN speaks with great concern of the interests of the existing consumers along the acquired lines and refers to them as "captive customers." We wish to say just three things in connection with this matter which we did not discuss in our summary. First, this property was on the market for sale under orders of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Although no other firm offer had been made, it is a matter of record that certain other interests, representing undisclosed principals, had negotiated with the seller at a price just slightly under the price paid by the cooperative. In the hundreds of transactions of sale and purchase in the electric light and power field duly approved by regulatory bodies, it has never been considered as a matter of consequence that consumers are served by a new ownership provided the service continues to be adequate. Second, it was clearly established, and so found by the Public Service Commission, that the properties in question under cooperative ownership would have a more sound financial structure and that the service would continue to be as good or better. Third, the record does not indicate that these existing consumers considered themselves to be "captives." The record shows exactly the opposite. Those consumers who do not join the cooperatives will continue to be served as nonmembers.

Mr. BOREN refers to the fact that there was no vote of the existing consumers and states that R. E. A. "either dared not trust the electorate of these communities for a simple expression of their will, or they just didn't give a damn." The fact is that ultility companies, not R. E. A. or the cooperatives, have opposed any resort to "consumer preference" as a criterion in determining what agency should own electric facilities. They have built "spite lines" in many areas where the overwhelming preference was cooperative service, in order to wreck or handicap the cooperative. In many States, these same utility companies have objected to evidence of consumer preference in Commission proceedings with respect to acquisitions. R. E. A. would welcome consumer preference as an important factor in all competitive situations but this doctrine is very unpalatable to utility companies. It is a doctrine that could have had a very wholesome effect in purchase and sale transactions between utility companies during the past 20 years.

The small water system and the three small ice plants were not included in the appraisal of the property for the purpose of determining the feasibility of the acquisition and of the R. E. A. loan. The value of these small collateral properties was less than 2 percent of the purchase price and the electric properties alone were well worth the price paid. The properties of the Missouri Electric Power Co. had to be acquired in their entirety or not at all and these insignificant water and ice plants were merely excess items that did not enter into the essential appraisal studies. The sole purpose of the R. E. A. loan was the solution of the problem of rural electrification in southern Missouri and the reaching of unserved farmers by means of this acquisition.

The Indian electric case: This is the Oklahoma acquisition discussed in point 8, page 9, of our summary statement and we shall deal here only with one matter not previously covered. Mr. BOREN in his statement inquires whether S. E. C. was informed of the existence of a higher offer from the Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co. The fact is, as the record of the S. E. C. proceedings indicates, that the Commission not only knew about it but approved the cooperative purchase in the face of the vigorous opposition of this power company. The Commission, in explaining its action stated:

"The record indicates that after entering into a contract to sell its electric properties to the said purchaser, Oklahoma received a bid from Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co., a subsidiary of Standard Gas & Electric Co., a registered holding company, to purchase such properties for a base price of $250,000, or $13,000 in excess of the contract price. The record indicates that the sale of Oklahoma's electric properties has been discussed since 1939 with neighboring utilities, including Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co., but no interest was evidenced in their acquisition until the offer made by Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co. subsequent to the close of the contract with the said purchaser. Since it appears that competitive conditions have been maintained in the sale of these properties and that the sale price is favorable, we do not believe that the existing contract arrangements should be upset because of this late offer. We see no basis, therefore, for adverse findings under section 12 (d) with respect to the proposed sale." (Securities and Exchange Commission Release No. 4613, dated Friday, October 8, 1943, on p. 2, par. 5.)

The Maupin River case: This is the last of the four acquisitions specifically discussed by Mr. BOREN. He charges that the Wasco Electric Cooperative in Oregon bought the property of the Maupin River Co. at a price $18,000 too high and that the cost of electricity to the cooperative members will be increased. The price paid was based on earning power and on careful appraisal by engineers of the Bonneville Power Administration and R. E. A.

The cost of delivering electricity to the cooperative members will be decreased and the transaction has other important values as follows: The acquisition was made to enable the cooperative; (1) to serve 70 unserved persons who were situated too great a distance from the cooperative's existing source of power to be served without the acquisition; (2) to extend service to the Warm Springs Indian Agency under a contract guaranteeing the cooperative a minimum revenue of $500 per month; and (3) to bring cheap Bonneville power to the cooperative's entire enlarged system which it would not have been able to do without utilizing the Maupin hydro system for voltage regulation.

In addition, this cooperative will be able profitably to furnish a neighboring cooperative, Central Electric Cooperatives, Inc., with power at wholesale for approximately 1 cent per kilowatt-hour as compared to 1.32 cents per kilowatt-hour, which the latter would have to pay if it were compelled to purchase power from the Pacific Power & Light Co., the only other available course. Thus not only will the acquiring cooperative add greatly to its revenues and its ability to reach unserved persons, but it will also be able to improve the financial condition of a neighboring cooperative.

We have already discussed all of the six summarized points contained in Mr. BOREN'S statement with the exception of one. In his point 5, reference is made to the fact that the purchase of these properties by cooperatives removes them from Federal taxes and most local taxes. This matter, of course, is wholly one of legislative policy in a field in which the Rural Electrification Administration has no responsibility. It should be stated, however, that there has been little change in tax status with reference to most of the properties which cooperatives have acquired. With respect to State taxes, these properties in most instances have been assessed to the cooperative for taxation at the same value as under the prior ownership. There are a few States where under State law the tax situation was changed by the acquisition but, as stated above, this is a matter for the States to determine and is entirely apart from the responsibilities with which R. E. A. is charged.

PAGES 20–22

The resolution adopted by the Cooperative League of America quoted at length in Mr. BORENLS statement has no relevancy whatever to any of the issues here under discussion. This resolution, in its broad generalizations, is concerned with just one thing, namely, the necessity in the public interest that no loans by Government agencies shall be made for political purposes. The R. E. A. staff, in common with all good citizens, is in complete accord with the lofty sentiments of this resolution, but it has no relation whatever, in its language or in its background, to the matter of acquisitions by cooperatives. So far as we know, no one has ever even intimated that any R. E. A. loan to finance cooperative acquisitions was motivated by political considerations.

PAGES 22–23

This portion of Mr. BOREN'S statement has to do with the legal problems involved in R. E. A. financing of acquisitions under the provisions of the Rural Electrification Act. As we have already stated, it would seem that no useful purpose would be served by discussing at length the Solicitor's opinion on this subject. The opinion speaks for itself and any discussion here would be merely by way of needless repetition.

We wish, however, to correct certain misapprehensions. As we have indicated in our initial summary statement (pp. 10–11) this was decidedly not an "afterthought opinion." It was issued by the Solicitor merely as a part of a policy of reducing to the form of Solicitor's opinions many of the major legal questions which had been receiving the attention of the R. E. A. legal staff before its incorporation in the Solicitor's office. This matter received the careful attention of R. E. A. attorneys at the time of the very first loan application for such financing and each acquisition has received legal approval after careful study. We are very sorry that Mr. BOREN was led to reach the conclusion expressed in the following statement which appears on page 23: "The very fact that this policy had proceeded apace for 4 years without a legal peg to hang on reflects contempt for the law and for the will of Congress that is hardly compatible with sound administrative practice—if I may understate the case." We are sure that he will be glad to learn of the true situation as indicated above.

Mr. BOREN is also mistaken in his conjecture that there never would have been a legal opinion by the Department of Agriculture on the subject had not the Comptroller General requested it. The fact is that the preparation of the opinion signed and issued by the Solicitor under date of November 24, 1942, had been under preparation for some time prior to the inquiry addressed to the Secretary of Agriculture by the Comptroller General under date of October 12, 1942. Our files indicate that the first draft of this opinion was submitted to the Solicitor August 24, 1942, under his request for a compendious opinion embodying the essential legal principles that had governed the actions of the R. E. A. legal division prior to its incorporation into the Solicitor's Office. The Solicitor had requested the opinion several weeks prior to the date the first draft was submitted to him.

We do not know what importance Mr. BOREN attaches to his statement on page 23 that the Solicitor's opinion "has never been made public in full," and the reference to "the obscurity in which it has languished unseen in the archives of the Department of Agriculture for more than a year." The fact is that this opinion received exactly the same distribution as all other Solicitor's opinions. There is no public distribution of any of these opinions and the distribution is limited to the members of the Solicitor's Office and appropriate persons in the Bureau having responsibility for the matters involved. Speaking for the attorneys, we should also like to say that their feelings are hurt by Mr. BOREN'S reference to the good faith of their opinion and his characterization of the opinion as a "classic of legal casuistry" and "an ex parte tissue of legal sophisms and special pleadings." We can meet these accusations only by a reference to the opinion itself and by an emphatic assertion of our completely honest belief that it is a good opinion and represents a thoroughly sound exposition of the applicable legal principles.

Subsidies and Food-Allotment Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. D. WORTH CLARK
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an interview with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] by Mr. Bennett, which was broadcast over the network of the National Broadcasting Co. on Friday, March 17. The interview was on the subject Subsidies and the Food-Allotment Plan.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BENNETT. Hello folks. This is Dana Bennett, your Washington farm reporter. Here in the studio with me is an outstanding Member of the United States Senate. He is loved by many and deeply respected even by his opponents. His knowledge of government is surpassed by none. His sympathy for labor and for agriculture is a matter of record. Personally, he is one of the finest Americans I know. It is a real pleasure to have Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr., of Wisconsin, to interview.

He is going to discuss with you the Aiken-La Follette food-allotment bill. You will undoubtedly be hearing more about this important piece of legislation in the near future.

Senator, will you tell us just what the food-allotment plan is?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I shall be glad to, Dana. Briefly, it is a bill to provide assistance to consumers in those low-income groups who cannot afford an adequate minimum food diet. This assistance would be offered in the form of food-purchase stamps. The stamps would be available to each family in whatever amount is necessary to provide enough additional food to meet minimum nutritional requirements. The stamps could be exchanged for food only, at grocery stores and meat markets. The Government would redeem them in cash when turned in by the storekeepers.

The Aiken-La Follette bill takes the findings of the Department of Agriculture as to what constitutes an adequate minimum diet as the standard. It provides that each family will be afforded whatever assistance is necessary to bring its diet up to that standard, or its equivalent. Those families who can afford such a minimum diet or a better one out of their own income will not be eligible for any aid from the Government under this plan.

Mr. BENNETT. Senator, what has prompted you and Senator Aiken to propose the food-allotment plan at this particular time?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. As you know, Dana, there has been a great deal of confused thinking about the cost of living in this country. It is a fact that the cost of living in terms of prices paid for food, clothing, and the other necessities of life has increased as we have gone on a war footing. It is a fact that many people with low or relatively fixed incomes are suffering seriously from this rise in prices. The more the necessities of life cost, the less these people can buy.

The problem is to provide assistance for these people without committing the Government to a general consumer subsidy program which benefits the rich as well as the needy. In fact, it benefits the rich more than the needy. The Aiken-La Follette food-allotment bill will provide the assistance where it is needed most, and at the smallest cost to the taxpayer in proportion to its benefits.

Mr. BENNETT. Senator, just exactly how would the rich benefit more than the poor under a general subsidy program?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Studies indicate that the total consumer benefit from the present food-subsidy program ranges from approximately $5 a year in the lower-income brackets to $5 a month in the top-income brackets. The benefit is trifling for most consumers. The scheme so operates that benefits are least for those who need them most and most for those who need them least.

Mr. BENNETT. Senator, how would your food-allotment plan stop what would appear to be this most unfair procedure?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. It does not extend any benefits to those consumers who have sufficient income to absorb the increased cost of living.

Mr. BENNETT. Senator, how would you determine how much each family is entitled to in the form of stamps?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. It is estimated that the dietary standard established in the bill would require an expenditure of approximately $650 a year to feed a family of four. Under this plan the Government will, in effect, make up the difference between this amount and what the family is able to spend out of its own income for food.

This estimate of $650 would vary in different sections of the country. It would depend on local food prices.

Mr. BENNETT. But, Senator, as your bill uses the Department of Agriculture's basic standard for nutritional requirements, won't it have the effect of compelling everyone participating in the plan to eat the same thing, whether they like it or not?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Absolutely not. The bill provides that the basic food allotment shall consist of those foods and amounts contained in the Department of Agriculture's basic diet, or its equivalent.

Mr. BENNETT. So our meals would not be determined by daily bulletins out of Washington?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. No, sir.

Mr. BENNETT. The plan, Senator, I take it, should result in a higher standard of American health. I believe selective-service figures show a startling number of our fellow citizens have physical defects due to malnutrition.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. You certainly have touched upon a very fundamental consideration in this whole cost-of-living discussion. You are all finding out now what many of us warned against throughout the thirties, when unemployment was rife. It is not sound national policy to undermine the dietary standard of our citizens.

The records of the Selective Service System indicate that between 40 and 45 percent of the men called for military service have been rejected for physical reasons. The Surgeon General of the United States points out that a substantial proportion of these rejections are due to the effects of malnutrition as well as the lack of proper medical and dental care.

In this rich country, possessing vast productive capacity, there is no excuse for allowing people to suffer from malnutrition. We do not want to repeat the dismal picture that was presented in the thirties. Then farmers were being paid by the Government to plough under corn and slaughter little pigs. At the same time millions of people were living on a horribly inadequate diet in our great cities. When we faced the crisis of war this had produced young men who were unable to serve their country because of malnutrition.

Mr. BENNETT. But, Senator, don't we face a different situation now? Can we produce enough food to provide everyone with an adequate diet?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. The American farmer is anxious, willing, and able to produce all of the food necessary to feed our people, and tremendous quantities to help feed our allies. We need only give him the green light for full production and clear the present obstacles out of his way.

Mr. BENNETT. What are those obstacles, Senator?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. The major requirements for full production are manpower, machinery and supplies, and a fair price at the market place to cover production costs.

I want to make it clear that I do not think a Government subsidy is an acceptable substitute for a fair price.

Mr. BENNETT. Why not?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Of course, Dana, it is difficult to generalize about subsidies. There are many kinds. There are some instances in which it is possible to subsidize a small part of the supply of a commodity. This saves the consumer not only the difference in price on that small part of the supply, but on the entire supply. The subsidy on copper is a spectacular illustration of this. For the most part, food subsidies are not of this variety. Practically all of the food subsidies are applied to the entire supply. Consequently consumers generally will, in the end, pay more in taxes to support the program than they save in lower prices.

To the farmer the general food-subsidy program is a sham. It establishes fictitiously low prices in the public mind which will rise to plague him in later years.

Mr. BENNETT. But again, Senator, what about the consumer?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. To the consumer generally, the benefits of the present food-subsidy program have been grossly overrated. The consumer is getting at the most a 3½-cent benefit on his food dollar.

For the amount being expended currently for general food subsidies, the food-allotment plan would guarantee a minimum nutritional diet to at least 40,000,000 Americans.

Mr. BENNETT. Senator, you seem to feel that the general food subsidies paid up to the present time have had little or no effect upon the general food price level. Is that right?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. That's right. The present food-subsidy program is not the backbone of the stabilization program. The price-ceiling machinery, rationing, and the over-all fiscal policy of the Government should be the real backbone of price stabilization.

In connection with price ceilings, let me say that O. P. A. could save the consumer money on his food bill by going after the tremendous profits that are being made by some food processors.

I certainly am not one to begrudge the food processors or any other businessman a fair profit. However, it is a fact that food processors have been reaping unprecedented profits. This is due largely to increased demand for foods and increased volume of business, coupled with the reduction of sales and promotional expenses. It is estimated that the aggregate profits, before taxes, in 1942 for one group of 53 meat packers were over four times the pre-war level of 1936 and 1939. Wholesale food grocers are reported to have realized twice as much on every dollar of sales, before taxes, in 1942 as in 1939. Profits before income taxes realized by fruit and vegetable canners were found to be five times as great in 1942 as in the years 1936–39.

Mr. BENNETT. I've heard it charged that this whole subsidy question is being used by certain powerful factions in this country for purposes of their own. Skip that one if you want to, Senator.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. I don't want to skip that at all. I am sure that there are forces at work trying desperately to use this subsidy issue as a political wedge to separate the great mass of city wage earners, from the farmer, and to turn one group against the other.

The farmer is no war profiteer, and anyone who understands his problem will be compelled to acknowledge that.

I sincerely hope this trick will not succeed. For, in the long run, the producers in the factory and on the farm are dependent upon one another. They will prosper together or they will go down to ruin together. The events of the last 3 years have proved that if the workingman is getting a good wage he can buy all of the food the farmer can produce. And at a fair price the farmer can produce all the food the Nation needs.

There has been violent disagreement in Congress and elsewhere on the policy of general food subsidies. But Congress has given the President every dollar he has requested for subsidies. The meager results, therefore, cannot be blamed on the opposition. They must be traced to the shortcomings of the general food subsidy scheme itself.

Mr. BENNETT. Senator LA FOLLETTE, will you sum up our discussion?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Certainly, Dana. We are concerned at the moment with the impact of the increased cost of living on the people who cannot afford to absorb these rising costs. General food subsidies are not the answer. They attempt to subsidize everybody whether he needs it or not. As a result, the benefits are spread so thin that the program does not give substantial assistance to anyone. The Aiken-La Follette food-allotment plan will concentrate the help where it is needed most, among those with low and relatively fixed incomes. At the same time the farmer will, in the normal course of trade, get his fair and necessary prices.

If, after the war, we should be confronted with another overproduction-underconsumption crisis similar to the thirties, this same machinery will be available to stabilize the market outlets for agricultural commodities. It would protect then, as now, the diet and the health of the American people.

Mr. BENNETT. Senator LA FOLLETTE, we have a few minutes left to go into a little ad lib conversation. I wonder if, in your opinion, the Aiken-La Follette bill will take the place of general food subsidies? Will it handle the situation completely?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. It is my feeling it will handle the situation, Dana, much better than general food subsidies for many of the reasons discussed here tonight. The main point here is that general food subsidies do not give the consumer substantial benefit. The Aiken-La Follette food-allotment plan would concentrate whatever money Congress is willing to appropriate for this purpose and give it to those who need it most and provide for them a real substantial benefit in the form of a minimum nutritional diet to protect health now and in the future.

Mr. BENNETT. Senator LA FOLLETTE, that seems fine to me, and I am sure the folks have been very much interested in your discussion of the Aiken-La Follette food-allotment bill. Thank you very much, Senator LA FOLLETTE.

Hull's Efforts Praised

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TOM MURRAY
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence:

HULL'S EFFORTS PRAISED
(By David Lawrence)

For the last several months there has developed in this country a sort of heckling compaign against the State Department. Some of it originated with the left-wing groups that didn't like our cautious policy with respect to General de Gaulle. Some of it comes from the elements which like to believe that the United States "has no foreign policy" and never has had any, which is inaccurate, because America has had a foreign policy as far back as 1917—one that was applied specifically as recently as November 1939 when the Congress repealed the arms embargo and took the first step toward helping the Allies. And now some of the criticism is coming from Republicans who themselves have never made clear what they want by way of foreign policy, but who insist that whatever our policy happens to be, it is not clear enough or something.

Much of the attack centers on the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, whose patient labors over the last several decades in favor of international cooperation and as against economic nationalism ought to be clear to anybody who is fair in examining the record. One of the mistakes President Wilson made was not to consult congressional committees on foreign policy, though few people realize how many of the suggestions made by the Republican leaders were actually accepted by Mr. Wilson in 1919 and embodied in the Covenant of the League of Nations.

Today Mr. Hull is trying to cooperate with Congress. He has received 22 Republican Congressmen and discussed foreign policy. He has made arrangements to discuss the future international organization for world peace with congressional committees. It is important that the record be made of this effort to bring about nonpartisan consideration of foreign policy, though it may turn out that present-day Republicans are as partisan as were their brethren of yesteryears.

Some of the criticism which emanated from the conference the other day with the Republican Congressmen shows the difficulties. If Mr. Hull talks off the record about delicate matters, the callers do not observe his confidence and the newspapers are given by the Congressmen fragmentary reports which can lead to embarrassing relations with Allied Governments. Why talk off the record, why not discuss everything in public, it is asked? Much as some Americans may be inclined to nurture the thought, the fact is that the United States Government is in no position to dictate to the other sovereign governments of the world. Incidentally, the other day Anthony Eden found himself denying vehemently in the House of Commons the insinuation of one of its members that the United States was dictating the foreign policy of Great Britain.

Neither the President nor the Secretary of State can tell Russia or Britain what to do. Each is an independent nation with a leader who has a mind of his own. The suggestion, sometimes made as a threat, that unless the Allies do what America wants done, the United States should withdraw and go isolationist, is one that ignores the fact that the war is not yet won and that if any nation begins to fight the war its own way or to relax its efforts, Germany and Japan will be the beneficiaries.

The Republican Party has a grave responsibility the moment it begins to heckle the administration on foreign policy. For it may turn out that the administration will be the beneficiary at the polls in November of such tactics. The one thing the Democrats probably want to see happen more than anything else is the raising of the issue of foreign policy in the coming campaign. This is because foreign policy and war will then become interwoven in the public mind, and it will be to the advantage of the Democrats to subordinate domestic irritations and issues and let the country become agitated over what our foreign policy is going to be. This, in turn, will bring a debate on what our war policies are to be. In the end, the argument will be made by the Democrats that there must be no change in the Presidency and that reelection of Mr. Roosevelt is essential to continuity of our war effort. This would be asserted so as to create such fears as to make many voters afraid to risk a change.

If the Republicans are so foolish as to be caught in that political trap or rather to put themselves into that kind of a net through their own behavior, they will deserve to lose the election. The advice given by some thoughtful Republican leaders several months ago that the two parties avoid making either foreign policy or the war a major issue and that the Republicans concentrate on the shortcomings of the New Deal is still sound political judgment.

The Merchant Marine As an Instrument of Commerce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered before the Export Managers Club of New York, March 22, 1944, by R. Earle Anderson, Director of Finance, United States Maritime Commission:

Some months ago the world was startled by the news that one of our newly created shipyards on the Pacific coast had built a 10,000-ton Liberty ship in the almost unbelievable period of 11 days. The news of this astonishing performance rang from one end of the country to the other, and people suddenly awakened to the fact that the United States was creating the greatest fleet of merchant ships the world has ever seen. The fact began to stand out that when the war ends the United States would find itself with newly built tonnage equal to more than half of what had been the pre-war tonnage of the whole world.

What to do with this vast fleet of ocean-going vessels when the dove of peace begins to flutter its wings?

Some would have us give away our entire merchant fleet to the British, with perhaps a few ships for the Norwegians and the Greeks.

Some have urged that the day after peace is declared a fleet of 50,000,000 tons of American ships, flying the American flag and loaded down with American goods, should start out to sail the 7 seas.

These ideas, of course, represent the extreme of hysteria. Actually, we shall have, post-war, a great merchant fleet. We shall, for the time being, at least, be the leading maritime nation. We intend to remain a maritime nation. Our post-war obligations, both to ourselves and to other nations, will require us to remain a maritime nation. We shall have before us both an opportunity and a problem. But unless our shipping policy continues to be founded on solid financial and political considerations, our ascendancy will be short lived, and both our commerce and our national defense will suffer.

You gentlemen, who handle our export and our import trade, and who find both your means of livelihood and your opportunity for service to the country at large in furthering the movement of goods in our foreign trade, have a very real interest in what happens to our merchant marine. Is it to be a national asset, or just an expensive toy left over from the war? Are we going to force our ships into world-wide service simply because we have them and attempt to make our commerce serve our ships, or are we going to make our ships serve our commerce? And shall we forget the lessons which two wars should have taught us as to what ships mean to our national safety?

The answer lies, I believe, in viewing the matter objectively; in determining what we really shall need, post-war, as a merchant marine; what constitutes a sound national policy with respect to our shipping from the standpoint of both commerce and the national defense; implementing that policy with the ships we shall have, supplemented if need be by some further construction for special purposes, such as passenger vessels (of which there will probably be a post-war shortage) and then disposing of the remainder in such manner as may be consistent with sound relations with other friendly maritime nations and a policy of parity in the operation of vessels under the American flag in world competition. If there be still a surplus of tonnage, a reserve fleet of slow but stalwart Liberty ships, permanently withdrawn from commercial use, may well serve as insurance against a future national emergency.

From such a program there should emerge an American merchant fleet adequate to serve and develop our water-borne commerce, made up of ships unequaled by those of any other nation—fast ships, well-equipped, the safest that the science of naval architecture can produce, and ready for instant use in the support of our armed services in maintaining peace or if need be in waging war.

Now, there are those who argue that we should not attempt to remain in the business of carrying any substantial part of our water-borne commerce; that all ocean-carrying should be done by those who offer the lowest cost, and that every dollar taken out of the pocket of the American ship operator or the American seaman is a dollar added to the purchasing power of our foreign customer, and hence increases our export trade.

At first blush this theory is plausible, provided, of course, that we are willing to forget the part that merchant ships play in the national defense. It is widely accepted as a sound theory. Our British cousins, who are not at all complacent about the possible future place that America will have in world commerce, never lose an opportunity to implant and nurture this theory in the American mind, and the British are by no means unskilled in the use of subtle commercial propaganda.

This idea that a dollar paid to a foreign ocean carrier is a dollar added to our foreign trade probably grows out of the conception of foreign trade as something static—as a stream of limited flow, dependent upon some fixed volume of available foreign exchange. It overlooks the very basic fact that foreign trade is a two-way traffic; that it involves imports as well as exports; that the foreign exchange through which money settlements are made is the result, not the source, of such trade, and that the extent to which producers of materials and goods throughout the world find it advantageous to exchange such goods and are willing and able to do so is the prime factor that determines the volume of international trade.

The notion of a fixed volume of trade limited by some fixed amount of foreign exchange finds its counterpart in the theory, often expressed in soap-box oratory, that there is a fixed amount of money available for wages, or a fixed amount of work to be done, or a fixed number of jobs in the country to be given out to workers, and that a dollar more or a job more comes out of someone else's pocket or pay roll. All American experience is to the contrary. The extraordinary rise in real wages and in the standard of living in this country over many decades is evidence of that fact. Neither wages, nor jobs, nor trade, are static. Activity breeds activity in industry and in commerce, and it may well be that a dollar wisely spent in the American carriage of our commerce will accumulate many dollars in volume of trade; that instead of subtracting from our exports, it will stimulate our exchange of goods and thus tend to increase imports and exports together.

The thing that the statically minded economists fail to recognize is the function of our merchant marine as a builder of foreign commerce.

During the second half of the last century our country underwent a tremendous internal expansion. It was an era of an advancing frontier during which the railroads, stimulated and supported by Federal subsidies in the form of land grants, knit the country together with a great network of transportation that became the very foundation of our growth as an agricultural and industrial nation. The part that transportation played in pioneering the development of America is so much a matter of common knowledge that its significance is readily overlooked.

Today it is a matter of pretty general agreement that when peace comes there will ensue a period of expanding world trade. Our sea lanes, supplemented by airways closely integrated with our surface shipping services, must carry the great bulk of the international exchange of goods. The function of our merchant marine in the post-war era of world development can be likened to that of our railroads in our domestic development. Of course, we cannot monopolize the world carrying trade even if we would, but we should certainly not contemplate turning it over bodily to competitive nations because of some pinchpenny economic philosophy that fails altogether to recognize the true function of our ships, traversing both sea and air, as a means to promote our foreign commerce, increase our exports and our imports, and so add to our domestic prosperity.

Our American farmer, our American manufacturer, our trader, and our workman must come into this post-war period of world-wide expanding commerce with every means at hand for stimulating our foreign trade and so insuring our own ability to utilize to the utmost the productive capacity of our farms and workshops.

The task is not performed, the problem of trade is not solved when an export bill of lading is written and a ship of whatever flag is found on the appropriate berth. The activities of you gentlemen as exporters will be bound in shallows and in miseries, miseries that will be shared by all your compatriots, farmers, manufacturers, workers, and tradesmen, unless there is a full and effective realization of the character and scope of our problem of foreign trade.

Historically, the United States is export minded. Its businessmen and its politicians think of foreign trade principally in terms of exports rather than in terms of imports. It is not surprising that this is the case.

Until very recently we have been a debtor nation. Throughout our early years, throughout, that is to say, the period of our youth, we used foreign capital for the development of our resources. British and Dutch money, in particular, found a profitable field for investment in our railroads and mines.

But we have been buying back from foreign ownership our mines and factories and railroads, and we have been paying for them with the difference between our imports and our exports. So long as this condition of our owing money abroad continued, a balance of exports over imports was favorable. We were, in effect, investing the excess production of our farms and factories in acquiring a free-and-clear ownership of our facilities. Because we were producing more than we were consuming, we were creating wealth, and in transferring our surpluses to foreign countries we were paying off debt and thus, in effect, plowing back into our own national economy wealth that had previously been obtained abroad. It was not without reason, therefore, that the excess of our exports over our imports was referred to as a favorable balance of trade. It was favorable, very favorable, so long as it enabled us to refinance our phenomenal growth by returning to the foreign financiers and promoters the capital they had put into our hands while America was in course of development.

Today such an excess of exports over imports can no longer properly be referred to as a "favorable balance," at least not in the old and historic sense. For we are no longer a debtor nation, nor have we been for more than a quarter of a century.

If our foreign debt has been paid off; if the investments of the British, the Dutch, and others in our mines and railroads have been retired; if the world now owes us more than it can repay, what is the function today of our export trade? Can we continue to have an excess of exports over imports without merely squandering the wealth that we have produced?

Why, in fact, should we carry on foreign trade at all if by so doing we merely pile up more and more credits that cannot be paid by the nations that have now become debtors to us? Why must we concern ourselves with such expedients as hiring our creditors to carry our goods on the theory that we can thus give them funds for them to use in buying our excess automobiles and typewriters and cotton and wheat?

There are those who advocate just such a deliberate shrinkage of our foreign trade; who argue for self-sufficiency; who point for example to synthetic rubber as proof that we can do without the products of other lands if we will but put our minds to it, and who, reminding us that our exports are, after all, only about a tenth or less of our production, would abandon our efforts to sell abroad, because they envision an America that will have no further need of foreign exchange.

For the answer to the questions we have just been posing, we must look at our foreign trade from the standpoint not of exports but of imports. In the final analysis, our exports, our surplus production that we can send to foreign shores, represents our own purchasing power in the markets of the world, whether that purchasing power be used to pay off debt, as we have done in the past, or to bring to our homes and factories, as we can now do, those things that we do not naturally possess or which we can obtain abroad more advantageously than we can produce them ourselves.

For example, and at the possible risk of oversimplifying what is really a very complex problem, let us assume that you and I go into the business together of manufacturing automobiles. And suppose that working together we can between us produce three automobiles. Now let us say that you and I each need only one automobile and so we have been spending our energies to produce an extra automobile for which we ourselves have no use. We can sell that automobile to someone else who might give us some shoes and clothing for it, or we can send it to some foreign country where it can be exchanged for coffee, or for some of the manganese that we used in making it, or maybe for some of the fruits that cannot be grown in this climate.

If we send it to the foreign country and do not get something in exchange for it, directly or indirectly, we have just had all our work of building that third automobile for nothing. We have given it away. We might just as well have sent it to the automobile junk yard. We might a great deal better not have wasted our energy making three automobiles instead of two. We have accomplished nothing by exporting our surplus except to deceive ourselves for a while into the belief that we are businessmen engaged in the export trade.

This crude illustration of the relation between imports and exports might be expanded indefinitely. The fundamental fact is that our real interest lies in our imports; that our exports represent our international pocketbook out of which we buy in the markets of the world. If we try to build up an export trade in any other way, we shall find ourselves giving away our third automobile and getting nothing for it.

Every time milady buys a pair of silk stockings (Chinese silk hereafter) she not only feels and looks the better for it—she actually helps to keep some American steel mill or typewriter factory busy; she helps some foreigner to buy our wheat. When she buys coffee, tea, bananas, or pineapples for the family table, she does the same thing. Her husband's suit of Harris tweed, or his overcoat, woven in a New England mill from Australian wool, adds its bit to our volume of imports and makes it possible to dispose of just that much more in our export trade. Tea and coffee, wines, cocoa and chocolate, sugar, spices, gloves, furs—these are some of the familiar things we buy abroad, and in so doing add to our personal comforts while we are at the same time indirectly helping our own mills and factories and farms to dispose of their surplus production.

There are other things less visible to the average man on the street or to the busy housewife—tin, copper, manganese, bauxite, hardwoods, copra, and a large proportion of our nitrates. All of these things are the currency with which the nations that produce them are able to buy our American goods and produce.

Not only must we accept that currency, not only must we be willing to import foreign goods in payment for our own exports—if we are to have a healthy and expanding export trade, we must have an expanding import trade—we must have, that is to say, expanding two-way commerce.

It is hardly necessary to argue before this group that this country should produce for export. Every alive American wants to see our factories and our farms producing more than we need for our own consumption. Full employment of our great productive capacity is necessary to prosperity here at home. Unless we are to live in an economy of permanent depression, therefore, we shall have goods for export, great quantities of goods. We can find prosperity in our exports if we are paid for them. We shall end up in national impoverishment if we are not paid for them. An expanding export trade, therefore, means an expanding import trade. In other words, it means expanding our business with the other nations of the world.

Now business does not grow just by sitting down and waiting for it to do so. No American manufacturer or merchant would last long among his competitors if he followed such a business policy. We cannot last long in world commerce if we just wait for it to come our way.

If we look forward nationally to an expanding economy, to the building up of our commercial relations with other nations, to the buying of their products whenever, wherever, and to the extent that our own welfare demands, then we must think of our foreign trade as a great, world-wide, commercial undertaking, involving the judicious use of our exports to pay for wise purchase of imports, and the building up of this volume of trade by every available means, just as any company engaged in domestic business seeks by every available means to build up its volume.

It is from this standpoint of an expanding international trade that we should examine the function of our merchant marine and determine our national policy with respect to it.

This war has brought home to our people a realization of the existence and importance of other lands and nations concerning which we had but a hazy idea. China now looms up as a country with a future as well as a past. India, with all its difficult problems, must some day join more fully in the upward movement of mankind. Russia, emerging from the bloody era of revolution, is in all probability on the verge of a great period of development during which its people will continue to create for themselves and to extract from their soil and mines those necessities and finally those luxuries that we enjoy. A great group of nations, historically old but economically in their childhood, lies between Russia and India. Africa is just in process of being discovered by the American businessman. And south of us lie the great areas of Latin America whose people within the last decade or so have themselves begun to bring toward fruition the great resources of their lands.

If we are to direct our national policy to the building up of trade among the nations of the world, we must develop to the fullest possible extent every implement that can be made effective. Particularly with respect to the undeveloped nations must we be able to offer all the facilities for doing business. We must produce the goods needed by them, to use as our purchasing power. We must furnish engineering services, assisting in the design and construction of roads, factories, mines, and public works. We must offer banking facilities, both for current needs and for long-term investment. And we must establish and maintain means for overseas transportation, both in the air and waterborne.

Particularly must we establish and maintain the organization throughout the world that is necessary to the operation of a merchant marine and that serves as our intimate commercial contact with the commerce of the world. For a merchant marine consists not only of ships but of men—men on the ships and men ashore; agents and representatives and offices, whose business it is to build business.

If there is any one lesson to be learned from the effective way that other maritime nations, particularly the British and the Germans, have used their ships and their shipping organization to foster trade and to divert it into their own commercial channels, it is the lesson that we cannot afford to turn our international delivery system over, lock, stock, and barrel, to competitor nations. While we cannot attempt to monopolize the business of overseas transportation, no matter how many ships we may have available for such use, we must work out, with reasonable regard to the legitimate interests of other maritime powers, a rational and sound policy for our merchant marine that will be an integral part of our world-wide commercial policy that will serve as a positive and constructive element in building up our foreign trade, both export and import.

How can the merchant marine be made to serve and make possible an expanding foreign trade? The answer does not lie in any jingo waving of the flag. However, our pride may swell when the Stars and Stripes are seen floating from the ensign staffs of American ships in foreign ports, it is not upon any idea of merely creating prestige that our merchant marine must rest.

The task of prime importance to be performed by our merchant ships is definite and important. It is to provide, year in and year out, dependable and efficient service upon regular schedule covering all trade routes throughout the world that are necessary to the handling of our foreign trade, both exports and imports. This means maintaining services that were in existence before the war, improving some of them with new and better and perhaps more ships, and it very definitely means the establishment of new routes and services where trade is in prospect and where the development of our foreign commerce in the broader aspect that has been emphasized requires that such services be made available. Moreover, it means the close integration of ships and airplanes so that our merchant marine may have available at the command of our commerce combined facilities for world-wide overseas transportation on the surface and in the air.

This establishment of shipping services cannot always be left to the course of nature. Our shipping facilities must in many instances be established in advance of adequate trade for their support, just as our railroads pioneered our domestic development. If our commerce is to be an expanding one, if we are to seek out those things that will add to our American welfare and bring them to our shores, and if we are to export our excess products in payment for these incoming necessities and luxuries, we must envision the whole problem and look upon our merchant marine as a very necessary means to an end.

It will cost us something to do this. But the cost must be regarded as a necessary part of our commercial overhead. No one, not even an economist, would attempt to argue, with respect to domestic business, that every expenditure necessary to such business must stand on its own feet. Our great department stores have almost without exception found it good business to maintain their own fleets of delivery trucks. Doubtless many such businesses could effect apparent savings by having some trucking company make deliveries for them; some have done so. But in general volume of business is helped by accepting this expense of house-operated trucks because the customer can be better served. Our dairy companies and our laundries have found it good business to keep their contact with their customers through their milk and laundry routes.

That it often pays to spend a dollar in the interest of increasing volume is amply borne out by American experience with advertising. In like manner, a dollar spent in carrying our foreign trade, if it be spent constructively, may produce many dollars of increased volume.

Our merchant marine is or can be our great international delivery system. It is more than a delivery system, just as the laundryman is more than a carrier of shirts and collars. The operators of ships have offices and organizations throughout the world. They are live businessmen, business builders. They are as keen to develop imports as they are to deliver exports. They seek to build up business coming and going, to be carried in their ships. These men, these organizations that operate our merchant ships not only run our delivery system, they are our go-getters.

We have been developing commercially our good-neighbor policy in South America. We have been doing it with American ships. It could not have been done by employing the English or the Norwegians, the Danes or the Greeks to do it for us, no matter how cheaply they might run their ships.

Before the war broke out in Europe American shipping people were building up a previously nonexistent import trade from the Baltic. The imports they developed increased our exports. They did it with American ships. It could not have been done by foreigners who had very different interests to serve.

We are on the threshold of vast opportunities and vast responsibilities in the Far East, especially in China. Are we to meet those opportunities and those responsibilities by turning over our proxy to our competitors? Or are we to send American goods on American ships through American organizations who will develop the possibilities, many of them latent, for imports to pay our American farmers and workmen for the goods they send abroad?

This matter of an adequate merchant marine really to serve our foreign commerce can be a very vital one.

The effective use of our merchant ships and shipping organizations as an instrument of an expanding commerce has a much closer relation to our future national prosperity than many of our people realize.

You gentlemen, who handle so much of our foreign trade, who direct so much of its movement, and who are so much closer to our problems of export and import than is the average man on the street, have, I believe, a correspondingly great responsibility to your fellow citizens. You can see and understand the problems of our foreign commerce as national problems.

You have a great opportunity for constructive leadership in this great field. If our future place in world commerce is to be based upon a broad understanding of its problems and its possibilities, it will need such leadership. Our merchant marine is a tool for use in creating the basis of national prosperity. It is only part of the whole kit of tools that the builders of our future world trade must use. It is, perhaps, the most important tool and, perhaps also, the tool whose usefulness is least understood by the average American businessman.

Our business leaders are today studying the post-war problem in all its aspects with courage and with vision. You export managers have a major role to perform in recreating a healthy domestic and international trade. Much will depend on how you, yourselves, utilize the American merchant marine as an instrument of American commerce.

The Republican Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by former Gov. Alf M. Landon at the Republican State convention held at Topeka, Kans., on March 31, 1944, the title of his address being "The Republican Job."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A political campaign in the midst of war raises many difficult and perplexing problems for the citizens, press, and politicians alike. It is an abnormal condition. Bad news is kept from the public. Therefore, doubt and apprehension are fermenting.

The press and the radio are under self-imposed censorship. In modern all-out war to a certain extent, they become an arm of the Government. We Americans understand that the Government is not the same as the administration in power. The matter of freedom of speech and freedom of the press is especially important in a campaign that may establish the foreign custom of a life term for our Presidents. It may be difficult for other nations to grasp the distinction. But here in America we have developed the ability to change leaders and at the same time support the Government.

The British have worked out a similarly effective system. They describe the opposition to the administration in power as "loyal to King and country" whose very loyalty compels their opposition to what they conceived to be the blunders and the dangerous mistakes of the administration.

Here in America the administration in power must stand or fall on its record. Therefore, it is the particular function of whatever party happens to be in the minority to tell the people the truth, even when the picture is not as rosy as the administration would have the people believe.

Now, with our country at war, we must guard against unreasonably inflaming public opinion by flinging about loose abuse, even though candidate Roosevelt has not observed that principle and in his recent veto messages to the Congress, resorts to his customary tactics of giving the country something to hate. Two wrongs do not make a right. In peacetime such tactics—which are the first principles for leadership of the mob—are bad enough, but in war they are reprehensible. In a time of immediate national danger, the President should lead the way in setting the example of mutual political forebearance. Instead, he attacks the good faith and distorts the motives of the Congress.

The Washington reporters almost unanimously credited the wording of the President's recent veto messages to his deliberate attempt to lay an emotional basis for his 1944 campaign of "hate" against the Congress.

That is a much more serious situation for the country than his emotional campaign of hate against Mr. Hoover or against the economic royalists and tories, etc. There is no surer way to help the enemy than for a commander in chief to stir up factional hate in the rear of his country's armies.

The President reveals with the utmost nakedness, in his fourth-term-campaign strategy, both his secret antipathy for our system of government and his ruthless determination to use any means, regardless of the country's welfare, to establish himself in the White House for life.

He has done that so brazenly, so contemptuously, and so ruthlessly that his own personally selected party leaders have revolted, one after another.

It is true the President backed away temporarily from the most recent fight and sent his Senate leader a telegram that he didn't mean to impugn the motives of the Congress. But it gave the American people a prophetic warning that if they continue a leadership in the White House that has created a hostile Congress they will by their own apathy and complacency be contributing to a break-down of government itself.

The battle for power between the President and Congress is a crucial contest and one that has far-reaching implications.

Power in government, business, or labor never must be too greatly centralized. In the roaring twenties there was too much power in Wall Street. Business was too greatly centralized. It was right that this power was dispersed.

But today in our Government there is rapidly developing a centralization of all power, politics, business, and labor in the hands of one man. This is abhorrent to our philosophy of government.

That is the real meaning of the struggle now going on between Congress and the President. Even now the palace guard is preparing the way to continue the Roosevelt dynasty in office for 16 years.

Devious are the ways of a President who would perpetuate himself in office. Men in Congress who become puppets of the President when they are defeated in election know they will be appointed to lucrative Federal jobs. In the last 11 years there has been such a gathering of "lame ducks" in Washington jobs that it is little wonder we have a quack administration.

This process of rewarding faithful puppets is one that will break down any democracy so long as the Executive is kept in power indefinitely.

Now, the President insists on fully and completely taking away the purse strings from Congress. Already Congress has given him billions in blank checks. Yet the President's quest for power is insatiable, just as men possessed of wealth are never satisfied. Both must be checked and held in restraint.

Those American patriots of colonial days, Jefferson, Madison, Washington, Hamilton, and Franklin, who helped to chart the American way, realized that our Government would need checks and balances—hence the three coordinate departments, with none supreme in itself. They had studied history and they sought to guard against the cruelties they and their fathers and their fathers' fathers had experienced.

As far back in time as man's action is lighted in the pages of history are the signs for those who will heed. Daniel in Holy Scripture tells us: "I saw, and, behold a tree in the midst of the earth, and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth; the leaves thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all; the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it."

If a country or a nation is to be as a tree by the living water and it is to be fruitful there must be a balance with branches great and strong enough to hold the fruit. When the tree or nation becomes all trunk the tree dies—so it is with nations.

It is absolutely essential under our system of government that the Chief Executive of the Nation and the Congress work together just as it is for a Governor and his legislature to work together. On the farm when we have a headstrong horse, that won't team up, we swap him off. That is what we are going to do next November with candidate Roosevelt.

It is of the utmost importance for the American people to correct the dangerous and unprecedented strife, now existing between the Congress and the President. Such discord between these two important branches is interfering with the transaction of the Nation's business.

It will gravely imperil the national welfare in the coming 4 years of war, peace settlements, and reconstruction to be subjected to a President who demands either a rubber-stamp Congress or is in conflict with it. That is another factor in the conflicting and confusing babble of voices, weakening our leadership in the world. Arthur Krock, within the last few days said: "For the first time since the war began, in the entourages of Allied diplomatic and military missions to Washington, the observation was heard that maybe it would be more serviceable to the cause of the United Nations if the 1944 American elections should produce a President and Congress in political harmony, even if that President were not Mr. Roosevelt."

It is a fortunate circumstance that an election occurs this year. It gives the voters an opportunity to correct that intolerable situation. They will bring into the White House a new leader with the ability to give the required measure of direction with due respect for and cooperation with the able, hard-working, experienced Members of the Congress.

That is not a matter of party. It is a well-known fact in Washington that the feeling toward the administration's blunders and wasteful policies is as bitter on the Democratic side as it is on the Republican side.

The President has repeatedly expanded and enlarged upon the powers delegated to him. Congress now fears to trust him any longer, and therein the representatives of the people reflect the fears of their constituents.

It is essential to have in the White House at all tims a President whom the Congress can trust. It is imperative now. It is impossible to get a wholly new Congress at one election. Therefore, we must either elect another President, abandon our system of government with its divided responsibility, or face a break-down in our national administration.

The President has now abandoned the New Deal label. There is no longer anyone to claim this doorstep baby, except HENRY WALLACE. The life-term candidate clings to no lasting principles of government or truth. He changes with the shifting winds of public opinion. He is ready to alter his window dressing from day to day with the shifts of public taste, from the left to the right.

Today he is seeking to restyle himself as a great conservative. He is shoving Baruch and Jesse Jones, Clayton and Crowley, to the foreground, hoping they will make the public forget Henry Wallace, Milo Perkins, Tugwell, "Harry the Hop," "Henry the Morg," and "Sammy the Rose."

Someone is being sold down the river.

God forbid that our post-war reconstruction should be handled by the "palace guard." Neither do I want to see it in the hands of big business and speculative finance. I want to see it administered by practical progressives.

The temporarily ostracized new dealers are assuring themselves that the competent, able, but conservative administrators are simply decoys intended for campaign expediency in catching the sucker vote.

We have no outright statement as to what policies the administration intends to put into effect to facilitate our conversion to peacetime basis.

To obtain true knowledge of facts in war is difficult. Therefore, we are entitled to place our own interpretations on as much of the record as is available. To do anything less would be contributing to a dangerous lethargy of national spirit. Therefore, by the very nature of the times, criticism becomes constructive. The reports of the congressional committees and the speeches by Republican leaders have been of the greatest value in correcting waste and inefficiency in the conduct of the war.

With the country facing debt and exhaustion, the administration in Washington continues profligate spending of public funds and will continue until we change horses, as England did when Chamberlain was dropped.

When the facts are uncovered, I say there will be found exorbitant and pure waste in the handling of lease-lend.

In the early days of the Roosevelt administration when it was scattering money to the winds with its pump-priming claptrap, if you dared criticize waste of public money, some crackpot would ask in a horror-stricken voice, "Do you propose to let people starve?"

Today, if you dare criticize the same wanton waste, the same disregard of the "silly old dollar sign," to quote the President, you are interfering with the good-neighbor policy, which incidentally does not seem to be working so effectively. Lest I be accused of being prejudiced, let me quote from an article by Sumner Wells, until recently Under Secretary of State: "To those of us who are convinced that the security and progress of the Americas depend upon the maintenance of inter-American solidarity, steps taken recently by the Department of State are profoundly disturbing. * * * What is happening may well bring once more into being conflicting blocks within the American family of nations—a calamity which has been avoided more than 10 years."

Unless you believe in the New Deal theory, that waste is a virtue, you are smeared as indifferent to all moral and patriotic considerations. By such tactics, men who are familiar with the scandalous waste going on in lease-lend operations, are intimidated from revealing the facts.

But we do not need to go as far away from home as lend-lease to see wanton and reckless waste of public moneys. It is visible to every eye. And again lest I be accused of being a wee mite prejudiced, let me quote from the junior United States Senator from Virginia, HARRY BYRD. This great Democrat says: "At the close of 1942 the Byrd committee, after an exhaustive inquiry into recent bureaucratic expansion, reported to the Senate: 'It can be said unequivocally that our own Government is the chief offender in the entire country from the standpoint of wasting and hoarding manpower. The statement may be made advisedly that at no time in history has there been so much waste, so much inefficiency as now exists in the multitude of bureaus which sap the strength of our Nation.'"

It is an outrageous performance to subsidize mining companies one way or another for the production of copper, zinc, and lead, beyond our war requirements. It's a waste of manpower, when we already have ample stock piles for our war needs, to continue to build them still larger.

There is a long list of vital and important matters on which the American people are being kept in the dark.

We know nothing about the present post-war agricultural policies. The New Deal record is zero as far as curing of the unhealthy and distressing situation of 1,234,000 farm families with an income before the war of less than $250 per year. The Republican Party must not allow that big group to fall back into such a sub-existence level after the war.

In agriculture after we were in war, when all-out production was demanded of industry, administration edicts still forced millions of idle acres. We were in the war over a year before the administration policies permitted unrestricted seeding of wheat and all-out production of other agricultural products. Yet during that same period, the President was calling the farmers a lot of uncomplimentary names for not making greater efforts to produce more food.

There are limiting factors in the production of foods other than the triple-A restrictions on the farmers the first year of the war. There was the confused and muddled handling of manpower. It took the President over a year to decide who was going to administer the question of deferment of essential workers. Even now the reports show they haven't yet decided how to do it. And in addition to the muddling of manpower, there comes the question of the physical facilities needed for all-out production. Government red tape in this field has delayed production in thousands of cases. Requests for priorities on new equipment or for repairs are passed from one agency to another and it frequently requires many months, and sometimes almost a congressional investigation to overcome the bureaucratic inertia, and secure action.

Another matter we are in the dark about is our foreign policies. Also according to news reports, our allies are as much puzzled as we are. If the President had grasped his opportunity, he could have made an epochal contribution to building a stable world that would have answered the age-old longing in the hearts of mankind for peace forevermore. Instead, he indulged in a lot of "hallelujah" shouting and impulsive off-hand comments that discredited American leadership. No one is left to do honor to the Atlantic Charter.

In 1936 I said, "The conduct of foreign relations was placed by the Constitution in the hands of the President. The policies are his." But in my judgment, those Presidents have been well advised who have made it their practice not only to consult the Department of State, and the majority members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but the minority members as well.

The carrying out of these policies, the actual negotiating is done by the Secretary of State. This is because in the eyes of the outside world the President's decision is final. In consequence, if the President talks directly with foreign officials any careless remark may lead to international misunderstandings. As Mr. Coolidge once said: "One of the first lessons a President has to learn is that every word he says weighs a ton."

The wisdom of that policy is clearly demonstrated by the world-wide shock of the President's announcement in an off-hand reply to a question in a press conference—that he intended to turn over one-third of the Italian fleet to Russia. Now the New Deal writers are busy with all kinds of rumors and reports in the attempt to "cover up" for the President. When the storm broke, the President claimed he wasn't quoted correctly and that he said "one-third or its equivalent."

Well, Where does the equivalent come from? Is it from the American Navy as is being intimated?

Regardless of what he meant, this is just a dangerous repetition in foreign affairs of a frequent occurrence in domestic affairs, in the history of the Roosevelt dynasty. It is a matter of common knowledge that the President's frequent off-hand comments in press conferences were a shock to recovery of the country before the war and to an efficient administration of our national affairs.

The Secretary of State and the Secretary of War advised the Congress that the Zionist resolution pending in the United States Senate, was a threat to our national interests. A few days later the President played politics with the subject. Who is right? Is the President willing to sacrifice the conception of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War of our national interest on the altar of his fourth-term candidacy? What a spectacle this administration is making before the world! No wonder our foreign relations are in as bad a mess as our domestic affairs. The sin, the shame of it all, is that fourth-term political timidity is causing us to lose our great prestige and isolate ourselves from the opportunity to throw our influence behind a lasting peace.

We are drifting into imperialism or isolationism or a vicious combination of both, in foreign affairs. The quarterback theory of the President is as destructive in the foreign field as it was in the domestic field. The sudden shifts for which Candidate Roosevelt is notorious, simply have been a tremendous millstone around the neck of Uncle Sam, both at home and abroad.

We see the same babble of voices confusing our foreign relations that confused our domestic relations. As a result of the President's off-hand comments, the confusion between Government agencies, and the vagueness of their policies affecting our foreign relations, our war efforts are weakened.

The ballyhoo that surrounded the President's return from Teheran is almost unpleasantly reminiscent of Dr. Cook's return from the North Pole.

So much for a brief summary of some of the important and vital parts of the record of Candidate Roosevelt.

Now in contrast, What is the Republican position?

In the first place, it is almost impossible for the minority party—and the Republicans are in the minority in both the House and the Senate—to make much of a record. If a Republican Member of the Congress offers constructive legislation that strikes a popular note, his proposal is never passed under his name. Some Democratic committee chairman will change it slightly and introduce it under his own name or as a committee bill. That is the custom whatever party is in power.

But even so the Republican leadership in the Congress is not passively waiting to simply drift into power.

Under the able and far-sighted Republican leader representative, JOSEPH W. MARTIN, committees composed of Members of the National House of Representatives, have been appointed on the most vital questions of taxation, post-war conditions, food, and powers of the President.

Republican National Chairman Spangler has not been content to simply perfect a party organization for the next campaign. He has seized time by the forelock and named committees composed of Republican Governors and Members of the Congress, to prepare for post-war legislation on many vital subjects. Here are some of them:

1. Foreign policy and international relations.
2. Post-war enterprise, industry, and employment.
3. Social welfare and security.
4. Finance, taxation, and money.
5. Reform of Government administration.
6. Labor.
7. Agriculture.
8. International economic problems.

Therefore, we are boldly preparing to meet our responsibilities. There are two essentials that the Republican Party must meet in order to justify the confidence of the American people in the coming election.

1. We must have a platform that is definite, unequivocal, courageous, and forward looking. It seems to me it must include as its minimum requirements:

(A) An assurance that we will exert every effort toward the war. No temporary political expedience will be permitted to jeopardize or delay 1 hour, the winning of the war.

(B) Definite plans for reconversion from war to peace, and for returning soldiers and sailors. A blueprint for free industry and not a socialistic state so that business men are assured of a fair profit, labor will be assured full employment, good pay, and higher standards of living and farmers are assured of a better price for their crops.

This will include a simplification of our tax structure to enable all taxpayers to know what they will be called upon to pay, eliminate the need for a lawyer and an accountant to help prepare every tax return and also to restore once again an incentive for idle capital to found new businesses, new industries, and create new jobs.

Most important of all is the removal of ancient artificial barriers that restrict the free flow of commerce at home and abroad.

(C) Broadly speaking, the American people are all of the same mind. The war and the way to lasting peace must be pursued with unrelenting vigor. Because Candidate Roosevelt has struck out is no reason we should give up hope of building a stable, prosperous, and peaceful world.

2. The second essential for confidence in the Republican Party is the choice of a candidate who can bring some order into the war effort and to the peace to follow.

In order to command confidence abroad, and at home, our candidate must—

(A) Be able to inspire trust at home and abroad in his ability to do teamwork with the Congress. Any Government is weakened without the whole-hearted cooperation of the legislative representatives of the people.

(B) Command overwhelming confidence in his determination and ability to end promptly the confusion of red tape, bureaumade laws, bureaucratic control of business, farming, and labor that are interfering with our war efforts. After all, the greatest reform we need in America today is in the matter of administrative efficiency and departmental order in Washington.

(C) By meeting these two essentials of platform and candidate honestly, openly, and with our eyes on the future, the Republican Party will justify the confidence which has been manifested in the recent elections in all parts of the country. We will provide an agency for good government to the vast majority of the people who are nauseated with the repudiation of American traditions under the New Deal and insure the election of a national administration which will lead us to new and undreamed-of prosperity and lasting peace.

Views of Former Governor Cox on Peace League

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an Associated Press dispatch including an interview with the Honorable James M. Cox, former Governor of Ohio.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COX URGES UNITED STATES TO JOIN WORLD PEACE LEAGUE—CALLS WILSON'S FOREBODINGS A PROPHECY FULFILLED—ASSAILS ROOSEVELT CRITICS

MIAMI, FLA., March 31.—James M. Cox, former Governor of Ohio and Democratic nominee for the Presidency in 1920, when Franklin D. Roosevelt was his running mate, said today in an appeal for United States adherence to a world organization such as the League of Nations that "the star that Woodrow Wilson followed is still my light and guide."

Supporting the league as an instrument of peace, now as in 1920, Mr. Cox, 74 years old today, said that President Wilson "warned us in words that are now prophecy fulfilled. I cannot believe, following these years of torment and suffering that a civilized world will permit to be destroyed the noblest project conceived by mankind. Nor can there be in the face of our tragic history, another triumph in this country for a political cabal such as blasted our hopes a quarter of a century ago. But there is a task to be completed first. We cannot insure the future without first dealing with the present.

HOME FRONT SEEN LAX

"There is much to be done at home," Mr. Cox said, "and the gravity and extent of the things to be done here will become more apparent with each day. I wish I had the facility to tie thought into phrase in such a way as to convey to all of us what is deep rooted in the minds and the souls of the brave men and women on the battle fronts. We have not been as faithful to our defenders as they have been to us. There are countless numbers of individual exceptions, but by and large we can't be proud of ourselves.

"We have feasted so long at the table of the gods that we cease to regard our fortune as a gift but take it rather as a right. When emergency compels any trespass upon our bounty, we do not respond with our better selves. We complain and criticize. As our comforts and conveniences are disturbed, demagogs try to take our minds from the Nation's great achievements of war to things so little and so relatively unimportant that we should reproach ourselves for even thinking of them. This leads us nag and hamper our leaders with energies that might better be employed against the enemy.

HITS ARM-CHAIR GENERALS

"Thousands of us presume to know more about the direction of armies than General Marshall and of naval strategy than Admiral King. We should long ago have learned the dangers of such back-seat driving. Our assumption of superior knowledge runs in other directions too. We are reading in the press and hearing over the radio a continuing inquiry into the necessary secrets of the war movement. What went on at the conferences at Cairo and Teheran? What did Roosevelt say to Stalin? What did Stalin say to Churchill? and so on and on. A man from Mars might easily assume that we think these leaders are stupid or unfaithful when the facts are obviously otherwise.

"We need to remember that a very delicate situation existed with respect to the relations among our allies. Russia trusted no one because no one trusted Russia. We have advanced far from that state of things, and can anyone deny the vast military advantages that have accrued from the agreements which have been reached? There will doubtless be future differences to adjust but I have never known a personal quarrel to be bettered by neighborhood meddling. Too many editors, columnists, and commentators demand the details of the most confidential situation. What could they do about it if they knew? There would be wide differences of opinion not only as among them but their readers and hearers as well. There would be no agreement, no solution, only worse confusion. We must trust our leaders. A million commanders cannot win a war."

Reorganization of Congress

OF

HON. FRANCIS MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Streamlining Congress," which appeared in the Easton (Pa.) Express.

At the same time I should like to call the attention of the Senate to Senate Concurrent Resolution 23, which makes provision for the appointment of a joint committee on the organization of the Congress, and which is now before the Rules Committee of the Senate.

I should also like unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Self-Rescue," which appeared in the News of Greensboro, N. C. This editorial also deals with the very urgent need of a reorganization of Congress.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Easton (Pa.) Express]

STREAMLINING CONGRESS

Certain indexes warrant the hope that Congress is beginning to be apprehensive of the growing discontent of the public with the cumbersome procedures of that body in thwarting instead of promoting the public will and the public good in many instances.

Senator TAFT, of Ohio, and Senator DANAHER, of Connecticut, Republicans, have envisioned the reorganization of the Congress by the Republicans in January—if their hopes are achieved in the November election—and have promised some of the cobwebs will be wiped off the slow, old-fashioned machinery of Congress.

Two streamlining proposals are now before the Senate Rules Committee. Senator MALONEY, of Connecticut, Democrat, has proposed a committee of 12 Senate and House Members be set up to recommend modernization. Senator LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, Progressive, would abolish 20 of the 33 standing committees of the Senate and limit Senators to membership on only one major committee.

Even these small tentative suggestions give hope that some Congressmen are alert to the fact, which is glaring to all outsiders, that present congressional machinery is outmoded, cumbersome, slow, and actually dangerous in a time of great stress and strain when speed and action spell success and lack of them means failure.

What about the seniority rule? That antiquated and anachronistic custom that elevates political hacks to places of prominence and leadership for which they are ill-fitted because they happen to hold on to their seats a long time should be shoved overboard when at last Congress creaks around to housecleaning.

[From the Greensboro (N. C.) News of March 23, 1944]

SELF-RESCUE

Revelation that Congress is devoting serious study to the overhauling of its own structure, procedure, and operating methods is welcome news. Here is a field which is loaded with possibilities for greater understanding and cooperation between the legislative and executive and for modification, if not elimination, of the causes for much of the growing criticism which is delivered against the former branch of the Government.

In contrast to the talk that constitutional changes affecting the form of our Government should be made to remove existing deficiencies, especially as relating to deadlocks and delays, it is meet to remember that the Constitution itself, while setting up the governmental structure and staking out the bounds of each branch of the Government, leaves to the Congress the filling out of the details of its own organization and procedure. The set-up of congressional committees, seniority and other rules, and the great body of precedents and prerogatives represent the decisions and the formulations of the Congress itself. It thus becomes increasingly incumbent upon the legislative to examine this body of rules, regulations, and practices—its whole machinery—to determine whether they have outgrown their usefulness and injure or retard rather than aid the common weal.

A certain amount of cumbersomeness will always be necessary in the democratic process and will doubtless serve the public interest as a safeguard against undue haste or ill-advised action. But it is our considered opinion that an overhauling of this machinery is long overdue and that Congress itself faces a grave share of the responsibility for the popular disfavor into which it has, like it or not, fallen. It devolves upon the legislative branch, still the very crux of our democratic system, to take the initiative in rescuing itself. In fact, no other agency can.

Our Irresponsible Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Our Irresponsible Government," by Charles A. Beard, published in the Progressive of March 6, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR IRRESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT

(By Charles A. Beard)

Two things the American people have long taken for granted, like the air they breathe: the liberties and the rights of self-government which they enjoy under the constitutional system of the United States. They have seemed to imagine that no matter what they think, say, and do, these liberties and rights will endure forever, like the hills and the stars.

Yet they have, within the past 25 years, witnessed the destruction of civil liberties and the collapse of popular governments far and wide over the surface of the earth. They have seen parliament after parliament paralyzed by incapacity to legislate and control executive aggression, and then either disappear entirely or sink into utter futility.

They have seen great nations disgusted by factionalism and negationism in legislative chambers and willing to surrender to demagogs prepared to promise them peace, action, and security.

Is it possible that the American people actually regard themselves as utterly and forever immune to the calamities which have marked the march of despotism in Europe and Asia?

Is it possible that the Congress and President of the United States can pursue unscathed in the coming half century the methods they have followed during the past 25 years? Are they prepared by organization, procedure, knowledge, and spirit to cope successfully with the pressing and complicated issues of government already crowding in upon them—issues almost certain to become more pressing and more complicated in the years immediately ahead?

THREE SLEEPING RESOLUTIONS

That a few Members of the present Congress are disturbed by such questions is made evident in three resolutions which have been introduced since it opened in January 1943.

The first is a proposal by Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr., Wisconsin Progressive, for reducing and streamlining the committees of the Senate in the interest of a more efficient transaction of public business.

The second is a resolution introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative ESTES KEFAUVER to amend the rules in such a way as to make it possible for the House to invite heads of departments and independent agencies to report and answer questions on the floor of the House.

The third is a joint resolution sponsored by Representative MONRONEY and Senator MALONEY, which calls for the creation of a joint committee empowered to investigate and report on the whole problem of efficient congressional procedure and efficient methods for conducting the relations between Congress and the President.

But at the moment these resolutions seem to be sleeping in committee rooms and there are few overt signs that a majority of Senators and Representatives are looking beyond their noses in this respect or ever dream that the deluge may come in their own time, instead of after they are safely interred in their graves.

After all, aren't they working hard in committees, answering letters and telephone calls, running errands for constituents, making speeches on the floor, talking fast and furiously in cloakrooms and caucuses, and answering back when the President tells them that they are trying to commit a fraud on the people of the United States? Yes. But is that enough?

Meanwhile questions asked in Congress and by citizens seeking information concerning their government remain unanswered. Meanwhile, save on rare occasions, debates in the House and Senate are as desultory as ever, grave issues continue to be undefined, to say nothing of joined, and an air of irresponsibility seems to hang thickly over the Capitol Hill as well as the White House.

Now, exact information and a sense of responsibility on the part of public authorities are certainly indispensabe to the conduct and maintenance of constitutional government, at least in the long run. Surely none will deny the essential truth of this proposition. Nevertheless it is repeatedly flouted in Congress and by the President.

In order to make this point clear and explicit, let us take a single illustration out of the many available to anybody who studies and observes the transaction of public business in Washington.

On November 26, 1943, Senator HUGH A. BUTLER of Nebraska made a report to the Senate on our financial operations in Latin America. Now, I do not know Senator BUTLER. Nor do I pretend to judge here the merits of his argument or the case he raised, although I have probably given more time to the matter than the average busy American citizen. Nor do I here pass upon the motives of Senator BUTLER or his critics. All I want to do is to call attention to the way in which a piece of public business is handled in Washington.

In the course of his report, Senator BUTLER stated: "Our actual expenditures, commitments, and extensions of credit in or for Latin America during the 3 years, 1942, 1943, 1944 total more than $6,000,000,000." The Senator went on to say that a considerable part of this money was being spent in ways that did not advance good relations between the United States and Latin America.

ALL IS CONFUSION

Leaving out of account the rhetoric of the business, there stands the Senator's statement about the $6,000,000,000. Surely Congress and the people have a right to know whether the figure is approximately true or is grotesquely false.

The Constitution provides explicitly: "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time." Since no military secrets were involved in the mere fact of the $6,000,000,000, Congress and the people were entitled to know about it. Well, what did they learn?

According to the Associated Press, Nelson Rockefeller issued a statement as follows: "Spending and commitments to spend in Latin America in the last 3 years by all Government agencies, including military and naval installations, total less than $6,000,000,000." In other words, it seemed that Senator BUTLER was 10 times wrong, absurdly wrong.

On the same day, Senator MCKELLAR, acting chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, who, if anybody, might be supposed to know, declared cautiously: "If I understand correctly, $2,207,000,000 is all that has been spent down there for every purpose, including the purchase of war materials." So it looked for a moment as if Senator BUTLER was either careless or frightfully ignorant, and trying to make trouble for the administration. Either that or the three gentlemen did not know what they were talking about or were talking through their hats.

In any event that queer bird known as John Q. Citizen, who has to pay taxes to meet the bill whatever it is, must have felt more cross-eyed than ever. For his edification, newspapers, magazines, and columnists poured out ink like cuttlefish, making the air thicker than a London fog. After reading a bale of clippings I felt like old Ben Turpin himself, and awaited more enlightenment.

On January 20, 1944, Senator BUTLER opened up again. He presented to the Senate a long and detailed schedule, checked by certified public accounts and citing the documentary sources of each major item. According to this schedule, the total figure in the case in question was $5,733,953,534, as far as independent Latin American countries alone were concerned. That is not far from the original claim: $6,000,000,000.

Some debate then took place. There seemed to have been some confusion among Senator BUTLER's critics over the period covered. But his figures were not refuted. Senator MCKELLAR, instead of tearing them to pieces and giving the facts if he could, laid special emphasis on the importance of maintaining the good-neighbor policy. Senator BUTLER agreed with him on that policy but wanted to know whether the methods of expenditure pursued were actually doing good or harm.

After Senator BUTLER's new accounting was made public, a person supposed to be speaking for the State Department deplored the incident as injurious to the good-neighbor policy, but did not, perhaps could not, tear into Senator BUTLER's schedule item by item and give the correct total.

The story could be extended indefinitely, but that figure of $6,000,000,000 still remains a mystery.

My point is made. There is something fundamentally wrong and irresponsible in a legislature and an executive department which cannot settle such a question on the basis of positive knowledge within 24 hours. In any efficient and responsible government it could be so settled and would be. No military secrets are involved—just the brute fact of a $6,000,000,000 bill which taxpayers will have to meet or not.

Here the case is rested and I submit to candid readers the proposition that the methods and machinery of the legislative and executive departments at Washington need a drastic overhauling in the interest of safety for constitutional government.

O. P. A. and Common Sense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. CARL ANDERSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, thousands of patriotic Americans have served without pay for long periods on war price and rationing boards. The Nation's debt to these is great. Theirs is today a hard task and in many cases a thankless one.

The following letter by Rev. J. G. Steinmeyer of Pipestone, Minn., to Chester Bowles, Administrator of O. P. A., so vividly portrays the problems facing men such as he that I highly commend it to the attention of the Members of the House.

In his capacity as chairman of the Pipestone County War Price and Rationing Board, Reverend Steinmeyer sees the necessity of rationing and price fixing, but he also can see how it can and is being overdone.

O. P. A. here in Washington would do well to draw on the fund of knowledge gained by many hard months of work by such men. Congress and the Nation would welcome a little more common sense being mixed in with the profound theories of official Washington, theories which when put into practice affect the lives of every American man, woman, and child.

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
WAR PRICE AND RATIONING BOARD, No. 6459,
Pipestone, Minn., March 21, 1944.

Mr. CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator, Office of Price Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOWLES: Replying to a letter submitted to us through the O. P. A. district office, Sioux Falls, S. Dak., in which you ask for a real appraisal of O. P. A.'s faults and virtues, proposing also three direct questions concerning the functions of O. P. A.

We shall try to comply with your request. Our qualifications for such a task have well-defined limits, but we have grown up with this O. P. A. baby, we have nurtured it through difficult times and, naturally, necessity has compelled us to change diapers at various times, but we believe that we have now developed a rather rugged individual, a little over 2 years old, which we think will live and should be permitted to live. Thus, today we are still on the firing line, daily facing a questioning public. We know the questions, we know the trials, we know the needs, we see some hardships. To you and also to any dissenting Congressman we out in the sticks would say extend the O. P. A., grant the required appropriations. And here is why:

1. Price control: Our citizens are practically unanimous in their opinion that price control stands second only to the military forces in winning this war. Price control must be retained or chaos results. However, the thought is repeatedly expressed that price control should be far more rigid in the matter of commodities directly affecting our living, but that we are wasting time on nonessentials. It certainly can have no bearing on the war effort if the fool and his money are willing to part whenever he finds nonessentials which would add to his delight or pleasure. We would rise up in righteous indignation if we were forced to pay a dollar for a loaf of bread or 25 cents for a bottle of milk; in fact, we would be inclined to do violence to persons suspected of perpetrating such crimes upon a hungry public, but we refuse to get excited when someone with more money than brains is willing and even anxious to pay $150 for a $17 wrist watch; in fact, we could point out many reasons why it would be good that such fools be accommodated in and be assisted in getting rid of their money before more, and perhaps, dangerous harm results. By all means, let's have price control, but let's not get foolish on the things which have no value, and no direct bearing on necessities of life.

2. Rationing: Rationing is a sort of stepchild which has been very hastily tossed into the lap of O. P. A. Dreamers and persons obviously without practical experience have drawn up regulations which reach the very heights of ridiculosity. Even so, we believe that rationing in general has rendered a worth-while service but in the specific items we have the hardships thrust upon us which certainly have been and still are available. We can understand that specific needs differ in various areas, even in the various counties throughout this great Nation; we can quite readily understand that in such instances sauce for the goose may be poison for the gander; we can also understand that we locally are not in a position to obtain a true picture of existing conditions as to available supplies, raw materials, etc., and that we do not have the opportunities to investigate the possibility of industry to manufacture commodities which are apparently becoming scarcer and scarcer. And yet with all these known limitations we shall be glad to answer your inquiry so that you may look at the picture through our eyes, since it is quite true that the dwarf sitting on the giant's shoulder can see farther than the giant. Here, then, are the items with our comment:

A. Gasoline: We have been led to believe that the supply of gasoline for civilian use is dwindling, that the danger is threatening that even the more essential needs may not be met. The thought comes to us repeatedly, and is also expressed by many thoughtful patriotic citizens, that responsible Government agencies have not conscientiously tried to solve this problem. How great is the effort on the part of the Government to encourage any discoveries? What steps have been taken to make full use of existing production facilities? How much additional gasoline could be stored by means of importation? What effect would a price increase to independent producers have on production? We believe that the old trite answer of big companies that they are making too much money is not an acceptable answer when independent companies and small producers are forced out of business. It is our conviction that the Government with its many agencies is in position to know the conditions, and can and must meet this problem.

It is also rather difficult for us to understand why, when and if an emergency exists and our gasoline supplies are threatened, nonessential users are still permitted to use their cars, using up precious gas and oil, and that this class is ever ready to purchase black-market gasoline or "to borrow" enormous quantities of the farmers' tractor barrel.

We believe that the reduction of the value of A coupons, from 3 to 2 gallons a week, is a step in the right direction; in fact, we see no reason why the value of the A coupon could not be reduced still more, to 1 gallon or even less. Such reduction certainly could have no evil effect on the war effort, as all trades, professions, occupations, and workers essential to the war effort may apply to their local boards for an amount of gasoline actually needed to carry on essential work. Where there is no need, no gas. "Pleasure cars" sounds a bit incongruous, a sort of a jarring note, when our boys and girls by the millions are going through a veritable hell to preserve our liberties and our way of life. We all know that thousands upon thousands of cars with A stickers are rolling up and down the highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the northern borders to the Gulf, with an apparent unlimited supply of gasoline, oftentimes involved in serious accidents, still slaughtering our citizens by the thousands, taking annually a greater toll in lives than any battle fought thus far. Such nonessential vehicles might well be put up for the duration. Tough? My boy, your boy, had no pleasure care at Tarawa, Rabaul, Guadalcanal, or in the European theater, etc. Let's have the gas where it is needed—and let's eliminate the waster. As an afterthought we might add most of these wasters are not old enough to vote.

B. Tires (truck and passenger): Serviceable tires are as essential to this agricultural Midwest as are bullets to our armed forces. The farmers rarely live in cities; the farms are usually quite distant from their trade centers. No transportation facilities are offered them; they must provide for themselves to transport most of their products and needed supplies to and from market. There is no need to kid these people any longer that they are eligible for grade 3 tires. A serviceable grade 3 tire is as extinct as the well-known dodo bird.

We pride ourselves on our tremendous production, justly so; unbelievable records have been established, but must we now admit that we are unable to produce a tire? Do we have reason to believe that the Government and its agencies is letting us down? Are we perhaps correct in our opinion that sluggards are at work? We know that tires can be produced; so let's have tires in place of silly excuses and a ridiculous shifting of responsibility. We are of the opinion that the men are available who know how to produce tires. Failure here is as reprehensible and costly as when a sentry falls asleep on the post of duty.

C. Automobiles: A very scarce article. We believe that all quotas should be held by the district office only; all applications should be sent direct to the district office and could there be reviewed and passed upon as need is indicated throughout the entire district rather than on the basis of a mere local condition.

D. Bicycles: Bicycles no problem, no complaints; dealers appear to have sufficient stocks and applications are very limited.

E. Sugar, particularly canning sugar: The local board's pain and headache. We believe that one or more stamps in war-ration book should be designated to purchase canning sugar to meet the average need; we would suggest 10 pounds. Experience has shown that this system eliminates the necessity of having every prospective canner apply at the rationing board for canning sugar. A large part of our people would have sufficient sugar for their needs and can purchase it whenever they desire. In such areas and communities where home canning is, and has been, done on a larger scale, where people grow their own fruits, local boards should be given full authority to issue sufficient additional canning sugar which would encourage the greatest amount of home canning possible. Experience has shown that the present system, which is being followed again this year, results in too much wastage of home-grown fruits. The district office could, because of their knowledge of local conditions, be relied upon to cooperate with local boards.

There is no need to say anything about the amount of labor saved for local board clerks if the above suggestions could be adopted. We have reason to believe that the average O. P. A. director wouldn't be concerned about this item inasmuch as he is still of the opinion that volunteer workers are still crashing our doors hoping to be able to do something for somebody! To such we would say, "Come and see".

F. Processed foods. Most families in rural districts unable to use up points allotted to them. For them, naturally, rationing of this item is a bit of a nuisance.

G. Meat. Average consumer unable to meet daily needs with present allotment. Unable to make suggestions because of lack of information on the actual condition throughout the country. We have a tremendous supply of meat here.

H. Fuel oil. No problem. Reasonable caution and careful attention to make full use of allotment granted carries the consumer through the season. No suggestions to offer but would let well enough alone.

I. Stoves. Coal and wood heating or cooking stoves should be removed from the ration list. No hoarding or abuse discovered in this item. Would, however, retain all types of fuel oil stoves on ration list because of the tendency, chiefly for reasons of convenience, to convert from coal to oil.

J. Rubber footwear. No problem, no complaint, no suggestions!

K. Shoes. Children's shoes, school shoes, work shoes could be removed from ration list. There has been some dabbling around with these items, leading us to believe that this particular administrator is not acquainted with the situation. Would suggest that these items be rationed only when and if need arises. Quite obviously, there is no hoarding of such items, and under present system, applicants may, although with a great deal of inconvenience to themselves and others, get what they need. Sizable stocks are at hand and this type of shoe is quite generally available.

L. Typewriters. No problem, no complaints, no suggestions.

M. Industrial users. We will pass that by for the moment. This subject is too involved to be covered by one short paragraph in a letter of this kind.

We conclude expressing our thanks and admiration if you have read this letter thus far.

Yours truly,
WAR PRICE AND RATIONING
BOARD No. 6459,
By Rev. J. G. STEINMEYER, Chairman.

Address of Hon. Edward C. Carroll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including in the RECORD excerpts from a speech delivered by Hon. Edward C. Carroll, of South Boston, on the occasion of Evacuation Day exercises held at Dorchester Heights, South Boston, Mass., March 17, 1944. Former State Senator Carroll's address is a powerful presentation of the support and of the intent of the Constitution of the United States:

Friends and neighbors, we are assembled here to do honor to the day we celebrate. However, I sometimes feel we are lax in that all too many people are prone to forget the principles for which our forefathers fought and gave their very blood—on this day—March 17, 1776.

The principle, the Declaration of Independence, was issued out of "a decent respect for the opinion of mankind." It asserted in the opening paragraph that all men are created equal and endowed with certain rights such as life, liberty, freedom to worship God in one's own religion, and the pursuit of happiness, which is the purpose of all free Governments to secure.

We are conscious of the fact that on this March 17, we are at war. Our hearts are filled with prayers for our loved ones in the services of our beloved country, so valiantly fighting for the preservation of the same principles our forefathers fought for.

There is about today a sinister influence that would try to divide us. I speak of that un-American and un-Christian feeling of bigotry and race hatred which is being fostered by a small group, and mind you, I mean a small group. Oh, I say to you, it would be a sad commentary to our honored dead to whom we pay tribute this day and to our brave boys who are out there fighting, if intelligent people fail to rise and stop this cancerous un-American and vicious group which is trying to spread bigotry and race hatred. This country since its founding has been the haven of freedom for millions of persecuted people who become good citizens and helped build their adopted land materially and spirtiually. This has been the American way, thank God.

I was born the son of humble Irish immigrants, who fled from persecution to these very shores, that they might have the right to freedom of speech, to worship their God without molestation. I was taught as a youngster, at the knees of my mother, to love my fellow man, to have no hatred for those of a different race, color, or creed, and to respect other people's religious beliefs, and the laws of our beloved country.

Let us, therefore be determined to keep faith with our honored dead and our boys now fighting, and resolve as American citizens to protect our Constitution guaranteeing any person, be he Jew, Protestant, or Catholic, the right to religious freedom and the pursuit of happiness.

Day of Prayer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution providing for the designation of a national day of prayer, Sunday, May 21, 1944:

Whereas the Protestant Chaplains Association, Inc., a national organization of Protestant clergymen founded in 1938, and dedicated to God and country, and to the welfare of the men and women of the armed forces of these United States, to the rehabilitation of all our veterans upon their return to civilian life, is asking that Sunday, May 21, 1944 be designated as a day of prayer for all Americans who believe in Almighty God and in our American Republic, its Constitution, and its institutions—regardless of race, color, and creed; and

Whereas for some years past there has been a highly organized campaign of ridicule, slander and abuse by certain subversive elements within this Commonwealth against the people's elected Representatives in the Congress—which subversive elements have no love for America, the American form of government, its Constitution or its institutions, or the principles and ideals upon which this country was founded; and

Whereas this campaign of villification against loyal, patriotic Americans in the Congress was a direct attack upon a vast majority of loyal Americans who still believe in the fundamental principles of this form of government; and

Whereas in asking that this day of prayer, Sunday, May 21, 1944, be designated by the Congress for the brave men and women who have made the supreme sacrifice; for those who are now lying sick, maimed and wounded in hospitals at home and abroad; for the speedy return home of those gallant men and women who are separated from their dear ones and from the country they love so dearly, on the far-flung battlefields of the world; and for the preservation of our American Republic, attention is called to the words of Gov. Raymond E. Baldwin of Connecticut, in proclaiming Sunday, May 21, as a day of proyer: "Prayer is man's method for self-transmission of personal needs and beliefs to Almighty God. It gives strength to the weak and brings humility to the strong. Prayer is a denominator of good for all peoples in time of war. As the divine method for establishing relationship between man and his Creator it deserves special recognition in our religious life. I urge the people of Connecticut to make special observance of Sunday, May 21, as a day of prayer. In this holy way may we ask God's blessings upon our Nation and our people."

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating Sunday, May 21 of this year, as a national day of prayer for the preservation of this American Republic; and that the third Sunday in the month of May thereafter be designated as a national day of prayer for this American Republic and in commemoration of the American men and women who have given their lives in the service of their country—not only during the present war, but in all the wars in which this American republic has participated.

This act or resolution to be extended throughout the United States and its Territories and possessions, on the day so designated, as well as to the United States Army posts, naval stations, ships at sea, or wherever the men and women in the uniform of the United States are stationed.

How We Can Keep America American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am enclosing herewith a letter written by a young lady from my district, Miss Jane Emily McMath, of Waynesboro, Miss., a student at the Mississippi Southern College, at Hattiesburg, Miss.

Miss McMath's letter was adjudged to be 1 of the best 10 entered in the students' contest sponsored by the Mississippi Central Railroad Co. on the subject How We Can Keep America American. The letter is most interesting and provocative of thought.

The letter follows:

HATTIESBURG, MISS., February 14, 1944.

Hon. WILLIAM COLMER,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: If we are to keep America American, we must keep alive the ideals and the principles upon which this country was founded. James Russell Lowell once said, "The American Republic will endure as long as the ideas of the men who founded it continue dominant." Our forefathers came to this country to escape the merciless oppression of the European monarchs. They came for freedom and liberty and for the individual's right to pursue happiness and live his own life. The American ideals and principles are the highest of any country in the world. George Washington said, "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. If to please the people we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterwards defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hands of God." Our founding fathers successfully raised such a standard and we must continue to uphold this standard.

Our country is a democracy founded on democratic principles. The people are the Government. As Abraham Lincoln said, "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." Ours is a representative democracy, but all the powers not needing special attention are left to the people. The Constitution provides for that: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

If America is to be kept American, labor must be better informed and led. It is easy to get up and denounce labor, but it is far more difficult to face the facts. Only by facing the facts can the situation be cured. Labor should wake up to the fact that its big trouble is the administration of labor.

In his effort to produce friendship with labor, Mr. Roosevelt has not hesitated to undermine his own boards and appointees with the result that an atmosphere of uncertainty has been created, in which sane and solid judgments are almost impossible to make. No labor leader knows what he can get out of the White House and each leader connives against the other to get all he can. Politics and labor have been mixed together so much that the result is utter chaos. The leaders of labor should try doing some straight, honest thinking instead of relying on the political machine to do it; the political machine of the country works for its own good and not for anyone else's.

It is time for the liberal friends of labor to make a realistic analysis of labor's recently acquired power. Some unions are taking on the color of the old antisaloon crowd before repeal. They have the same kind of political and financial power to coerce Government agencies, to threaten Congressmen, and scare liberal critics by labeling them as opponents to a great moral cause.

Labor's present power was acquired as a result of a series of Supreme Court decisions which completely reverse the Department of Justice's interpretation of the antitrust law. The antitrust law stated that unions were subject to penalty when they used their power coercively for an illegitimate labor objective. Under this interpretation effective prosecutions had been made. Many labor leaders agreed that this curb was necessary. The Supreme Court's decision completely changed the picture. No Government agency has power to act now, and labor can get away with anything. The situation even handicaps labor from cleaning its own house.

The remedy to this situation lies in directly prosecuting abuses of union power. Industry will be freed from indefensible labor if we prosecute those who use union power to restrict production or destroy independent industry. We need unrestricted post-war production to give labor more jobs and to pay our national debt. If present labor management keeps up, it may feed the present popular resentment against unions until the cause of collective bargaining itself is in danger. We must reestablish the power in the Department of Justice to prosecute those who abuse the privileges of organized labor to gain ends which are not only against the public interest but against the interest of labor itself.

Thomas Jefferson once made this statement, "Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap we would soon want bread. I am for a government rigorously frugal and simple—and not a multiplication of offices and salaries merely to make partisans and for increasing by every device the public debt on the principle of its being a public blessing." One of our American freedoms is freedom of enterprise, but if the present tendency of our Government is developed, we may be deprived of that freedom.

Our Government can help or hinder us in our progress as the greatest country in the world. Our American system is founded on individualism, and private enterprise is individualism. We are not in immediate danger of losing our freedom of speech, press, or worship. Our greatest threat comes from the effort to restrict free enterprise. Only with the help of private enterprise can we make a complete economic recovery after the war. One of our founding fathers said, "We must beware of trying to build a society in which nobody counts for anything except a politician or an official, a society where enterprise gains no reward and thrift no privileges."

After the war the Government should return to its normal functions and get out of the way of free competitive enterprise. Abraham Lincoln said, "Property is the fruit of labor; property is desirable, it is a positive good in the world. That some should be rich shows that others may become rich and hence is just encouragement to industry and enterprise." Seeing other individuals succeed, makes a person want to succeed too, but if the Government is competing so heavily with enterprise he would have no incentive to spur him on. Instead of a rich prosperous people there would only be a rich National Treasury and administration.

The right of liberty means man's right to individual action, individual choice, individual initiative, and individual property. The Constitution guarantees this: "Nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." Without the right to private property no independent action is possible. The founders of our country placed individual rights above any and all collective claims. If we are to keep America American, we must not allow the Government to restrict private enterprise in any way.

Our American system of education has vast potentialities of which we little dream. We are just now learning how to operate our secondary schools for the good of the public. Not only must the future citizens be equipped to step on to the first rung of whatever ladder of opportunity seems most appropriate, but they must be educated as members of a political democracy. One reason that Hitler has been so successful is that he has educated the young people of Germany to believe what he believes. They have been taught the doctrine of the Nazis since they were old enough to say a few words. Democracy and freedom must be taught to the future citizens over and over again. The German boy's cry is, "Let me die for Hitler." Our slogan must be, "Let me live for America and the principles America stands for."

Sincerely,

(Miss) JANE EMILY MCMATH.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. E. G. ROHRBOUGH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. ROHRBOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a letter on price control, dated March 30, 1944, received by me from Carroll R. Miller, secretary of the West Virginia Horticultural Society, which, to my mind, contains some pertinent thinking relative to this important subject.

The letter follows:

MARCH 30 1944.

Hon. EDWARD G. ROHRBOUGH,
Member of Congress, House
Offices, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ROHRBOUGH: The Emergency Price Control Act will be before you for recharter soon. From our experience may we place before you these thoughts:

I think we all join in feeling that a measure of price control is necessary. None of us want to be robbed; don't want to be victimized by profiteers. It would happen without price controls. So controls must be.

Our quarrel is not with the principle, but with the machinery and methods. We believe this to be fundamental—controls that fit half a continent and 130,000,000 people must be simple, must be understandable, or they are doomed.

O. P. A. and its policy-making higher-ups hold the opposite viewpoint. Their basic plan has been to take controls at the most possible points. First with the grower; then controls for the first handler; then the first terminal market buyer or receiver; then the second terminal receiver; then the retailer.

Every control point set up is a well spring of evasion, of confusion, an invitation to black marketing. Every control point throws askew to some extent the following steps until, at the end of all these, the thing is hopelessly jumbled. I doubt if 15 percent of retailers today know what their purchasing ceiling on apples really is. It is all too confused. Each shipment of apples has a different ceiling, depending upon what town it was shipped from, what zone, who handled it en route, and so on.

We (the apple industry nationally) have urged steadily a simple, protective ceiling, a single national ceiling placed where the consumer purchases only, low enough to protect the consumer against gouging and high enough to encourage fullest production, then let apples move as nearly in their normal course as possible. The consumer could be told, "Don't pay more than —— for apples" and the retailer that he must not sell apples above that figure. Such a system could be made largely self-policing.

Last August the apple industry urged a single, Nation-wide consumer ceiling of 12½ cents per pound. O. P. A. wanted it 8½ cents, as you remember; and we joined forces to have another cent added.

Consumer ceilings on apples now are approximately the 12½ cents per pound we requested; will be exactly that after April 1 in zones 3 and 4. So we were not far out of line in our request for 12½ cents. It is, and would have been, sufficient protection for the consumer.

To requests that this single ceiling be given a fair trial, O. P. A. says it is legally responsible for preserving the existing system of distribution; that these etablished intermediates would be wiped out unless specifically protected.

Actually the intermediates have always operated under a tight, if intangible, ceiling—the prevailing market price, which is set by consumer resistance or by supply. Intermediates have had no protection—and have survived, if they deserved to. They would have the best protection under the closest approximation to this normal order—the single consumer ceiling—providing that ceiling was set at the proper level.

In fresh fruits and vegetables, we have one other major difference with O. P. A. Fresh fruits cannot be stored or hoarded. It must be marketed, mostly within a very short period. It does not lend itself to profiteering or soaring prices. When prices get too high, the public simply lays off for a while. Since the fruit has to be marketed, this quickly brings down the price. So * * * we need less price control in fruits and vegetables than in staple articles which can be held for months and years. This buttresses our conviction that a single consumer price ceiling for fresh fruits is the best.

This all boils down to about this:

O. P. A. insists upon complexity. Our request is for simplicity.

O. P. A.'s results have not been too good. Prices have been restrained; but the effort, injury, and confusion among producers, distributors, and consumers has been a national scandal.

The same restraining results, or better, would have been obtained by the simple, single ceiling; without an O. P. A. army; without comparable, scandalous hullabaloo, confusion, injury, and resentment. The saving in paper, and phone, wire and travel expenses to Washington and regional O. P. A. by many thousands of harassed growers—the savings on these alone would be quite respectable.

In the coming renewal of O. P. A.'s franchise, can simplicity be written into their charter?

Sincerely,

CARROLL R. MILLER,
Secretary, West Virginia Horticultural Society.

Eggs and Other Woes of the Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include two telegrams from Mr. J. F. Percy, secretary of the Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation, Inc., on the subject of the marketing of eggs. Mr. Percy's telegrams are as follows:

UNIVERSITY, LA., March 28, 1944.

Hon. HENRY D. LARCADE, Jr.,
Member of Congress:

No market for Louisiana eggs. Heavy surplus available. Situation crucial. W. F. A. has program in Texas allowing eggs sold without grading. This program should be immediately extended to Louisiana. Grading feature prevents complying with W. F. A. regulations as facilities are not available. This needs immediate attention. Practically all Louisiana farmers are affected.

J. F. PERCY,
Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation.

UNIVERSITY, LA., March 31, 1944.

Congressman H. D. LARCADE, Jr.,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Louisiana egg market deplorable; farmers disgusted with lack of support price for current receipt eggs. Urge you make available to Louisiana farmers the 10-case egg-purchase program same as in Texas; purchase eggs on current receipts. People selling out entire flocks. Immediate action imperative. We want relief at once.

J. F. PERCY,
Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation.

Mr. Speaker, I further request permission to have included in these remarks a copy of a letter from one of my constituents addresssed to Hon. JOHN H. OVERTON, United States Senator, on the same subject. The letter follows:

MARCH 11, 1944.

Hon. JOHN H. OVERTON,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In pursuance of my efforts to encourage you and the other Members of the Louisiana delegation in the Senate and House of Representatives to interest yourselves in some way in securing a flooring, stop loss, or minimum prices on agricultural products, I am enclosing you herewith page 3 of the Times-Picayune of Friday, March 10, 1944, showing a farmer plowing under his cabbage because he was unable to sell the product at a reasonable profit, alongside of another picture showing two well-dressed individuals from the association of commerce plowing and preparing the land for a victory garden in the city of New Orleans.

I am sending you this because I am afraid that even you and the other Senators and Members of the House from the South fail to grasp the real situation, and this picture so aptly brings out the point that I have been trying to get you to grasp actuates me in sending it to you.

I really do not believe that any of you realize the absurdity, if not the downright shamefulness, of the situation that exists today. We have here a county agent with secretaries and stenographers, as well as a triple A with a triple number of secretaries and stenographers, clerks, field agents, as well as ward committeemen, all under pay from the money which Congress appropriated for so-called incentive money for the farmers who comply with Government regulations in the raising of crops.

The triple A organization busies itself in sending out circular after circular to the farmers telling them what they must and must not do, and when the time comes for the farmer to get something the expenses of the office eat up nearly all that the farmer can get. In other words, after the farmer has had to buy the fertilizer he is required to buy, or to do the different things required of him, the incentive that he gets simmers down to about $15 to $25 on an 80- to 100-acre farm.

Further, a political organization is being built up, which along with the rationing board works, is going to threaten, if not destroy, what we are supposed to be fighting for namely, free enterprise and the right to decide for ourselves what we want.

I bought eggs yesterday at a country store between Opelousas and Ville Platte at 22 cents a dozen, and the merchant from whom I obtained them, Mr. Gilbert Joubert, rural free delivery, Opelousas, La., told me that he paid that same price to the farmer but in trade, and that his profit came from his merchandise.

I am enclosing you the menu card of the Hotel Monteleone coffee shop where I took breakfast on February 4, 1944, and paid 29 cents for two eggs, soft boiled. You will note under the heading "Eggs and omelets" that eggs are 17 cents for one and 29 cents for two.

As I have tried to point out to you before, the whole trouble is that the producer does not get anything near a fair share of what the consumer pays.

When eggs were selling at 60 cents a dozen here at Opelousas there was some defense for the O. P. A.'s ceiling price, but when the O. P. A. permits eggs to go down when the farmer has some for sale to 20 cents to 22½ cents a dozen, and then after the eggs are gone into cold storage or the hands of the speculators to permit them to run up to 60 and 70 cents a dozen makes a mockery of the so-called stabilization of prices by the O. P. A.

As I told you in one of my other letters on this same subject, the masses of the people in the South want to remain in the Democratic Party and further, the masses of the people appreciate what the Roosevelt Administration did in the past, but they begin to feel that something has happened at Washington which has caused the administration to shift its position from what it was when the President was talking against anyone making over $25,000 a year, after all taxes were paid.

It seems now that he has permitted the whole matter to run away, and that all of the orders of the O. P. A. are used for the benefit of the shippers, packers, speculators, and transportation companies.

It is true that the O. P. A. has undertaken to declare itself in favor of minimum, or flooring prices, but the "joker" is that they have provided no method by which the flooring prices are high enough to give a profit to the producer or even to afford an opportunity to the producer to secure the flooring price when his product is ready to be placed on the market.

Take the egg situation which is just as bad as the cabbage situation. The producer is cut off from receiving the flooring by restrictions which deny to him all opportunity of receiving a fair share of the product he produces. Either the prices are fixed in Chicago, or some other city, where the producer is unable to sell except through a middleman. Further, the changes in the orders fixing the prices change so quickly for different communities that the producer would prefer now as heretofore to deliver his product to the country merchant in trade, rather than undertake to become a shipping merchant himself.

The remedy, as I have told you in several of my previous letters on this same subject, is to make it a criminal offense for anyone to buy or sell below the flooring price, and that to secure a market let the Agricultural Department or the O. P. A. or the triple A, or the county agent act as the shipping agency as well as the local inspectors and handlers when anyone else pays the minimum price.

I certainly would like to see you, or Senator ELLENDER, get busy on this and see what can be done. It won't be long before our Irish potatoes will be on the market. We have paid $5 per hundred pounds for the seed potatoes recommended by the triple A as well as $1.80 per sack for six sacks of fertilizer for every four sacks of potatoes, and our people should not be placed in the position they were last year when potatoes from Texas, Oklahoma, and other States were selling for twice as much as Louisiana potatoes.

Of course, they will possibly point out to you that cotton is selling at a high price, and that feed is selling at a high price, etc.

It is true that feed is high and that's why eggs should be higher than they are here as eggs can't be produced without feed. Our people were encouraged—and almost bulldozed—into going into the poultry business, and they find themselves with chickens on hand which necessitates using high-priced feed with a low price for their eggs with full knowledge of the fact that when the eggs are out of their hands, it will not be long before the eggs will be selling, even here, at more than 50 cents a dozen.

It is the same with the other products that we raise, and while it may be true that cotton is selling now at a price that is considered good, and that seed is selling at a good price, but yet it is equally true that our farmers have no cotton or seed at this time. When we had cottonseed for sale we received in this section $44 to $45 a ton, and now when we have no seed we are paying about the same price we sold our cottonseed for the meal needed for hogs and cattle.

All of the money that certain people are asking for drainage so that new lands may be put in cultivation in Louisiana, where we already make more crops than we can profitably sell, is ill-advised unless and until those who produce the farm products are given a fair price for their work and investment necessary to make the crop.

This picture from the Times-Picayune of Friday, March 10, 1944, should be in every Senator's and Congressman's office from the South and West, and this menu card from the Monteleone Hotel Coffee Shoppe, one of the cheapest places in the city of New Orleans, should be studied by those who really have the interest of the farmer at heart. In one of your letters to me you mentioned that you had sent one of my complaints to Mr. Chester Bowles, Administrator of the O. P. A. We here do not know enough of Mr. Chester Bowles to form any judgment as to his purpose in placing the prices he places on agricultural products.

Further, none of us believe very much in the authority and power of Chester Bowles, Administrator, and Marvin Jones, War Food Administrator, to fix any price for anything, and we base our objection not on any animosity to them as individuals, but to the fact that we feel that the laws of this country should be passed, or enacted, in the manner and form set out by the Constitution of the United States of America and by the duly constituted officials elected by the people of the United States of America.

Chester Bowles and Marvin Jones are appointed, not elected, by the people. They owe their places not to the people, but to someone responsible for their appointment. If they were elected by the people, they would then find out what the people want, and it would not take them long to realize that it is the people of this country who should run this country, and that all laws should be in the interest of the people as a whole, and not of any particular group making up the citizenship of the country.

Sincerely.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that the officials of the O. P. A. will give Louisiana some relief in this matter at once. I think the telegrams and the letter herein cover our situation without any further discussion by me.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include the following letter which I am sending to my friends in Louisiana:

It is with a great deal of pleasure that I take this opportunity to write this letter and express to you my deep appreciation for your kindness and your support in the recent Governor's race. Out of eight candidates, with your help I was extremely fortunate in running a swell third. Your cooperation and kindness helped to make this possible, and I want you to know that I deeply appreciate your sincere efforts.

If I can be of any assistance to you here in Washington, please do not hesitate to call on me.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. MORRISON,
Member of Congress.

Prohibition Will Only Serve to Disrupt American Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, there has just been held in Baltimore City a convention by the Prohibition Party of Maryland. The purpose was to select eight persons to fill vacancies as electors on the prohibition ticket. According to the papers, the convention experienced a great deal of trouble securing the electors, as one was selected when someone in attendance said "he knew someone from Worcester County who would run if the party could get someone to run from other districts." The convention confirmed the nomination of this unnamed someone.

The convention had as its guest the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BRYSON], author of the wartime prohibition bill. He made the principal address.

Mr. Speaker, with millions of our men and women in the armed forces, fighting to preserve the freedoms we enjoy, we find a small group who would deny them a glass of beer if they had their way.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I have information that shows beyond question that the Anti-Saloon League, which was responsible for the "noble experiment," does not even favor the Bryson bill.

At the seventeenth annual convention, held last month at St. Petersburg, Fla., for 3 days orators expressed their views and not one endorsed the Bryson bill or advocated prohibition around camps and war plants, as provided in Senate bill 860.

Bishop James Cannon, Jr., member of the executive committee, and formerly the most powerful individual leader of the league, came out boldly against the Bryson bill or any other prohibition legislation at this time. The reasons given by the bishop were that, in the first place, Congress would not pass such legislation, and, in the second place, that, if passed, it would not be enforced as long as Mr. Roosevelt is President. Bishop Cannon's speech indicated clearly that until public sentiment demanded it he was against national legislation.

A few days before the House Judiciary Committee hearing on the Bryson bill the National Antisaloon League issued a statement signed by George W. Crabbe, general superintendent, and Edward B. Dunford, attorney, stating that the league is not uniting with other prohibition organizations at this time in an appeal for the enactment of wartime prohibition by Congress.

I will include as part of my remarks an excerpt from this statement. In pursuance of the policy enunciated the Antisaloon League took no part in the Judiciary Committee's hearing.

That the league has changed its views was indicated by the statements made showing that several superintendents attended the Yale Summer School on the alcohol problem last year, and some seemed convinced that the scientists are right—that alcoholism is a disease, that the cure lies in hospitalization and medical treatment, and education, rather than in attempted prohibition.

There were superintendents who declared their opposition to legislation as an attemted solution of the alcohol problem. This attitude is very much in contrast to the former policy of the league, which was the most influential factor in propagandizing the eighteenth amendment into the Federal Constitution, and keeping it there for nearly 14 years.

For example:

Mr. High, of Nebraska, father of Stanley High, a well-known writer:

"I would not vote for another eighteenth amendment. I do not want it."

By Rev. Wayne Wakefield Womer, superintendent of the Connecticut Temperance Foundation:

"The inebriate is a diseased character. Unless cured he would become a customer of the bootlegger under prohibition."

By Dr. George A. Little, of Toronto, member of the Canada Temperance Federation:

"Education and not legislation is the remedy. I am opposed to legislation. You can make people drunk by legislation."

Many months ago Bishop Ralph Cushman, president of the National Anti-Saloon League, said in a written statement in the Christian Advocate, a religious magazine:

"I, for one, am not interested in the return of a national prohibition amendment in this generation; and, I think that the sooner we tell this to the world—and especially to the liquor-subsidized press—the sooner we will rob the liquor manufacturers of their pet ammunition against us."

Under the subhead "Country is not ready for national prohibition," Messrs. Crabbe and Dunford, said in their joint statement of January 6:

"The Anti-Saloon League has not altered its belief that the people will ultimately adopt prohibition as the best solution to the liquor problem. But prohibition should be attained through the democratic processes with the people back of it in substantial majorities. In our judgment, the counry is not ready for national prohibition. In the present state of public opinion, with liquor legalized in 45 of the 48 States, too many difficulties of enforcement would be encountered to make the successful operation of national prohibition possible.

Mr. Speaker, the people of this ccuntry, having had one experience, will never want to return to prohibition.

The American Issue, official publication of the Anti-Saloon League, published the following:

Since the war powers already conferred upon the President are sufficient to enable the Government to cope with unsatisfactory liquor conditions, we deem it unwise and unnecessary to raise the controversial and divisive issue of national prohibition at a time when unity is most needed. A decision upon such a far-reaching Federal policy should, in our judgment, be left for determination after millions of men now in the armed forces, can participate fully in the decision.

For these reasons the league is not uniting in the appeal for the enactment of war prohibition legislation by Congress at this time.

This supports my statement as to the attitude of the league.

Mr. Speaker, I am unalterably opposed to prohibition and urge the Members of Congress to defeat the Bryson bill. Prohibition will only serve to disrupt American unity and bring back the horrible bootleg days, which the American people deplored.

Our Mineral Resources

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am glad to include some remarks by Mr. Frank Lilly, of Spokane, Wash.

With the industrial revolution still going on, with mass production and mechanical advantage no longer a purely American trait, it seems to me to be downright short-sighted to sell mineral America short.

In a recent address to an eastern bond club, Mr. William L. Batt, Vice Chairman of the War Production Board, is reported by the Foreign Commerce Weekly as having made the following statements:

"Traditionally, we have thought of ourselves as people of great natural resources. We have thought of ourselves as possessing unlimited quantities of everything which our economy needed—iron and steel, zinc, copper and tin, and so on, and, generally speaking, that has been true. The American economy has been built on these large natural resources of more or less low-cost materials.

"Our high-grade iron-ore deposits in the Mesaba Range have not many years left; at the present rate of usage I am informed that we shall be reduced to low-grade deposits within another 10 years. Our high-grade zinc is practically gone. Our good copper deposits will be a thing of history in another 25 years.

"We never had much high-grade bauxite—the familiar base of aluminum—and we have used up a good part of those limited reserves in this emergency. The United States has no nickel and, for practical purpose, no tin.

"I could give many more examples, but this will be enough to emphasize the point I want to make, and that is that the United States is passing from a country of plenty to a country of scarcity in the field of metals and minerals, and other critical supplies. It will be said, of course, that we have reserves of low-grade materials which we could fall back on, and to some extent we could, but at much higher cost and with great difficulties.

"It may not be stressing the point too far to suggest that we are moving in the direction in which England has found herself—that of having to depend on imports of materials from abroad in ore to maintain her very lifeblood of existence.

"It is this line of reasoning which has made me so keenly interested in the proposal advanced by a few of our soundest thinkers in this field; that is, that we make every effort to import all of the critical materials which we can from abroad and use as 'ittle as possible of our own previous remaining supplies."

Such statements and such a plea coming from a man occupying such a high position in our Government cannot be taken lightly. If the statements are true, we mining men must admit it; if they are not true, the statements should not go unchallenged.

I for one am challenging them as just so much "globaloney," "bunk," and "poppycock"; and unfortunately these words do not adequately express what I think. Like the little colored boy who fell into the molasses barrel, I wish I had a tongue to fit the situation.

How did Mr. Batt get this way?

The most charitable position that can be taken on Mr. Batt's unfortunate statement, is that he was not informed, but ignorance in this case and in his position is inexcusable.

Seeing is believing! If Mr. Batt will come out West, I will personally show him enough mineral resources to convince anyone that there is plenty of all of the principal metals to meet this country's needs for generations to come. The truth is that we have barely scratched the surface of our mineral possibilities, and this is particularly true of the Northwest.

Mr. Batt cites no authorities for his statement on our metal scarcity, but he does say that the proposal that we make every effort to import the critical materials, specifically iron, zinc, copper, nickel, tin, and bauxite, was advanced by our soundest thinkers—no names mentioned.

One wonders where these soundest thinkers were and why they didn't say something along this line when you and I were protesting against the shipments in a steady stream to Japan of our copper, scrap iron, and other metals. I shudder at how accurate our forebodings were about how these metals might come back to us.

In our mineral resources lie the chief strength of the United States, because metals are not only the muscles of war but also the bone and sinew of the peaceful industry we are now fighting for. Without our metals we would be as powerless as Samson after being shorn of his locks by the glamourous and traitorous Delilah.

To me Mr. Batt's statements and import proposal are merely the voice of Mr. Batt using the high-sounding words of conservationists and those good-neighbor boys who would provide not only a quart of milk a day for the Hottentots but also a doorstep where the milkman could leave it each morning.

My greatest fear is that the hands are not the hands of the conservationists or the hands of the good-neighbor boys but the hands of a wily Delilah group of selfish interests with large foreign mineral holdings—much the same group as engineered the cartels who controlled world metal production and prices in the old days before the war. This is my guess. What is yours?

It is evident, I think, from several of Mr. Batt's remarks that he was "taken in," so to speak. For example, he speaks of high-grade and low-grade ores in a way that would indicate that he did not know that most highly successful copper, gold, zinc, and lead mines of this and other countries are low-grade mines. The most and greatest mining failures have been, as you know, in high-grade properties. Utah Copper and Homestake in the United States; Chile Copper in South America; and the Sullivan mine of Consolidated Mining & Smelting in Canada are only a few of the many and highly successful low grades that could be cited.

Another indication that Mr. Batt was probably "taken in" is found in the fact that he does not name the two metals in which there is a probable scarcity. These are lead and silver. Despite an increase in United States base-metal output last year there was a big decrease in the silver byproduct. Mr. Batt should know that in all of our big lead-zinc mines, the percentage of lead decreases with depth while on the other hand the zinc content increases. Incidentally, United States lead output accounted for only 40 percent and silver output for only about 20 percent of our consumption of these metals in 1943.

Mr. Batt would have been right if he had limited his statements to cover indicated future metal production, because if the mining industry and mining men are to continue to be hog-tied, hamstrung, and maliciously maimed; directed, regulated, and outrageously taxed; punched in the nose by one Government bureau, kicked in the pants by the various State bureaus, and its pocket picked by both State and Federal Governments and labor; spied upon, threatened, and maligned by every government Tom, Dick, and Harry employee, we will presently have a metal scarcity that will be a scarcity.

Mr Batt, unwittingly I believe, hurt the mining industry immeasurably with his unfortunate statements, because they will have the effect of discouraging mining development. Most people, especially in the East, will accept his statements as literally true, and this fact is likely to shut off in large measures the venture and investment capital needed to develop new mines in the millions of acres of virgin mineral lands in our Western States.

Incidentally, there are large areas in the East which offer possibilities as indicated by the fact that one of the world's largest zinc deposits is practically within sight of New York City's Empire State Building and that a large lead-zinc producing area has been opened up in northern New York State during the last decade.

If by any chance the proposal that we import all of the metals that we can, should be put into effect, great harm would be done to the boys now overseas who will want jobs when they come back. If we buy metals abroad we will also be buying in effect jobs which by right belong to American citizens and particularly to those who are now fighting to preserve the American way of life under which our big mines of today were developed from prospects that offered no better showing on the surface than the prospects of today.

It is within the power of the able and conscientious Mr. Batt to render his country and mining a great service by lending his talents and using his position in a constructive effort to remove the bureaucratic shackles that are hampering proper development of our enormous mineral resources, which are greater than that of any other country in the world. Untie the hands of mining men, make it possible for them to secure by private financing only an amount comparable to the cost of the running of the bureaus and agencies that are now ruining the mining industry and there will be no scarcity in any of the metals with the possible exception of nickel, tin, lead, silver, and gold—and we can if given a Chinaman's chance produce more of each of these than is generally believed possible.

Oklahoma Verdict

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me, I include as part of my remarks an editorial from the Washington Star. It follows:

Since the Republican political strategists saw fit to make the Roosevelt administration the principal issue in Tuesday's special election in Oklahoma's Second Congressional District, they will have to make the best of the verdict returned by the voters.

That verdict was clearly an indorsement of the President and his policies, the Democratic candidate winning by a margin of about 4,000 votes in a total of some 40,000. Nor is there anything to suggest that local rather than national considerations were the controlling factor in the balloting.

There is room for doubt, of course, as to the extent to which this result in Oklahoma in a traditionally Democratic district, may be indicative of national sentiment. In 1936 the total vote in the district was 72,034, the Democrat winning by 19,414 votes. In 1938 the vote was 53,393, the Democratic majority being 22,723, and in 1940 the total vote was 80,891, with a Democratic margin of 19,721. By 1942, however, with a total vote of 42,934, the Democratic margin had shrunk to a mere 388 votes.

This formed one of the principal grounds of the anti-Roosevelt pre-election "trend" forecasts, and now the Republicans have lost by 4,000 votes in the lightest total vote of recent years. If that is evidence of a trend, it is not of a kind to bring joy to the hearts of the G. O. P.

Simplified Tax Returns

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, those who listened to the radio talk of our distinguished colleague from Minnesota, the Honorable HAROLD KNUTSON, and ranking Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives last night were encouraged with the prospect of simplified tax-return forms.

People generally will be very glad to know that legislation providing for this result will be presented to Congress shortly after the Easter recess.

Considerable correspondence has come to my office on this subject, and it is really one of the important problems of which Congress and for which Congress must find a solution.

I quote from a letter received sometime ago from a very reputable businessman in my district, and it is interesting to note what he had to say on this subject:

I do not object to paying income taxes, and I realize the tax must be higher than heretofore, and must continue to be higher than heretofore. However, when I got home last night I found the blanks for 1943 return, and I honestly feel that if the American public does not very soon cut loose and say to hell with the whole business—so far as making those returns is concerned—it is because we are a long-suffering crew. It is true we would be subject to penalties, but when enough people are subject to penalty it will not be easy to enforce.

There are thousands in this country that do not have as much to do with figures as I do, and I doubt very much if I can make that return without either hiring someone to tell me how to do it or else spend a lot of time waiting at the revenue office for advice, and then not being sure that there is not a better way to make the return. Between making returns, estimated returns, and all the other reports to the Government now called for we will soon have no time for our own business, unless there is a change.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House is to be congratulated in giving this matter prompt and early attention. Without discussing the question as to who was responsible for these complicated returns I do want to say reforms should be made and it should be done right away.

The Soldier Ballot

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. G. ROHRBOUGH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. ROHRBOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an editorial on the soldier ballot recently appearing in the Glenville Democrat, of Glenville, W. Va.

The writer, and editor of this newspaper, Mr. C. W. Marsh, was a captain in our army during World War No. 1, was formerly a member of both the House of Delegates and the State Senate of the State of West Viginia, was for many years chairman of the Democratic executive committee for the county of Gilmer, and is now a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the office of State senator in that State.

The editorial follows:

THE SOLDIER BALLOT

Were William Shakespeare living at this time he probably would conclude that the recent prolonged fuss in Congress over the soldier ballot bill was much ado about nothing. Which side was right, the side that advocated a Federal short ballot, or the side which contended that the soldier should have his full State ballot as well, is not for us to determine. We could not if we wanted to, because we do not know exactly what issue or issues were involved. This, we do know, that the West Virginia ballot law is working effectively, thanks to the foresight of Governor Neely and the splendid work of the recent session of the legislature. On our Main Street, a few days ago, we met a sailor, W. H. Rhoades, formerly of Cedarville. He informed us that he received his soldier ballot on March 3, voted it the same day, put it in an envelope provided and dispatched it to the clerk of our circuit court. Mr. Rhoades was stationed at Trinidad, off the coast of South America, at the time. This is ample evidence that West Virginia's soldier voting law is working. This particular ballot had been dispatched, received by the sailor, voted, returned, and received in Glenville at least 60 days before the date of the primary. And the ballot Mr. Rhoades voted is identically the ballot his father, his mother, his sisters and his brothers, and the rest of us will vote on Tuesday, May 9.

If the proper effort is being made, and the Democrat has reasons to believe it is, every Gilmer County man and woman in the military service, wherever he or she may be stationed, should receive a full West Virginia ballot—containing the names of all candidates of his party from the Presidency down—in good time to vote it, return it and have it counted by Tuesday, May 9. Gilmer County servicemen and women stationed anywhere in West Virginia may request a soldier's ballot, and this ballot may be voted without the applicant returning to his home precinct. Parents, relatives, or friends of servicemen and women can expedite soldier voting by turning in the names and addresses of members of their families now serving in any branch of the military service.

Simplification of Income-Tax Returns

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL R. LEWIS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, the near approach of April 15 reminds us and the fifty-odd-million taxpayers of the United States who must file returns for 1944 at that time that our laws levying income taxes are still in a chaotic and complicated condition and our tax forms are so intricate and abstruse that only an expert can understand them.

The need for simplification of our tax returns is apparent to all. I sincerely trust that the Ways and Means Committee which, of course, has all tax legislation in its control, will bring out a tax law so drafted that the tax returns of the average taxpayer will be so simple that even the most untutored can understand them.

To that end, I should like to suggest that there are but a few items of information necessary. One should be the total amount of income for the year. Two, the amount of tax withheld at the source during the year. Three, the number of dependent children. Four, the amount or percentage allowed as deductions. Five, the amount of the tax. Those five items, Mr. Speaker, are all that any taxpayer should be required to furnish on a tax form, and sincerely trust that the Ways and Means Committee, without delay, report out such a bill and that the House will promptly enact the same. If we do this, we will have met the insistent public demand for simplified tax returns, and will have removed one of the sources of perennial irritation from the fifty-odd-million taxpayers of this country.

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me today over Station WNBF:

Dear friends of the Triple Cities and my congressional district, while I am here in Washington trying to do the job you sent me to do, about the only way I have to keep track of what goes on back home is by reading the local newspapers. Lately, I have been somewhat annoyed by inaccurate and deliberately twisted stories in Triple Cities papers giving to the public a wrong impression of the Hall furlough clubs.

When the patriotic women of these clubs have requested space for stories in the newspapers to tell the public what they are doing for their men in service, they have been denied on at least two occasions I know of the use of a free press.

However, when one Cerinetti, who was kicked out of the clubs because he abused several of the women verbally and who I am told has hung around outside several Hall furlough club meetings to the dismay and terror of the members, goes to the papers with almost any sort of smear story, questioning the motives of these women, he is accorded cooperation and plenty of space in these papers.

So I repeat, I have been annoyed, and when I hear of these good women denied newspaper space, yet Cerinetti being given space profusely to disparage them, I become aroused. I ask myself, what is behind this?

What is behind all this? Who is egging on Cerinetti to throw his dirt at these women? How long since have Americans had to explain the reasons they are organizing patriotic groups to help their boys in service?

I promise the women of the Hall furlough clubs and the people of this district that I will find out before long who is behind Cerinetti and his insults to these mothers, sisters, wives, and children of our soldiers.

I promise to expose this undercover crowd, to name names, to talk plainly to them, to brand them as an unholy, un-American, and subversive bunch. And they know I am able to get their names to every American in my district whether the newspapers print my story or not. Yes, they are un-American when they try to misrepresent the lofty and patriotic motives of these women of the Hall furlough clubs, especially when these women have given their beloved sons and husbands and brothers to the service of their country.

These people who are using Cerinetti because they are too yellow themselves to come out from their hiding places of false respectability must know I have friends who are keeping me up to date with their dirty work. They must also know that I will protect my good name in this section by exposing them for what they are.

They must know that their bullying and their persecution of my friends are getting them nowhere but driving more people to support the Hall furlough bill every day.

They must realize that every time they attempt to stir up trouble on the home front, they are hurting the war effort, they are interfering with my work in Washington in the interest of the people of this district and their soldier boys.

They certainly must realize that in trying to ridicule and make light of the Hall furlough bill, they are hindering millions of boys from getting home to see their families, who haven't the money to travel which these behind-the-scenes people have.

They must know that in slapping these women down they are building up an unhealthy attitude among people with sincere motives, an attitude which is bound to kick back if they continue these tactics.

Remember this, boys, and let's get this straight, a slap at the Hall furlough clubs and their patriotic members is a slap at me. I am ready to fight.

And to you women of the Hall furlough clubs, if at any time you are annoyed, abused, irritated, or harassed in any manner by any of the hypocritical and overbearing men I have referred to this evening, I ask you to get in direct touch with me. You may expect immediate action.

Address at Jackson Day Dinner

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including in the RECORD an address I delivered at the Jackson Day dinner, Copley Plaza Hotel, Boston, on March 25, 1944:

Mr. Toastmaster, Mayor Tobin, Chairman Hannegan, Governor Murphy, distinguished and invited guests, my fellow-Americans, a continuance of the Democratic Party to conduct our Government for the next 4 years is necessary for the best interests of our Nation and our people.

This splendid gathering is the best evidence that next fall Massachusetts will again be in the Democratic column.

During the past 12 years—years of pain and suffering as a result of the terrible depression—years of pain and suffering as a result of the present war—we have been fortunate in having as our pilot—steering our ship of state—a brilliant, humane, and courageous man—one who had to do new things to get the results necessary for our welfare. And who did these things? The leader who is winning the war—the leader who, with the help and guidance of God, will win the peace—that man of destiny—our Commander in Chief, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

In 1932, 1936, and 1940 his opponents and enemies tried to defeat him by employing the lowest and foulest methods possible. They failed. In 1944, if President Roosevelt is a candidate, his opponents and enemies will again fail.

President Roosevelt typifies the kind of leadership—dynamic, affirmative, courageous—that America needs today. There are enough persons in the homes of the United States—Democrats, Republicans, and Independents—whose sound judgment tells them that President Roosevelt is the best man to lead us during the next 4 years to assure his reelection—if he is a candidate again.

I do not know if he will be a candidate. I do not think that he wanted to run the last time—preferring to return to Hyde Park, like Jefferson returned to Monticello, and live the remainder of his life in peace, in study, and, when sought, in giving advice to his fellow Americans.

I have no doubt that President Roosevelt ran in 1940 because he realized the danger that confronted our country and that if he did not run he would feel himself a deserter to the duty he was destined to perform—to lead our country to national security and safety.

I do not think President Roosevelt wants to be a candidate this fall. One thing I do know—he will perform his duty as his judgment and conscience dictate is necessary for one objective—the preservation of the United States of America.

With the war situation as it is—and will likely be next fall—I cannot conceive of President Roosevelt leaving what is clearly his post of duty.

It is not a question of an indispensable man—the straw man built up by the Republican leaders to try and knock down. We make no such claim. The issue is, however, a clear and important one: "Who is the best man to lead and guide our Nation during the tragic days to come?"

There is no difficulty in answering that question. The best man in the American life of today is Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Let us quickly examine the record.

President Roosevelt took office for his first term in 1933—with economic distress existing, the result of the negative and inept Republican leadership of the Hoover administration. Do you remember those days? Former President Hoover failed to understand and meet the problems of our Nation and our people. You remember the promise of a chicken in every pot—or was it two—and two automobiles in each garage. You remember his refusal to permit Congress to appropriate money from the Federal Treasury to relieve human suffering and distress. You remember what he told the millions of unemployed to do—sell apples. Over 6,000 banks closed their doors during the Hoover administration. Industry, finance, agriculture, and labor were prostrated. Fear ran rampant throughout the country.

In 1932 the people repudiated vigorously the inept, do-nothing leadership of the Hoover administration. Have you forgotten those days? Twelve or fifteen millions were unemployed, with their millions of dependents facing starvation.

Our banking system, with the life earnings of more than twenty million of our people, was threatened.

The people—yes, business, finance, banking, agriculture, labor—sought new leadership. New leadership was needed. We turned to Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

He had to do new things. The New Deal was simply a characterization to distinguish between the Old Deal of former President Hoover and the new leadership of President Roosevelt.

To save our institutions from economic disintegration, to meet and solve the problems which existed in 1933, he had to act quickly, decisively, and with judgment and courage.

Do we remember his first act? It was the saving of our banking system—the economic lifeblood of our Nation and the life savings of more than twenty millions of our people.

From that moment on our people took new vigor, new confidence, new life. The despair under Hoover quickly changed to new hope and faith under Roosevelt. It was that act that constituted the turning point in the war against the depression. The depression was then licked. It was due to the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

He next turned to agriculture which was prostrated. Tens of thousands of farms had been foreclosed during the Hoover regime. He quickly changed that situation and with the Democratic Congress saved the farmers of our country.

At the same time he saw the problem confronting the unemployed workers and the home owners of our country. Tens of thousands of homes had been foreclosed during the Hoover administration; tens of thousands more were facing foreclosure unless something was done. President Roosevelt acted.

Local governments, religious and private charities had carried the load for 3 years. Their means to carry on were exhausted. They knew that—so do you—as we look back. There was only one agency which could act to meet this terrible situation and that agency was the Federal Government. Mr. Hoover had failed to act President Roosevelt did not hesitate to act. Remember we were faced with a condition—not a theory. He recommended to Congress, and forced quickly through Congress, legislation to bring necessary economic relief to the innocent victims of the depression—to save the homes and family life of America.

In the meanwhile business and financial interests were going to Washington saying to President Roosevelt: "We are helpless. We do not know what to do. Give us the benefit of your courageous leadership. Have Congress pass legislation which will put new blood in the business and financial life of America." And he did. It is amazing to witness how many his leadership saved who have forgotten and are now numbered among those who are known as his political enemies. Fortunately not all are of that school. The m jority of our fine people, in all walks of life, remember his sterling leadership of those dark days. They have not forgotten. Neither have they forgotten the do-nothing leadership of the last Republican administration.

President Roosevelt also thought of the aged, the blind, and the handicapped.

He fought the battle of the people against the abuses of certain stock exchanges and certain public utilities. In the interest of the people he fought them and then certain big interests turned on him and ever since they have tried to destroy him. My warning to these business and financial interests who are trying to destroy him—and, mark you, I do not say all, but certain powerful money groups—is to stop mixing business with politics. The campaign of hate which is being carried on by some will not be tolerated by the people.

In 1937–38 signs of another world crisis came across the horizon. President Roosevelt saw the approaching danger and warned our people to prepare. Austria was taken over. Czechoslovakia was invaded and quickly conquered by the Nazi hordes. Then followed brave Poland and the actual outburst of the present war.

On December 7, 1941, Pearl Harbor happened—bringing about our entry into the war in defense of our country.

In 1940 the great majority of our people recognized the approaching danger and turned again to President Roosevelt as they did in 1932.

To the man who led us through the economic crisis they turned with confidence to lead the ship of state through the trying days ahead.

Prior to Pearl Harbor President Roosevelt recommended to Congress the passage of legislation essential for our defense in case of attack. Members of Congress are in position to study world conditions and what they mean—or they ought to be able to do so—and to obtain from the War, Navy, and State Departments information to assist them in the passage of legislation. Republican Members have the same opportunity as Democratic Members. And yet, with that opportunity, the record of the Republican Members in Congress, with a few exceptions, before Pearl Harbor is a sad and dismal one.

The courageous leadership of President Roosevelt has evidenced itself throughout the war to date.

From the despair that followed Pearl Harbor, recovery has been made. The greatest war production in the history of man has been accomplished—the most powerful Navy the world has ever seen built—an Army, Navy, and Air Corps built up and thoroughly trained, the free people of an aroused democracy courageously responding on the battle front and on the home front, America on the march to victory under the leadership of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Let us hope that after the war is over there will be no Republican administration to scrap our great Navy as the Republican administration did in 1922—after the last war.

In connection with this we should also remember that in addition to scrapping our Navy in 1922 the Republican administration of Warren G. Harding committed the United States not to fortify the Philippine Islands or the island of Guam.

Even those who oppose some of the domestic policies of the present administration admit that President Roosevelt's leadership of our war effort is expert. This is admitted by practically all of our people. The Republican leaders themselves publicly admit it.

The winning of the war is our first essential task.

Before Pearl Harbor there were important bills in Congress which were directly connected with the preservation of our country—and on all of these measures the great majority of the Republican Members in Congress voted against them. They voted contrary to the wishes and views of the great majority of our people who, as Americans, saw the coming danger.

To illustrate, let me refer to the bill to extend the Selective Service Act. If that bill had failed to pass—and we all know it now in the light of what happened later—it would have been fatal to our country's best interests. That bill passed by 1 vote in the House of Representatives. And yet, on that bill which meant so much to the preservation of our Nation, in the House 133 Republicans voted against the bill and only 21 for its passage. In the Senate, 17 Republicans voted against that important bill and 13 voted in favor of it.

And this is the party that asks you to entrust to it the control of our Government during the next 4 years.

I do not question for a moment the patriotism of any of my Republican colleagues or the few Democrats who voted wrong, but I do question their judgment. If the way the big majority of the Republicans voted before Pearl Harbor had prevailed, our country would have been defenseless when Pearl Harbor took place.

It was due to the leadership of President Roosevelt, supported by the great majority of the Democratic Members of the Congress and a small group of sound-thinking, courageous Republicans, that our country was able to carry on.

In this connection, the flower of our manhood and youth are fighting, and dying, to defend America and preserve our institutions of government. They are thinking of home, of loved ones. They are looking to the future, to the early termination of the war, to living peaceful lives thereafter. They are thinking of the future, too, of a grateful government to look after the disabled, to assure them employment, to give them what they are fighting for—"life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." They know a change of administration would mean a lengthening of the war, and that would mean more casualties, with less chance of our loved ones returning.

They know that Roosevelt has looked after their best interests during the war. They know that President Roosevelt is the best man to look after their interests after the war.

With the winning of the war, the winning of the peace is necessary for our national interest. It is necessary in order that the next generation of Americans—your children or your children's children—may live a normal life of peace.

As in the black days of the depression President Roosevelt performed his trust, so, too, in the crucial days of war has he performed the trust we reposed in him by the 1940 election.

Grave problems of concern to us will exist during the next 4 years. We will need his type of leadership and the character of service rendered by the Democratic Party.

I have said that I have no knowledge of President Roosevelt's intentions next fall That is so.

Speaking as an American, with my country's interest foremost in mind, and expressing my personal opinion, the world conditions will be such that President Roosevelt should be a candidate next fall. His courageous leadership will be needed during the next 4 years.

President Roosevelt and the Democratic Party have performed their trusts during the past 12 years—their trusts to the American people.

The positive record of the Democratic Party consistently received the opposition of the negative actions of the Republican leaders. The inept actions of the Republican leaders entitle the Democratic Party to be continued in control of our Federal Government.

Based upon that great record of service and of achievement, and based upon his sound and courageous leadership in time of depression and in the period of the war, I confidently predict, if he is a candidate, the reelection of President Roosevelt and the election of a Democratic Senate and a Democratic House of Representatives.

Amendment to Lend-Lease Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable misapprehension as to the nature and extent of the amendment recently adopted by the Foreign Affairs Committee in reporting out the extension of lend-lease for another year.

Some newspapers and commentators do not seem to have grasped the purpose or effect of this amendment.

There appeared in the issue of March 25 of the Baltimore Sun an editorial which is a clear and accurate statement with reference to the scope of this amendment, and under leave granted, same is submitted herewith:

LEND-LEASE AND OUR POST-WAR ARRANGEMENTS

The so-called "restrictive" amendment to the lend-lease extension bill unanimously approved by the House Foreign Affairs Committee is primarily a precautionary device to forestall certain possible, but not necessarily probable, future difficulties.

It does not, and wisely so, imply any new check whatsoever on the power granted the President by Congress to give, at his discretion, American economic aid to any of our allies or to "any country whose defense * * * [he] deems vital to the defense of the United States." It does not touch his authority to set the terms and conditions of lend-lease transactions for the effective prosecution of the war and to determine whether repayment shall be "in kind or property or any other direct or indirect benefit."

What it does do is assert that in the framing of final settlements no commitments shall be made imposing "any obligations on the part of the United States with respect to post-war economic or post-war military policy except in accordance with established constitutional procedure."

The bill as it stands, that is, would leave lend-lease intact as an instrument for the waging of war against our enemies and a wartime protection for the United States. The amendment would simply add a warning against the use of lend-lease as a means for effecting post-war commitments without the specific approval of Congress. Now that the war effort has progressed to a point at which the United Nations have seized the initiative, it is proper for Congress to be interested in asserting its position on the manner in which our post-war policies shall be formulated and adopted.

Rice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, permission having been granted therefor, I wish to have included in the RECORD a copy of a letter addressed to Hon. Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, and copy of letter addressed to Hon. Marvin Jones, Administrator of the War Food Administration, signed by Senators and Representatives from the rice-producing States, protesting the placing of a ceiling on rough rice, and giving the reasons therefor. The letter follows:

MARCH 28, 1944.

Hon. CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator, Office of Price Administration.

Hon. MARVIN JONES,
Administrator, War Food Administration.

GENTLEMEN: The Office of Price Administration has issued MPR 518, dated March 7, 1944, to become effective April 15, 1944, in which order there is established maximum prices on rough rice. This regulation bears the approval of the Administrator of the War Food Administration as of February 26 1944.

The representatives of the rice-producing States have consistently opposed the establishment of maximum prices on rough rice, and have filed written protests and objections with the Office of Price Administration, and from time to time have participated in many conferences with the officials of that Office, and do now further protest this action and reiterate our reasons therefor, to wit:

1. The placing of a maximum price on rough rice is unnecessary as there has been placed a maximum price on milled and cleaned rice, which maximum price on milled or cleaned rice, if enforced, protects the consumer.

2. The 1943 crop of rice under the maximum price under which the same was produced, harvested, milled, and distributed, was handled with a fair return to all concerned.

3. It is unfair to the producer to place a maximum price on rough rice for the reason that under the proposal there is a scandalously wide spread between the maximum price on rough rice and the maximum price on milled or cleaned rice.

4. The proposed maximum prices for rough rice are below the levels of the year 1942, and violate the 1942 Emergency Price Control Act, as amended. The term "gross inequity" was never intended to confer authority on your agency to place maximum prices at levels below the standards contained in the law but rather to permit prices to be fixed at levels above the standards when justice dictated this action. Thus, clearly, MPR 518 violates the law and intent of Congress. You cannot expect support of your program unless you administer it in accordance with the letter of the law.

5. The proposed maximum prices for rough rice, we are informed are below the cost of production at this time (see testimony of hearing of O P. A. held in New Orleans, La., on March 20, 1944) and instead of encouraging the production of this important food, will not only reduce the crop for 1944, but will practically ruin the rice growers.

6. We are further informed that it is the intention to amend the above-mentioned MPR 518 Regulation to provide for Federal grading of rough rice, and that the total rice production be allocated to the various rice mills and that the value of the individual rice crops be determined by "valuation committees" in order to eliminate all competition in the purchase of rice. The effect of this would be that the producer would have completely destroyed his privilege to trade in the sale of his crop, and would be entirely unable to protect himself against unfair grading, and so forth.

7. Our constituents advise us that all of the producers and a majority of the rice mills are opposed to the placing of this proposed maximum price on rough rice, as the same is unnecessary, unfair, unreasonable, and that the only result would be to create unknown hardships and unnecessary confusion on the part of the producer and in no way help the consumer, and that they are all further opposed to any such regimentation on the part of your agencies as is suggested in the above and foregoing paragraph.

Therefore, in view of our sincere opinion that the facts do not justify MPR 518, no other alternative is left us, except to demand that you rescind and abrogate MPR 518 before it destroys the rice industry and reduces this source of food.

We expect to be advised as to your intentions in regard to our request.

Sincerely yours,

Why I Would Like To Be a WAC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. W. (RUNT) BISHOP

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, cooperating with Gov. Dwight H. Green, of the State of Illinois, in his Illinois civilian WAC recruiting campaign, it has been my pleasure and privilege to present a $25 War bond as a congressional district prize to Miss Marie Romeo, 511 South Jefferson Street, Du Quoin, Ill., for the splendid essay which she has written entitled "Why I Would Like To Be a WAC." I include the essay written by Miss Romeo:

WHY I WOULD LIKE TO BE A WAC

There are several reasons why I would like to be a WAC.

First of all, a WAC takes the place of a soldier and will help bring him home sooner to his parents, wife, family, and sweetheart.

A second reason is, a WAC releases a man for active service and may keep a father or a defense worker from being called.

A third reason is that General Marshall is asking for 70,000 additional volunteers for the WAC's to release 70,000 men in order to take the place of that many casualties.

A fourth reason is to secure more education.

A fifth reason is that a WAC gets to see the world and is entertained by movie actors and meets people from all over the world. Also, it helps to make one more friendly and brave.

A sixth reason is that I would be proud to wear the WAC uniform.

A seventh reason is that one gets to choose any kind of professional position.

Last of all, it is to be one of Uncle Sam's nieces and have the opportunity to pitch in and help our American boys smack those Japs.

MARIE ROMEO.

Critical Shortage of Keymen in the Fishery Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, further supplementing the efforts of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to relieve the critical condition in which the fishery industry finds itself, Hon. J. HARDIN PETERSON, of Florida, chairman of the Subcommittee on Fisheries; Mr. Hugh Frampton, attorney at law of Washington, D. C.; and I, as chairman of the full Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, were graciously granted, on Friday, March 30, a hearing before a subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, headed by Hon. JOHN M. COSTELLO, of California, investigating operations of the Selective Service Draft Act.

The effect of the present operation of the Draft Act on the fishery industry was discussed before the subcommittee and the letters, resolutions, and matter presented by the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries in his remarks on the same subject in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at page A1714, were presented, together with a copy of the resolution adopted by the full committee on the 28th day of March and included in the aforesaid extension of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There were also presented to the subcommittee headed by Mr. COSTELLO, the telegrams received by the chairman, from Virginia, Maryland, and Maine, outlining the present plight of the fisheries industry in those States, copies of which were extended in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on March 31, 1944.

The situation was fully explained by Hon J. HARDIN PETERSON, chairman of the Subcommittee on Fisheries, and there was made a part of the proceedings the following paper which seeks to clarify the situation as related to the seafood industry and shows the imperative necessity of greater protection to the seafood industry if those engaged in that industry are to produce the seafood, proteins, fish meal, and fish oil needed to carry out the war program outlined for the fisheries. This plan is designed to bring out in concise form the serious situation which now confronts the Nation:

"Food will win the war and write the peace." (Secretary of Agriculture.)

Congress has decided that food production (agriculture—by passage of Tydings amendment) is a critical activity. The Tydings amendment to section 5 of the Selective Training and Service Act, by adding a new subsection (K), reads:

"Every registrant found by a selective service local board, subject to appeal in accordance with section 10 (a) (2), to be necessary to and regularly engaged in an agricultural occupation or endeavor essential to the war effort, shall be deferred from training and service in the land and naval forces so long as he remains so engaged and until such time as a satisfactory replacement can be obtained."

Following the passage of the Tydings amendment the war units plan was adopted, but even this has now been abandoned in the interest of food production, according to an article appearing in the Evening Star, of Washington, D. C., March 29, 1944, which reads:

"HERSHEY WILL LEAVE FARM DEFERMENTS UP TO DRAFT BOARDS

"Instead of the unit system, under which farm worker deferments are based on the extent of production of livestock or commodities in which the employee is engaged, the so-called Tydings amendment, passed by Congress 2 years ago, will be the new yardstick, Senators RUSSELL and TYDINGS reported."

We have but two sources of food supply (a) from the land and (b) from the water.

While farmers, who produce on the average about 33,000 pounds of food per man-year, are protected by an act of Congress, and properly so, highly trained fishermen, who produce on the average 54,800 pounds of food per man-year have no protection. Even if the present number of fishermen is retained in the industry it will be necessary for each fisherman to produce about 80,000 pounds during 1944 to bring production up to the requirements for 1944 as determined by the War Food Administrator.

Food production, expressed in pounds, by the seafood industry per man-year is outstanding.

EXAMPLES

1. Otter trawl fishery of Massachusetts: The average catch per man engaged on large, medium, and small boats is 126,000 pounds per man-year. One boat produced 235,289 pounds per man during 1943.

2. Purse seine fishery in Virginia averages 142,000 pounds per man-year.

3. Purse seine fishery in New Jersey averages 293,000 pounds per man-year.

4. Purse seine fishery in California averages 627,000 pounds per man-year.

Fish and shellfish are an essential source of high-protein food. The industry constitutes a major source of fats, oils, and meal for industrial uses and for animal feeding. The industry is the primary source of vitamin concentrates and other indispensable commodities.

Normal per annum sea-food production, 5,000,000,000 pounds; 2,500,000,000 pounds (per annum) of high-protein food for humans; 2,500,000,000 pounds (per annum) for animal feed; fish and shellfish in unlimited quantities available for the taking; not waiting time to grow or fatten.

Production goal for 1944 set by War Food Administrator 5,300,000,000 pounds (for armed forces, lend-lease, civilian population).

United States Fish and Wildlife estimates probable 1944 production not to exceed 4,300,000,000 pounds. Short of 1944 War Food Administrator's requirements, 1,000,000,000 pounds.

Estimated 1943 sea-food production 4,000,000,000 pounds.

The estimated 1944 sea-food production of 4,300,000,000 pounds is based on following assumptions:

(a) That some fishing boats will be returned by the Navy to industry.

(b) That men will be available to operate boats returned by Navy to industry.

(c) That present available manpower be not disturbed.

(d) No strikes.

If above assumptions upset, then instead of the estimated 1,000,000,000-pound sea-food shortage in 1944, such shortage will be much larger than estimated 1,000,000,000-pound shortage.

Estimates of U. S. Fish and Wildlife Service

	Estimated total	Estimated number in draft age, 18-37 years	Estimated number already drafted	Estimated number in draft age, 18-37 years, remaining	Estimated number under 26 years remaining
Commercial fishermen	84,000	39,000	20,834	18,166	8,683
Key shore workers (male)	8,558	3,935	2,102	1,833	876

RECOMMENDATIONS TO COSTELLO COMMITTEE

Since there are but two sources of food supply (land and water); since fishermen produce more food per man-year than farmers, amend subsection (k) of section 5 of Selective Training and Service Act by adding "Fishery and Seafood" after the word "agricultural," so that said subsection (k), as amended, will read:

"Every registrant found by a selective service local board, subject to appeal in accordance with section 10 (a) (2), to be necessary to and regularly engaged in an agricultural, fishery, and seafood occupation or endeavor essential to the war effort, shall be deferred from training and service in the land and naval forces so long as he remains so engaged and until such time as a satisfactory replacement can be obtained."

Pending passage of such legislation to prevent stoppage of seafood production and/or processing, committee to issue statement recommending that General Hershey issue statement to all local draft boards leaving to such board right to grant deferments to those engaged in a fishery or seafood occupation or endeavor essential to the war effort, so long as satisfactory replacements cannot be obtained.

Mr. Speaker, this statement and others of similar purport are being placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the information of all concerned.

I include, also, a resolution adopted by the Commission of Fisheries of Virginia at its meeting March 28, 1944:

Whereas the sea-food industry is the largest producer of food in eastern Virginia, as well as one of the most important economic elements in this area; and

Whereas the continuance of this industry is threatened by the inability of those engaged in it to secure labor and particularly by the shortage of essential men experienced in its conduct; and

Whereas the shortage of experienced men will be made even more acute than it now is by the drafting of all men under 26 years of age unless the importance of this industry to our wartime economy be recognized and the essential men in said industry be granted deferment from the draft; and

Whereas it is the opinion of this Commission that as a large producer of food vital to the war effort at this time the sea-food industry is entitled to have those engaged in it deferred upon the same basis as deferments are granted to other food-producing industries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Commission of Fisheries of Virginia this day assembled in the city of Newport News, Va., That those in charge of selective service be, and they are hereby requested to grant to those engaged in essential functions in the sea-food industry deferments on the same basis as those granted to persons engaged in agriculture; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be certified to each of the Members of the United States Senate, and the House of Representatives from Virginia, and to the United States Office of the Coordinator of Fisheries, Washington, D. C.

Insurance and Air Commerce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, that insurance is an integral part of commercial air transportation is a conclusion to which the Civil Aeronautics Board has come in a study of aviation insurance which has just been made public. I desire, Mr. President, to call attention to one or two significant statements made in this report, and to ask that the conclusion reached by the Board may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The study was undertaken because the Civil Aeronautics Board has found that the cost of insurance is an important factor to be taken into consideration by the Board in fixing rates.

Now that we are about to enter a new era of international commerce by air, it is important to learn from this report that reinsurance with respect to air commerce is largely controlled abroad, just as reinsurance with respect to seagoing commerce has been controlled. The Civil Aeronautics Board reports that during the period from 1938 to 1942 the three underwriting groups which had 96 percent of all aviation insurance business paid out $20,911,131 in premiums for reinsurance abroad, while foreign insurers paid to these same three groups only $6,471 in reinsurance premiums. Twenty million dollars as compared to $6,000 can scarcely be regarded as a balance of commerce in favor of the United States; nor can this discrepancy be overlooked in the consideration of the encouragement of American enterprise in the post-war world.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed a few extracts which I have marked in the report, and I should like to say to those who may be interested that the Civil Aeronautics Board doubtless has copies of the study which will be available to those who may care to apply for it.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the study and the conclusion thereof were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Insurance is an integral part of air transportation as it is of all commercial enterprise. Air lines buy insurance to protect their investment in aircraft and other equipment against numerous and varied risks. Bankers financing the purchase of aircraft and other equipment require that it be insured. Shippers and bankers financing shipments also demand the protection of insurance for their goods while in transit.

The three leading underwriting groups reinsure among themselves and with foreign reinsurers. The amount of reinsurance among the three groups, however, has not been large, and some of it is placed for the purpose of achieving an approximately equal division of non-air-line business among themselves.

On the other hand, reinsurance abroad has been substantial, and, in fact, the British insurance market has been the primary source of reinsurance for our aviation insurance market. Table VII on page 20 shows that the percentage of premiums for reinsurance with foreign insurers has averaged 48.1 percent of the total premiums of the three groups during the 5-year period, 1938–42. During this period the three underwriting groups paid $20,911,131 in premiums for reinsurance abroad, while at the same time these groups have reported only $6,471 of reinsurance flowing to them from foreign insurers.

* * * * *

The use of this insurance power as a commercial weapon was summarized in a report by a committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce, headed by Gen. J. G. Harbord, as follows:

"Marine insurance has for years been regarded as a national commercial weapon which, when properly coordinated with banking and shipping, can be effectively used in acquiring and controlling important channels of trade. * * * In foreign countries the importance of team play between marine insurance companies, exporters, and shipping interests is recognized. Because of this it is possible for marine insurance companies to offer such differentials in insurance rates as to throw the imports and exports to vessels of their own nationality."

* * * * *

As a general rule, reinsurance contracts (treaties) give the reinsurer the right to information concerning the nature of the risk insured. Such information could endanger our national security if it became known, directly or indirectly, to a foreign country which then is or later becomes hostile to our interests. The problem is not only a matter of revealing the facts concerning individual projects insured, but also of the possible accumulation of large amounts of detailed data from a number of risks insured over a period of time which could be pieced together to yield information of great value to such a foreign country.

With regard to the use which might be made of such information, the experience of the French as stated in the following excerpts from an official French report is revealing:

"Germany does not need to take recourse to a mysterious organization of spies in order to be informed of our business concerns and to learn their resources and their means; she has only to consult the bordereaux and bulletins which the insurance and reinsurance companies pile up in their offices through their brokers. * * * These bordereaux and bulletins state the output of our factories, the machinery, the turnover, the rural production, what our vessels transport, and whereto they transport. It is easy to guess what advantage our enemy with its own methodical spirit, can draw from those materials."

CONCLUSION

The Federal Government has had, and without question will continue to have, a well-defined interest in the promotion and development of all aspects of aviation. Since aviation insurance can have an important influence upon the development and expansion of aviation, the Federal Government naturally will have an interest in seeing that the American aviation insurance market so functions that it makes the maximum contribution to that development and expansion. Accordingly, in order to serve as a foundation for an intelligent appraisal of the situation at all times, the Civil Aeronautics Board believes that there should be readily available to those agencies of government which have an interest in one or more phases of the national aviation program complete and current information regarding the functioning of the aviation insurance market. The unavailability of such data at the present time was clearly disclosed in the course of the Board's investigation, and necessitated the seeking of much specially prepared material.

As already pointed out, the investigation conducted by the Board does not purport to have been exhaustive. The Board has concluded that the information available to it as a result of such investigation does not permit of any final conclusions as to whether there are any respects in which the functioning of the aviation insurance market has not been consistent with the public interest in the development of aviation. In particular, the Board has decided that it cannot at this time determine whether the premium rates which have existed or now exist in aviation insurance are fair and reasonable. The experience during the periods examined revealed a high rate of profit during those particular periods, but there were factors which, when taken into account, made a final judgment impossible at this time. Consequently, it is believed that continued observation of the aviation insurance market is in order to ascertain whether that market is adjusting its rates as rapidly and as fully as is reasonably possible in relation to the progress made in the reduction of aviation hazards, and is otherwise accommodating itself to the development of aviation. It is believed that such observation can best be accomplished by providing for the power to obtain periodic reports of appropriate data disclosing the underwriting results of the American aviation insurance market.

It seems quite evident that the only efficient way to collect such information is through vesting appropriate authority and responsibility in a single agency of the Federal Government which can periodically collect reliable information from all companies or groups which are participating in the underwriting of aviation risks throughout this country. The necessary information which might be collected includes premiums earned, losses sustained, amount of overhead and general business expense assigned to the respective classifications of risks underwritten, and the amount of insurance or reinsurance placed abroad. The reporting of such information on a Nationwide uniform basis is necessary if a proper appraisal of the aviation-insurance market is to be made from time to time.

Such information should be available not only to the governmental agencies interested in aviation, but to the various classes of purchasers of aviation insurance. The information collected concerning the aviation-insurance market should, therefore, periodically be published in appropriate summary form so that it would, in the aggregate, at least, be readily available to such purchasers. It is believed that the possession of reliable information by purchasers of insurance regarding the over-all underwriting results of the aviation-insurance market with respect to the general classifications of risks in which they were interested could make a substantial contribution to the self-regulation of this market.

Voting Strength of States at National Conventions and Electoral College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, when the National Committee of the Democratic Party met in Washington some weeks ago, I stated that I believed that the two-thirds rule should be restored. Its repeal was opposed by me in 1936. Since that time there have followed some editorials in the newspapers, many of which I have seen, suggesting that perhaps the fairest method of selecting delegates was under the present procedure. In view of the South's great interest in the Democratic Party and in view of my unfaltering belief in our party, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD page 11 of the document Factual Campaign Information in which there appears a table showing the voting strength of the States at national conventions and in the electoral college.

Mr. President, at this time, without criticism, because it is entirely correct for the Republican Party to choose its delegates as is in their interest, I wish to call attention to the fact that the State of South Carolina, with a population of nearly two million, has only four delegates to the Republican convention, whereas States perhaps with only a few hundred thousand population have nine, ten and even more delegates. My purpose in calling attention to this matter is not to indulge in criticism but to inform those who contend that the present method of choosing delegates should not be changed, and that the two-thirds rule should have been abolished because now everything is right and just.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed ir the RECORD, as follows:

Italian Legal Codes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I rise to call attention to an article entitled "Italian Legal Codes on the Eve of the Allied Invasion," appearing in the Quarterly Journal of Current Acquisitions, published by the Library of Congress. A translation of the Italian legal codes is under way for the use of the military and now in the belief that the article may be of use to other branches of the Government, I ask unanimous consent that it be placed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ITALIAN LEGAL CODES ON THE EVE OF THE ALLIED INVASION

The fall of the Fascist regime in Italy left a complex and confusing legal heritage. Fascist law will doubtless be revised, but before the revision an inventory must be taken. Not only were numerous individual laws enacted to carry out Fascist principles, but an attempt was made to recodify completely all the major fields of law. Old codes were abrogated and new codes, like the Civil Code of 1942, were introduced on the eve of the fall of the regime. Some of these were printed in the edizione straordinaria of the Gazzetta Ufficiale, others as supplemento ordinario to individual numbers, frequently interrupting the pagination of the Gazzetta Ufficiale, which otherwise runs continuously through the year. Each code is usually accompanied by a report (relazione) stating the basic principles and the official reasons for the new provisions.

Some of the newly enacted codes, apart from a few Fascist provisions, represent, in the opinion of the Italian jurists in exile, an improvement upon the old codes. There is reason to believe that in substantial parts they may survive the fall of fascism in Italy. Their study cannot be neglected.

Recent acquisitions of the Law Library supply ample material for the study of Italian codification on the eve of our landing in Sicily. A survey of source material is offered below with the hope that it will pave the way for study and critical analysis:

1. Penal code. As early as October 19, 1930, a royal decree approved a new penal code to take effect on July 1, 1931. This code has remained in force except for a few unimportant amendments. An English translation of it was issued in London by His Majesty's Stationery Office in 1931. Several Italian editions are on the shelves of the Law Library, the most recent being that by F. Carnelutti in his collection, I Codici per l'Udienza (Padova, 1941). The most recent annotated edition is that by Luigi Valentino (6th ed., 1937). The latest commentary is that by Saltelli and Romano di Falco, Commento (2d ed., 4 v., 1940). The latest comprehensive treatise is that by Giuseppe Maggiore, Principi di Diritto Penale, Parte Generale (3d ed., 1939).

2. A new Code of Penal Procedure was enacted simultaneously with the penal code and was amended in 1937 and 1939. The latest edition available in the Library of Congress is the one by Carnelutti (supra). The latest annotated editions are by Parpagliolo (1936) and by Leone (1937) and the one by Ugo Conti (1937—vol. I only).

3. Military penal and courts-martial laws were revised during the war. Two new military penal codes, viz., one for peace and one for war, were promulgated by the royal decree of February 20, 1941.

These penal codes were followed by a reform of the courts martial by royal decree on the organization of military tribunals, which provided for different organizations in time of peace and in time of war. Excerpts from these enactments were translated and mimeographed by the Law Library in Courts Martial Law of Russia, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, and Japan, and the Disciplinary Code of Soviet Russia (Washington, D. C., 1943, pp. 41–58).

4. Judiciary Act (Ordinamento Giudiziario). The first Fascist regulation of the judicial system, embraced in the decree of December 30, 1923, No. 2786, was later considered to be insufficient by the Fascist leaders because it was a mere amendment to the old law of December 6, 1865, No. 2626, which antedated the formation of modern Italy.

Work on the preparation of a new Judiciary Act was begun in 1925 and a new Ordinamento Giudiziario was enacted as recently as January 30, 1941. It was put into effect on April 21, 1941. The Law Library has only this edition. A table listing all courts in Italy by region is appended to the act.

5. Civil procedure was also revised recently and a new code (Codice di procedura civile) was approved by the royal decree of October 28, 1940. It took effect on April 21, 1942, being slightly amended on April 20, 1942. These official editions are in the Law Library.

An outstanding feature of the Italian judiciary, namely, the special sections of the courts of appeals for deciding labor cases (magistratura del lavoro), has been retained with minor changes in the new codes. This special judicial set-up is well described by Manyon in The Italian Magistracy of Labor, 27 Michigan Law Review, pp. 869–920. There is no material in English on the new Code of Civil Procedure. The Law Library has a small monograph, by Bonini (1943), on execution under the new code.

6. Civil and commercial codes were also extensively revised. A new civil code was promulgated and put into effect in instalments. No completely new commercial code was enacted but several fields of law, hitherto embraced in the commercial code of 1882, were either treated by separate laws or were incorporated into the new civil code.

The civil code was enacted in separate books during the period from July 1, 1939, to April 2, 1942.

It is interesting to note the opinions voiced by Italian jurists in exile. Two articles, one by Alberto Montel, formerly professor of law in Turin, the first book of the New Italian Code, and the other by Mario Sarfatti, formerly of the University of Turin, the New Italian Civil Code, give a comprehensive survey and analysis of the first two books. These authors stress that the books on persons and on successions, except for a few provisions reflecting peculiar Fascist ideas of nationalism and racial discrimination represent in all other aspects a "noteworthy advance on the Civil Code of 1865." In the opinion of Mr. Sarfatti, "This code follows the line of the one of 1865, but it constitutes a great improvement as it completes, so far as possible, the rules that up till now had to be sought in the judicial decisions. * * * Each chapter is the result of elaborate research by some of the most respected Italian jurists; all parts have been discussed in committee and the code may be considered as the latest modern abridgment of Italian science of law."

Of the second book on Successions and Donations, Mr. Sarfatti writes: "A special decree relates it to the first part, so that the racial legislation which does not appear therein will equally apply as regards the limitation of the capacity of Jews. This is the only political touch; otherwise the whole work is the result of the development of juridical science in general in the various countries, notwithstanding various references in the report to Fascist morals as the foundation of the reforms. This part of the code does not contain new principles but the subject has been thoroughly revised so as to give a complete body of rules on wills and intestacy, many of them in a much-improved form." Mr. Montel agrees with this opinion.

The method of promulgation and putting into effect of the new civil code was perplexing. The individual books, each with sections separately numbered, were enacted. Thus the first book on Persons was promulgated on December 12, 1938, and took effect on July 1, 1939. The book on Successions and Donations was promulgated on October 27, 1939, and put into effect on April 21, 1940. The book on Property was promulgated on January 30, 1941, and took effect on October 28 of the same year. The rest of the code, containing the book on Obligations, the book on Labor, and the book on Protection of Rights, was enacted simultaneously on January 30, 1941, to take effect on April 21, 1942.

Thereafter the separate books were consolidated into a unit of 2,969 consecutively numbered sections (the old code had 2,147 sections) and some discrepancies were ironed out at this time. In this revised form the civil code was promulgated again by the royal decree of March 16, 1942, No. 262, and beginning with April 21, 1942, superseded the individual books of the code previously in force. The noted carta del lavoro, the declaration of the principles of a corporate state announced in 1927, was repromulgated in toto as a kind of preamble to the text of the code.

An analysis of the provisions of the new code cannot be given in this short note; yet a brief comparison of the new civil code with the old cannot be omitted.

The new code is wider in scope than the old. It has six books instead of three. The first book of both codes deals with the same subject matters—persons and family. A new distribution of material begins with the second book of the new code which covers successions and donations to which only a part of the second book of the old code was devoted, viz titles II and III.

Property, which was treated in the second and partly in the third book of the old code, constitutes now the contents of the entire third book.

Some provisions of the book on Property deserve special attention as an obvious attempt at a totalitarian approach to private ownership. The compilers of the code as it is stated in Relazione were inspired by the idea that the Fascist state "does not recognize the protection of private ownership as an innate right of the individual. Like all other rights, ownership has a social purpose and the legal order confers rights upon an individual because of such purposes."

This trend, which may be traced to the teachings of the French jurist, Duguit, who regarded rights as mere social functions, was expressed in section 811 of the New Italian Civil Code. This section stresses the view that property "is subject to the regulations of the corporate state with regard to the economic function of property and demands of national production."

Likewise, section 838 opens a possibly for administrative authorities to expropriate (with compensation) property of interest to national production if the proprietor "neglects the conservation, cultivation, or use of such property in a manner causing substantial harm to the demands of such production." Such expropriation goes far beyond the concept of eminent domain.

These provisions should be reconsidered after the fall of the Fascist regime.

The provisions on obligations which were treated in the third book of the old code were redistributed in the new code between the fourth book on obligations and the fifth book on labor. Out of the remainder of the provisions of the third book (evidence, statute of limitations, etc.), the sixth book of the new code was made.

The fourth book on obligation and the fifth book on labor are undoubtedly an innovation in Italian law due to the nature of subject matter treated therein. Alongside the contracts hitherto regulated by the old civil code and the strictly labor law topics, such as master and servant, collective bargaining, and so forth, these books regulate some fields which were traditionally considered as belonging not to civil but to commercial law, and were treated in the old commercial code.

Unlike the Anglo-American and Swiss legal systems, but more like the German and Austrian, the Italian law had no uniform rules for some contracts. In many instances there were two parallel sets of rules, one of civil law and another of commercial law, which remained to a large extent Lex Mercatorium i. e., a body of rules used in the trade. If a party to a certain contract was a merchant or if the purpose of a contract was commercial, e. g., if a purchase was made for the purpose of resale, the contract was considered a commercial transaction; it came, therefore, under the commercial and not under the civil code. Some contracts were considered commercial per se; e. g., insurance and banking transactions. Moreover, labor law, especially under the Fascist regime, developed into a separate branch of the legal system.

Now, in the drafting of the new civil code, the legislators intended to do away with the duality of the commercial and civil law, on the one hand, and to abolish, on the other, the separate treatment of labor law as a branch distinct from the others. These special fields were covered by the civil code and were treated jointly with other topics of civil law proper.

The laws enacting the fourth and fifth books do not specify the sections of the commercial code which were repealed by the new civil code. They state in a general way that those provisions of the commercial code are repealed "which are concerned with the subject matters dealt with" in the fourth and fifth books. Therefore, the repealed portions of the commercial code must be identified by a scrutiny of the topics treated in these books of the civil code.

Thus, in addition to the contracts to be found in the old civil code, the fourth book regulates agency, insurance, current accounts, and banking transactions, shipping, warehousing, brokerage, and so forth. This enumeration affects virtually all the "commercial" transactions provided for in the commercial code, and secs. 59–75, 345–479 of this code regulating such transactions may be considered repealed.

The Fifth Book on Labor deals not only with the usual topics of labor law, such as master and servant and collective bargaining (titles I–IV), but also with corporation law (titles V and XI, which have replaced provisions of title IX of the First Book of the Commercial Code). Thus the new regulations of partnership (secs. 2247–2324) are substituted for sections 76–125 of the Commercial Code; those on joint-stock companies (secs. 2325–2471), companies with limited liabilities (secs. 2472–2510), and cooperatives (secs. 2511–2574) replace sections 126–238 of the Commercial Code.

The remaining part of the Fifth Book on Labor treats copyright and patents (title IX) and unfair competition (title X). Some of these provisions have not been put into effect yet.

The Sixth Book on Protection of Rights deals with deeds and public records (formerly Book III, title XXII); evidence (formerly Book III, title IV, ch. V); responsibility for debts, mortgages, and pledges (formerly Book III, title XXIII); enforcement of claims (formerly dealt with partly in Book II, title XXVI). Title XXVI, like the last title of the old Code, is devoted to the statute of limitations.

The Law Library has the official editions of the separate books and of the entire code as it appeared in the Gazzetta Ufficiale, as well as several treatises and annotated editions of the first three books. Here belong commentaries by Pandolfi, Scarpello, Stella Richter, and Dallari on Books I, II, and III (1940); commentaries on Book I by N. and F. Stolfi (1939), by Azara and others edited by D'Amelio (1940); a commentary on Books I and II by Butera (1940); and a treatise by Azzariti and Martinez on Book I (1940).

A complete translation of the new Civil Code is now being prepared by Prince Guido Pignatelli in cooperation with the members of the staff of the Law Library.

An extensive bibliography of Italian writing on the new Civil Code is to be found in Arrigo Solmi, L'idea fascista nel nuovo codice civile (1940, pp. 177–187).

The Civil Code was not the only piece of legislation that affected the commercial code. New laws on negotiable instruments, that is, on bills and notes of December 14, 1933, and on checks of December 21, 1933, were put into effect on January 1, 1934. They were compiled in conformity with the international drafts prepared in Geneva in 1930 and 1931. The English texts of these drafts were printed in Geneva by the League of Nations at that time.

The Codice della Navigazione was enacted by the royal decrees of January 27, 1941, and March 30, 1942, and it took effect on April 21, 1942. This code supersedes the second book of the commercial code dealing with maritime law and the merchant marine code of 1877, with the subsequent regulations of 1879.

A striking feature of the Codice della Navigazione is that it not only regulates the maritime and inland waterways trade but also contains the air law. Therefore, it replaced the regulations on air navigation issued prior to the enactment of this code such as those of August 20, 1923, January 31, 1926, January 11, 1925, and others. Thus the code is the first attempt at a joint treatment of maritime and air law in a single piece of legislation.

The Disciplina del Fallimento of March 16, 1942, replaced the bankruptcy law included in book III of the commercial code.

Under such circumstances the commercial code, though not repealed, was so to speak, dissolved by the new legislation. Parts of the general provisions of the commercial code on merchants, books of accounts, and so forth, embraced in the first 57 sections are still in force. Beginning with section 58, however, the commercial code should be considered inoperative.

Shipping and the National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Shipping and National Defense," published in the February–March 1944 issue of the Grace Log, a magazine published by the W. R. Grace Co.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHIPPING AND THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

The current active discussion of the future of the American merchant marine has not yet come down to details. The exchange of ideas remains quite general and for the most part has been confined to mere assertions of opposing points of view, without going very deeply into the reasons why a merchant marine is or is not desirable for this country. There are given below certain considerations which should be in our minds when we begin a serious discussion of post-war shipping.

The primary functions of a merchant marine are to meet promptly and adequately the needs of commerce and defense, and its desirability to a nation depends upon the relative strength of these two needs, the possibility of using the ships of other nations, the direct and indirect costs of maintaining adequate national tonnage and the economic and military benefits to be derived therefrom. Manifestly, these factors must have different weight with different countries, for a small nation must in general depend upon larger nations for defense, and may also be unable to afford independent shipping services to carry its overseas trade. The United States is not in this category.

The United States is a major world power, having only one-fifteenth of the area and population of the earth but nearly one-half of its wealth and manufacturing facilities, the largest export trade and second largest import trade and a general standard of living that is the envy of other lands. It is fortunate in its neighbors and has not needed to maintain armies against them, and, in fact, ranked in 1938 well below many Balkan nations in army strength. It was in 1938 the major "have" nation since it had put its resources into the production of wealth rather than weapons and had depended upon the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, its navy and its friendship with the British Empire and France to see that those who preferred to loot rather than build were kept at a safe distance.

It considered the ocean a moat preventing access by potential enemies, but failed to make sure that shipping—the drawbridge across the moat—was hinged on our side, and could be let down or pulled up at our pleasure. On the west, the drawbridge belonged to Japan and on the east to Great Britain, Germany, Norway, Italy, and the other European maritime nations. We had in name a fairly large Merchant Marine, due to inclusion of huge tonnages of old coastal vessels, Great Lakes ships and laid-up craft remaining from the last World War, but in world overseas trade our ships were outnumbered about 12 to 1, and our proportion was decreasing year by year. Our naval position was better, since we had a fleet only slightly smaller than that of Great Britain and amounting to almost 25 percent of the world total, but in essence our future was dependent upon the active assistance or at least benevolent neutrality of the British merchant and naval fleets. In like manner Great Britain depended upon the French army and the armies of France's European allies.

This dependence on others was based on two considerations: First, that maintenance of adequate armies by Great Britain, and of an adequate merchant marine and armies by us, was expensive in time of peace; second, that time would be available in case of war to build up to the necessary level. But others were also doing their own calculating, and the Axis noted that while in commerce time may be money, in war money is not a substitute for time.

There was not time to go to Poland's aid, nor time to counter the German coup in Norway. The time lag between German construction of planes and tanks and counter-construction by the Allies was such that the Axis force—already in being—struck down the Anglo-French Armies before the greater resources of the Allies could right the balance. There was a period of many months when it looked as though Great Britain would go the way of France and leave the United States to face alone a probable attack by enemies many times stronger in armies, air forces, and merchant ships, and somewhat superior to us in naval power. If Great Britain had been forced to surrender and deliver to the Axis even a part of the British Navy and merchant marine, the Axis would have been able to invade this hemisphere at will and quite possibly such an invasion could have succeeded. In fact, it looked as though even a flight of the British Navy to Canada would do no more than postpone matters, for, due to our peacetime neglect, the shipyards of Europe and Japan were so far in excess of our own in capacity that they could outbuild us in a year or two, and then attack before we could expand our facilities and catch up with them. At the least, the Axis could hope to hold the Old World and perhaps much of South America indefinitely from mere lack of ships in our hands to transport our armies before the enemy dug in.

When the air campaign against Great Britain failed the submarine campaign began, and it was Axis calculation that the small merchant marine of the United States, and our smaller shipbuilding capacity, would render it impossible for us to prevent eventual starvation of the British and the occupation by the Axis of at least the British territories in Africa and the east.

That campaign came uncomfortably close to succeeding. To defeat it and to move our armies abroad the United States has been building 50,000,000 dead-weight tons of new merchant ships at a total cost of over $12,000,000,000. Adding in the many more billions which have had to be spent by our Navy and Army, and in the future will be spent, to make up for time and opportunity lost by inadequate overseas transportation, it becomes evident that we are paying an excessive price for our peacetime shipping economies.

Putting aside the nearly fatal loss in time, caused by not having adequate shipping in being or adequate shipbuilding facilities already built, let us consider for a moment this matter of direct money loss caused by forced emergency construction. As everyone knows, the cost of constructing merchant vessels is much higher under emergency war conditions than it is in time of peace, and the standardized ships being turned out for war purposes are not of as high quality as those which we could have previously constructed had we been more foresighted. We thus lose both time and money through our mistaken economy and our reliance on the more economical transportation furnished by others. It would be just as sound by abstract economics and as foolish by considerations of common prudence to hire Japanese at a few cents a day to man our battleships as it has proven to be to depend upon the more economical merchant fleets of others in a world where wars may come again and where ships not in our hands may be used against us.

But, returning to direct costs, we can calculate that if the ships now being built had been constructed in time of peace they would have cost not over six to eight billion dollars. Of course, we could not have operated any such fleet in time of peace and therefore the direct saving of four to six billion dollars indicated is hardly realistic. We would, however, easily have operated an additional 10,000,000 tons of merchant shipping and the construction saving on this would have been of the order of $1,000,000,000. Further large sums would have been saved on emergency shipyard construction, and we would have had much less of a strain in the last 2 years on our labor supply and steel, so that munitions would have been produced faster and at lower cost.

COMPARISON OF COSTS

To operate the additional 10,000,000 tons in time of peace would have cost us perhaps as much as $40,000,000 per annum in operating subsidies, but over the whole 20-year life of a ship this would not equal the total amount which we now waste in additional construction costs, and we would have had the tonnage available for instant use, manned by trained sailors, and thus would have saved months of time in bringing this war to an end. Every day the war lasts costs us $250,000,000, and the cost in soldiers' lives of our initial maritime weakness can only be speculated upon.

Also, a larger merchant marine under American control in time of peace would have implied a smaller merchant marine under Axis control, for in the 15 years preceding 1938 it was our merchant marine which decreased year by year and it was predominantly Axis shipping which moved into the gap which our tonnage left. A smaller Axis merchant marine would have greatly weakened the war potential of these aggressor nations, and this should be borne in mind in assessing the cost to us of maintaining ships in future. If only a fair part of the postulated 10,000,000 tons of American shipping had been operated in the Pacific, the great commercial fleet developed by Japan largely out of United States trade profits would have been relatively smaller. Japan would probably have never struck at Pearl Harbor had the disparity in merchant fleets not been so strongly in her favor.

This somewhat lengthy review of the war is given solely to bring out points which have been much neglected in current discussion of post-war shipping plans. It is true that the United States must depend in part for its future security on cooperation with the United Kingdom and with the other maritime nations of western Europe, but it decidedly does not follow that it is to our interest—or fundamentally to the world interest—to see the preponderance of naval or maritime strength in British or continental European hands. With development of rocket planes and other devices now merely hinted at, Great Britain is no longer a secure base and it might be overrun in any future war as easily as Norway, Netherlands, and France were in this one, or as Belgium was in the war preceding. In such a case the only hope for the British would rest in having power instantly available in the hands of the United States to control the sea and thus be able to move its forces to the rescue.

A TWO-WAR LESSON

The history of two wars shows that the democratic world no longer can rely primarily upon relatively small countries adjacent to potential aggressors as sources of shipping service or naval power in time of war. Also, even in World War No. 1 we found that British shipping and shipbuilding were not adequate to serve the commerce and war effort of the Allies, and that a very large and expensive emergency shipbuilding program had to be undertaken by this country. In an even more serious war we find the British and other foreign merchant marines and shipbuilding capacity even less adequate, due not to any unwillingness to build or operate, but to the fact that Great Britain, Netherlands, Norway, and so forth, simply are not big enough in population or industry to be any longer the primary workshop in any modern war, and with the growth of air power, are exposed to bombing and to "blitz" capture by European enemies.

In spite of considerable efforts, the British Empire has been unable in this war to do more than replace its naval losses. In merchant shipbuilding it has fallen considerably short of such replacement. For obvious reasons the other Allies, of course, can build little in this war. This means that the United States has had to carry by far the greater part of the burden of needed merchant and naval construction and operation, and it has been admitted by British representatives that without our construction, the war must have been lost before now. Fortunate indeed for this country and the United Nations, that due to the broadly conceived Merchant Marine Act of 1936, the United States did have a pattern, its shipbuilders were launching fine modern liners and freighters and these were being ably operated by the American Flag Lines. It was this vital nucleus of experienced management and seagoing personnel that enabled the lines to accept and so creditably discharge the great task so suddenly thrust upon them by the war. For it is a fact, not even yet generally known, that our enormous overseas merchant marine today is being operated for the War Shipping Administration by the private steamship companies.

INFLUENCE IN TIME OF WAR

If we had previously maintained as a national policy a larger active merchant marine and a larger shipbuilding industry, the war might have been won by this time, since it has been the shipping shortage which has until recently prevented full exertion of our strength and allowed our enemies to fortify their conquests so as to make recapture costly in dollars, time, and lives. Of course, as we have pointed out, we could not have maintained, in time of peace, all of the shipping and shipbuilding required to win this war, nor could any other nation maintain this, but we could have gotten off to a running start rather than a walking one and have saved many months in attaining maximum building output and in training crews. Even a month cut off the length of the war would save the Treasury nearly $8,000,000,000.

The primary consideration for the United States is the need for a large merchant fleet in time of emergency. The weak geographic location, relatively small population, and dispersed power of our potential democratic allies in any future war is such that we cannot afford to rely upon them for our defense upon the sea. In any future war the tonnage and shipbuilding facilities of our present allies might easily be seized by an aggressor, and hence considerations of national policy should dictate that the United States maintain in the future, a navy, an air force, and a merchant marine fully adequate in themselves to maintain us successfully in any emergency which might arise.

EFFECT ON FOREIGN SHIPPING

By maintaining a large share of world shipping and shipbuilding in the future we will, of course, decrease the potential shipping and shipbuilding of other countries. Had this been done in previous years, both our present allies and our present enemies would have had less tonnage, but on net balance our allies would have benefited because a larger proportion of world tonnage would have been in United Nations hands. There is an apparent conflict in this matter between the short-term interests of the British, Norwegians, Netherlanders, and other allies and their long-term interests. A smaller American merchant marine in time of peace means more dollars to foreign shipping interests, and yet in time of war it may mean ruin to our allies and ourselves not to have the United States strong at sea. This dilemma has been frankly faced by Sir Arthur Salter, head of the British Shipping Mission, who recently reminded Parliament that the American merchant marine should not be looked upon as something which threatened British interests but as an instrument which had three times in this war saved the British Empire from destruction.

We believe that if our own statesmen and our foreign friends bear in mind that this world is not yet perfect and that some other Hitler may arise in the future, they will scarcely desire to limit the American merchant marine. Unless we maintain powerful naval forces, and a merchant marine large enough to make such forces effective, any major war which may be fought in the future may either be fought on our own soil or else may see the destruction, one by one, of our Allies and friends elsewhere, for lack of ability on our part to reach them in time. A larger American merchant marine is necessary as national insurance and what we will have to pay to keep the policy effective is only an insignificant fraction of the sums which our neglect of American shipping has cost us twice in 25 years.

This war has shown that at sea in any future conflict we must depend upon ourselves rather than upon allies; that maintaining a large merchant marine in time of peace is cheaper than improvising one in a national emergency, and that the high cost of building and operating American tonnage as compared with foreign tonnage is something which we will simply have to endure in the same fashion that we endure the cost of maintaining a preponderant air force and navy.

NEED TO INCREASE WORLD TRADE

We realize that to maintain a large American merchant marine will involve expense to the American Government, since we pay our sailors and shipyard workers much more than similar workers get abroad. We also realize that we must operate our ships in order to have them effective for emergency use, since although it is possible to lay up tonnage it is not possible to lay up skilled sailors. This means that we must carry a larger amount of world trade than in 1939, and unless means can be found for increasing the total of world trade—which is the statesmanlike thing to do—that this will mean fewer dollars earned by foreign shipping companies.

A calculation prepared by the Department of Commerce shows that foreign countries had average net earnings of only some $40,000,000 per annum from the United States through shipping services in pre-war years. This is mentioned here to show the insignificant nature of this economic factor as compared with the costs incurred in national defense. A slight increase in American tourist travel abroad or a decrease in our tariffs would easily make up for any loss experienced by foreign countries through our maintenance in future of a merchant marine adequate for our defense and the general defense of the democratic world.

The Inter-American Highway in Costa Rica

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, April 1 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Forty-Million-Dollar Lesson," by Alvaro Facio, published in the March 1944 issue of the Inter-American.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORTY-MILLION-DOLLAR LESSON

(by Alvaro Facio)

A COSTA RICAN TELLS HOW UNITED STATES ARMY ENGINEERS WASTED MONEY, MEN, AND MATERIALS WORKING ON INTER-AMERICAN HIGHWAY

(The editors are convinced after careful and thorough checking that the picture presented is accurate. The article is not being published for the sake of sensation, but rather in an effort to point out some of the dangers to be avoided in our growing program of hemisphere collaboration.)

Up to June 1942, most of the people of Costa Rica had a warm regard for the democratic principles of the good neighbor to the north, and a high respect for the almost legendary efficiency of the norteamericanos. Since that date, when the United States Army Engineers took up the task of rushing completion of the Inter-American Highway, from the Panama Canal to southern Mexico, my countrymen's faith in the good neighbor policy has gone steadily downhill. General respect and admiration for the norteamericanos, based on hearsay, has been changed by first-hand contact to bewilderment, to contempt, and in some cases to hatred.

There are only two reasons for this situation, both simple ones. The first lies in the kind of men who were brought from the United States to work on the highway; the second, in the colossal waste which was part of every operation, every cost sheet that I saw, every report that I heard, during my employment by the Army engineers.

When military necessity demands speed, it is not possible to find a diplomat to drive every tractor. Yet it would not have taken much time to impress on each man that he was being hired for work in someone else's country, and that he would do well to observe at least the fundamental customs of the land. That simple step would have speeded up the job tremendously by insuring good morale among the Costa Rican laborers, who are not unique in working better under reasonable and humane conditions than under rough treatment.

Instead, most of the United States contractors to whom the Army gave contracts for various stretches of the road hired anybody who would walk into their offices in the United States and say he was a truck or tractor driver, mechanic, welder, dragline operator, or carpenter. Apparently little effort was made to check the records of the men hired. I was told by one man on the job that he had been a soda jerker and had never been on a tractor in his life until he was landed in Costa Rica. That man and many like him were getting $1.80 an hour (plus time and a half for about 30 weekly hours of overtime), and food and shelter for learning to drive a tractor while the United Nations waited for the road to be finished. Most of the foremen and some of the superintendents I came in contact with seemed to have no greater knowledge of highway construction than the soda jerker.

This type of incompetence, being widespread, caused bewilderment and first doubts of yanqui efficiency among my countrymen. But the contempt and hatred grew from the attitude of the norteamericanos toward the Costa Ricans. The laborers were generally treated as a low species of animal. If an order spoken in English was not understood, it was shouted, presumably on the theory that any man can understand English if the speaker yells loud enough. When the yells failed, the laborer was sometimes shoved roughly toward his task.

Though there were available many experienced Costa Rican truck and tractor drivers out of work, the contractors on the highway would not hire them except as common labor. The reason? The good neighbors from the north refused to work with the inferior "natives."

A number of my friends and I were employed in professional capacities such as office engineers, surveymen, radio operators, draftsmen, auditors, paymasters, but to most of the norteamericanos we were "spicks" and "jigs." Though all of us had college educations and thought ourselves fully the social equal of the average United States truck driver, we were forced to eat at separate mess tables, to use different bunkhouses and washrooms. It was not uncommon for one of the truck-driving aristocracy to yell at us in the mess hall to "stop talking that damn spick and talk English."

The Army engineers, who were in charge of all jobs, apparently never made any serious or consistent effort to control this discrimination. Since that year of work on the Inter-American Highway represented the only contact of hundreds of my countrymen with people of the United States, perhaps they may be pardoned for feeling skeptical about their good neighbors.

The waste of time, money, and material might be considered none of my business, since the Army engineers were spending North American money. However, that waste so influenced Costa Rican popular opinion about the United States that I feel it should be discussed. Moreover, as an engineering student I was taught that an ethical engineer does the best possible job with the least possible waste, and I protest against any operation reflecting discredit on my profession.

Each contractor was given a cost-plus contract, which would enable him to spend any amount of money on his section of the road and still make a profit. He was also given a high priority to buy any equipment he wanted to build a road through country he had never seen. Every piece of equipment was to draw a high rental from the Army. Naturally the contractors bought every conceivable type of machinery, since they didn't know what they might need. There was no evidence that the Army engineers made any effort to supervise the type or amount of equipment purchased. In addition, some of the contractors sent down equipment that was completely worn out and unusable. Rental was paid on such equipment as if it were new.

There is no reliable estimate of what percentage of the equipment shipped was excess or unsuitable; but at El Volcán, Panama, where I last worked on the highway, there was much brand new road-building machinery which had never been uncrated, on which the Army had paid rental for many months. Specific examples are two large Euclid dump trucks which were towed to the job site in February 1942. Neither of these trucks turned a wheel until the last of September. Their original price was about $14,000 each, and during their months of idleness each one drew a total of about $11,000 rental. Wheeled road scrapers, which were rarely used, drew rental at about the same rate. Tractors, many of which were used, cost $4,500 originally, drew up to $9,700 in rental, to which was added approximately $2,000 for an overhaul job. It must not be forgotten that in addition to these rates, the Army furnished all fuel, oil, repair parts, and labor, and shipped the machines down in the first place.

In the section of the project with which I was familiar there were four divisions, San Isidro and Golfito in Costa Rica, and El Volcán and Concepción in Panama. Equipment rental alone for one division came to about $22,000 a week.

A surplus of material is, of course, desirable in any operation of military necessity, and one could feel more complacent about idle labor and machinery if that in use had been used efficiently. That it was not, seemed to be equally the fault of the contractors and the Army engineers.

A good example of inefficient distribution was the use of men at San Isidro. Twenty-odd truck and tractor drivers, electricians, mechanics—a full maintenance and operating force—arrived at San Isidro during the latter half of 1942. No equipment was sent up to them until the middle of May 1943. During that time they worked, not very enthusiastically, as laborers. Most of these men were getting $1.55 an hour. Some of them got $1.80. A few drew $1.05, the minimum pay for North Americans. Costa Rican labor would have done the same work at 50 to 60 cents, United States, per day.

Southern Costa Rica is chopped up into a crazy pattern of steeply rising mountains, deep valleys, hills, ravines, and gulches which can hardly be imagined by anyone who has not seen the country. The whole is covered with dense forest and jungle. Nevertheless, inland from Golfito, where a feeder road was being built eventually to connect with the highway, the contractor was trying to use a great 18-cubic-yard 6-wheel dump truck. Rental was about $1,800 a month on the 40-foot monster, which could no more maneuver in that region than a horse can turn around in a filing cabinet. The machine spent about half its time in the ditch, most of the other half being slowly filled by the tiny three-fourths-yard shovel, which took 22 minutes to load it.

Capt. Mariano Menaza chartered his 500-ton steamer Don Rafael to the Army in the middle of September 1943, at $500 a day plus expenses. The Don Rafael lay at Puntarenas for 1 month and 4 days without lifting anchor. It then made one trip with virtually no cargo to Puerto Armuelles, Panama, about an 18-hour trip. On the return trip the ship carried around 30 contractors' men and Army engineers—no cargo. Captain Menaza obtained release from the charter so that he could put his ship back in the island trade.

The San José office force, including officer engineers, draftsmen, bookkeepers, clerks, stenographers, and so forth, consisted of more than 175 people. Most of these individuals did very little work, simply because there was not enough work to keep so many people busy.

When it became evident that many more men had been imported than could be used, neither the Army nor contractors made any attempt to weed out the troublemakers, loafers, drunks, and incompetents, and send them back to the States, though the 6 months' contracts stated that drunkenness, insurbordination, or incompetence would cancel the contract.

Urged to send certain men home for the good of the job, the Army engineers said that it was "too expensive." Fare to Los Angeles or New York is under $150. Yet most of these men averaged more than $125 a week, not counting the expensive tinned food which they consumed.

Despite this extravagance with money, equipment, and men, the Army engineers would have had much to show for their efforts if they had been willing to ask advice of engineers, both North American and Costa Rican, who had studied local construction problems for years and who knew the region intimately. But the Army engineers, few of whom knew anything at all about the country, not only did not seek advice, they generally scorned it when it was offered.

The United States Public Roads Administration has been working in Costa Rica since 1932, and rare indeed are cases of bad feeling between their staff and my countrymen. They employ in their San José office around 30 people (to the Army's 175), mostly Costa Ricans. They have accomplished excellent results, building slowly, because they have lacked money and equipment. But the roads they build stay built, and when they spend money, there is more road to show for it. It is unfortunate that among many Costa Ricans the United States is judged by the Army's much larger operation.

The Army did accept the maps and surveys of the United States Public Roads people, who have done a thorough and efficient job of mapping the area, but these maps were disregarded as often as not. The Public Roads people even sent a man to flag, or mark with stakes, the line they had decided upon after years of work in the region. The Army surveyors followed the Public Roads line only when it pleased them. They tried to take the road over mountains when it would have been cheaper, easier, and quicker to take it around. They got little stretches of road partly finished, only to have the rains wash them away. In flat country, sometimes they built the road in unnecessary curves when a straight line would have saved time and money.

All this might have been justified if the Army had finished the highway. But in southern Costa Rica, in the 99 miles from San Isidro to the Panamanian border, there is not one mile of usable road. There is not even a roadbed which the public roads engineers can use in continuing their painstaking work. Road engineers with more experience than I have and whose opinions I respect, estimate that the Army spent about $10,000,000 in this region. No one but the contractors and the imported North American labor have benefited.

The approximately 100 men who were working out of Golfito built in 1 year 5 miles of all-weather road. This starts 10 miles inland at the railhead of the United Fruit Railway. The road, which was to connect with the highway, ends abruptly in the jungle, and within a year of the time this is written the jungle will have reclaimed every foot of it.

There is ample proof that all these errors of operation could have been avoided. For example, the United States Air Forces rushed to completion installations in Central America a few years ago. Men of the Army Air Forces, both enlisted men and officers, are constantly in and out of San Jose, and relations between them and the Costa Ricans are excellent.

It is true that I saw the darkest possible side of the picture, for the stretch of country where I worked is the worst part of the entire Inter-American Highway route. I understand that the Army and the contractors did much better in Honduras, El Salvador, Nicaragua, and northern Costa Rica, where the going is not so tough. They are said to have built some stretches of road within a reasonable figure, if not always on a reasonable line.

When the Army went into the job, there were 625 miles of road to build. The Army Engineers' office claims to have completed 311 miles of standard, all-weather road and 137 miles of substandard all-weather road, plus considerable clearing of the right-of-way and grading.

North and Central American engineers tell me that of the Army's construction, more nearly 200 miles are usable and possible to link up with the rest of the highway. It is problematical how much of the clearing and grading can be salvaged by the Public Roads Administration, since a good deal of it is off their line. In addition, much of the grading done by the Army on the highway line will be washed away during the approaching rainy season, before the Public Roads people can complete these stretches.

The Army Engineers spent about $40,000,000 on the project. Arbitrarily allowing a generous ten million for the salvageable clearing and grading, the cost of the remaining 200 miles of completed useful road comes to $150,000 per mile.

Road construction is high in Central America, but not that high. A good average figure, including the worst and best stretches, is about $40,000 per mile. Experienced engineers have estimated that the terrible 99 miles from San Isidro to the Panamanian border should cost about $7,500,000, or $75,000 per mile, for a 19-foot wide, all-weather oiled road.

It is difficult for a North American to realize what that highway means to Central America. We are five little countries, and only two, Guatemala and El Salvador, are connected by road. The rest of us sit isolated in our mountains, dependent on slow transportation by water or expensive transportation by air. Our country people have no quick way of getting their produce to market, and cattle from our grazing regions lose much of their weight and value before they arrive at a selling place.

Education of our rural populations is difficult and slow because we cannot reach them except at great effort and expense. There is no true interchange of ideas among the remaining three nations because the air and shipping lines are North American, bringing mostly North American ideas. It can perhaps be understood that we are deeply disappointed to see our dream again dissolve when it could so easily have come true.

I am more fortunate than most of my countrymen in having been able to live and study in the United States. I know that most of the North Americans are friendly, generous, and democratic. I know that the fabulous yanqui efficiency is no myth, for I have seen the tremendous things it has accomplished in your country. I have brought up these unpleasant things about the highway not to be a sorehead, but in the hope that some of those who read this article will investigate the facts and take steps to see that the North Americans will not again have their money needlessly wasted and their reputation damaged by irresponsible people.

Letter From Constituent Serving Overseas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I know every Member of the House likes to have first-hand information from men and women now serving in our Army and Navy. The following letter is from a constituent of mine now serving overseas. His letter contains food for thought:

ENGLAND, January 20, 1944.

DEAR FOLKS: How is everything at home? No letters for a couple of days, now. I suppose it is this damnable dock strike. They sort of picked a tender place to put their knife this time, didn't they? It sure does show their friendship for the services. Boys in camp get as many as 20 letters at once, after waiting a week or more. I suppose the strikers will get a pat on the back instead of a couple of months in clink. Oh, well, it's none of my business, I suppose. I just make 60 bucks a month, and the United States Government doesn't like us to strike. Why should I get peeved if a bunch of men(?) who make that, and a good deal more, a week back in the States feel they have the right to stop mail delivery to get a few more dollars a week? Tell me, do they put the extra money into bonds?

Also this: What are you going to do about it, and the hundred of circumstances like it? The fishing strikes in Massachusetts, the coal strikes in Pennsylvania. We can't do anything except sweat out the next one. You people at home are the ones that have the power to make it a capital offense. We hear that the public kicks about being called complacent. All right, if they aren't that, they must have the well-known "don't give a damn" attitude. Well, if they don't care, we do. God knows our position here in E. T. O. isn't tough like the boys in Italy or the ones fighting Tojo. Still we do have one thing in common—we want to come home. It's the folks back there that will bring us home quickly or keep us away indefinitely. Our squawk can only reach home on paper. Yours can go as far as you want to push it. My feeling in the matter is just exactly this: If any member of my family was involved in a strike or a let-down in production, I would never recognize him or her as a relative again. I'll close now, and pray that the board of censors will let this pass to where it will do some good.

Please, sir, let this through.
All the love in a son's heart.

St. Lawrence Seaway Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, it is very significant to note on March 15–16, 1944, the State Legislature of the Empire State of New York adopted a resolution by unanimous vote declaring for the prompt development of the St. Lawrence River.

This resolution refers to the bill introduced by Senator AIKEN, of Vermont—S. 1385. Senator AIKEN's bill is a companion bill and identical in its language with a bill introduced on March 23, 1943, by myself, and the number is H. R. 2280, which bill is now pending before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the House of Representatives.

Many, of course, recall that in the Seventy-seventh Congress the Rivers and Harbors Committee acted favorably on this seaway power project after hearings extending over a period of many months.

For reasons I do not here relate the St. Lawrence seaway power project, which was included in the rivers and harbors omnibus bill, was never permitted to come on the floor of the House for a vote.

I am very glad to note the action taken by the New York Legislature. This resolution was placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Senator AIKEN on March 22, 1944. In this connection, I wish to call attention to resolutions adopted unanimously at a meeting held at Massena, N. Y., March 30, 1944, attended by mayors, individual members of boards of supervisors, the legislature, and the chambers of commerce in northern New York. Those resolutions are as follows:

Whereas the Northern Federation of Chambers of Commerce and its membership are vitally interested in the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project; and

Whereas the welfare of the people of the State of New York is directly concerned in the successful completion of the project; and

Whereas the development of the St. Lawrence River will remove the last major obstacles to deep-draft navigation throughout the Great Lakes system to the Atlantic Ocean and the ports of the world; and

Whereas the same development will simultaneously make available 1,100,000 horsepower of low-cost hydroelectricity, under a self-liquidating State power project; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of New York on March 15–16, 1944, by unanimous vote adopted a resolution declaring that this State urgently requires the prompt development of the St. Lawrence to furnish low-cost power to millions of industrial, rural, commercial, and domestic consumers; and

Whereas the Aiken bill, S. 1385, is now pending before the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, under which those benefits may be realized without further delay: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Northern Federation of Chambers of Commerce of the State of New York, representing a score of separate communities and civic and trade organizations throughout the St. Lawrence Valley, declares its unqualified support of this project as an imperative necessity for post-war reconstruction in this area, and for the future balanced growth and development of the entire Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That we appeal for the immediate enactment of the Aiken bill, S. 1385, authorizing the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Development, as a post-war project, and strongly urge the United States Senators and Representatives of the State of New York and the Congress of the United States to give this measure their active support.

Mr. Speaker, it is to the everlasting credit of the people of northern New York to continue the fight which they have carried on over a long period of time in support of a project that will contribute to the welfare of every man and woman not only in New York but throughout the country.

I also wish to quote the address of Senator Rhoda Fox Graves, chairman of the committee on agriculture, in the New York State Legislature, March 15, 1944, in support of the Graves-Daniels concurrent resolution recommending prompt measures for development of the St. Lawrence River:

The adoption of the concurrent resolution will simply place the Legislature of the State of New York on record in favor of the prompt, post-war development and utilization of our unrivalled water-power resources.

The State's program for the conservation and use of these rich resources, under the inalienable ownership of the people of the State of New York, had its inception under the administrations of Gov. Theodore Roosevelt and Gov. Charles E. Hughes. We now have an opportunity to carry that program to a fruition—which has been long overdue—under the broad policies of post-war reconstruction outlined under the leadership of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey.

Development of our water-power resources on the St. Lawrence River is today a matter of urgent public need, recognized and confirmed by every wartime experience of production in this section and in other sections of the United States and Canada. We must carry this program forward to serve the following purposes:

1. To bring cheap power to the industries and to the farms of the State so that we may maintain profitable production after the war on a parity with other areas which have already greatly expanded their water-power development.

2. To bring low-cost hydroelectricity to the more than 4,000,000 domestic, rural, and small commercial consumers in New York State, who are today paying charges for electric service running, in some cases, more than 100 percent above the charges for the same service in other areas.

3. To make available to our people a sufficient supply of hydroelectricity at a cost low enough to encourage increased consumption and bring electrical appliances within the reach of millions of homemakers in the cities and on the farms of New York State.

4. To place an abundant supply of low-cost hydroelectric power at the disposal of new industries and new enterprise, so that our returning service men and women will find enlarged opportunities for profitable employment here at home, and will not be obliged to follow out of New York State the industries which have been transferring their expansion programs to areas which have enormous blocks of low-cost power to offer from their developed water-power resources.

5. To put a stop to the prodigal waste involved in letting 1,100,000 horsepower on the St. Lawrence River rush unharnessed to the sea, while we continue to import immense quantities of coal, oil, and other exhaustible natural resources into this State for consumption as fuel in steam power plants, thus contributing to recurring fuel shortages and high fuel prices.

There is another urgent reason why the Legislature of the State of New York should at this time go on record in unmistakable terms in favor of the development of our great water power resources.

A bill has been introduced in the United States Senate (S. 1385), by Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN of Vermont providing for the development of the St. Lawrence River in cooperation with our neighbor and ally, the Dominion of Canada. This bill provides for construction of the power development in New York in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence, as a State project under State ownership and control. This project will be entirely self-liquidating. Every penny of the cost of the development will be paid out of revenues from the sale of power, without any burden whatever upon the taxes or credit of the State, under the terms of the Aiken bill. This bill, moreover, fixes a ceiling of $93,375,000 on the costs to be assumed by the power authority of the State of New York, so that it will be possible to make this hydroelectricity available to our people, on a parity with the costs enjoyed today on the Pacific coast, in Canada, and in other areas.

The Aiken bill is based upon an agreement with the Dominion of Canada which provides for the completion of the St. Lawrence development by 1949. This agreement and the pending bill carry out the terms of earlier accords recommended and initiated by President Coolidge and President Hoover and both have been approved by a nonpartisan vote of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the last Congress, after extended investigation and public hearings.

The adoption of the pending resolution will serve notice that New York desires, and is determined to obtain, the full benefit of the development of its water power resources, as a State project, under State ownership and control. In 1940, again in 1942, and in subsequent public statements Governor Dewey has consistently gone on record in favor of the St. Lawrence project. In 1942 its completion was pledged in the Democratic and American Labor Party State platforms. We should act, and act now, consistent with the redemption of these pledges, to give New York State parity in cheap power supply with other areas, to insure a place for our great water power resources in the Nation-wide programs for post-war development now in the making, in the interest of our agriculture, our manufacturers, our service men and all our people.

Warning From Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Missoula Sentinel, Missoula, Mont., of March 25, 1944:

WARNING FROM FARLEY

"Liberty and good government," said James A. Farley, erstwhile chairman of the Democratic National Committee and former Postmaster General, in a St. Patrick's day address, "are not lost in sudden cataclysms. Political cave-ins occur only where the ground is soft. It is the erosion and rotting of the ground that really do the damage. And the pity of it is that few are sensitive enough in eye or ear to perceive what is going on. * * *

"One symptom is carelessness with the truth. Political adventurers are past masters on the art of manipulating language so that the false that serves their purpose is presented to the people rather than the truth that does not serve them so well. It is not only a matter of direct falsehood, but of suppression of truth, and the suggesting of the false by adroit phrasing and implication. * * *

"Another symptom is lack of moral scruple—a lax willingness to let expediency be the guide to all political action. If there is an advantage to be gained, do not be restrained by any moral principle binding in conscience, for there is no such thing. Take whatever action will gain your end. Here I remember one example so apt that I cannot resist the temptation of citing it. A former official who represented the Government in tax matters said that if to win a tax case for the Government on Monday he had to claim that a certain principle was true, and if, to win another tax case on Tuesday, he had to protest that the same principle was completely false, he would not hesitate to do both.

"A third symptom: Abject reliance of the citizen on the state. To put it in Biblical terms, a willingness to sell your political soul for a mess of economic pottage. This is beyond question the most serious of all discernible tendencies in modern states, including our own. The hard fact is that nowhere, in politics, economics, or anywhere else, do you get something for nothing. It is the third temptation of Christ all over again.

"Thus it happens that the public conscience becomes debauched and whole peoples sell themselves, imperceptibly but irrevocably, into bondage. We have seen it happen in our own time."

And there is danger that it will happen in our own America. There are those who are tempting us with the kind of promises that Hitler held out to his own countrymen to sell our birthright for security—most likely the security of the politicians. Mr. Farley knows probably as well as anyone the mechanism and the working processes of the particular kind of government under which we are operating at present and have been in the immediate past. He is warning us against acceptance of the pottage that is being offered. Bondage to the state lies at the end of the road.

Farm Security Administration Activities in the State of Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit some very interesting information relative to the Farm Security Administration activities in Michigan.

The following schedule is broken down into congressional districts, and shows the number of families that Farm Security Administration has helped, the amount of loan funds advanced, the repayments made, and so forth. No reference is made in these compilations to the five-hundred-odd families in Michigan that have been able to join cooperatives through Farm Security Administration participation loans, nor to the families helped through feed and seed loans during the drought years.

Adjudicating Claims by the Veterans' Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, reference has been made on more than one occasion to the delay by the Veterans' Administration in adjudicating claims. The Administration has done its best to speed up all settlement of claims referred to it. The following remarks by Mr. Fulton R. Lewis, Jr., made over the Mutual network on March 27, will be encouraging to Members of the House who have been concerned about this problem for the past several months. After listening to Mr. Lewis' broadcast, I cannot help but feel that while there may be some isolated cases of unnecessary delay, on the whole the Veterans' Administration is to be commended for the way it has cleaned up the huge backlog of cases on file just a few short months ago.

I told you on leaving Washington 3 weeks ago that there were two subjects into which I wanted to do some first-hand probing on this trip. One was the question of Federal Government housing, and on that subject I have given you almost continuous reports all the way from Washington, D. C., to Washington State, thence on down the Pacific coast to the city of Los Angeles. The other was the question of how the Government is treating the men who are injured and disabled in this war which we are now fighting, what is happening to those men when they are mustered out of actual service back into private life, whether they are being taken care of promptly and their cases being settled by the Veterans' Administration in Washington, whether their pensions and disability allowances are being paid to them promptly by the Government so that they can have a chance to get themselves reoriented in the world of private enterprise, or whether, on the other hand, some Washington red-tape expert is holding up allowances, making them shift for themselves while Washington makes up its mind at leisure to settle their cases.

Some 4 or 5 months ago I mentioned that problem over this microphone, and I asked that any listeners who had personal knowledge of such cases write in and let me know about them, and we would see what we could do. I was rather surprised, frankly, at that time, that there was no appreciable response to that offer. In later conversations, however, with representatives of various national veterans' organizations I was told that there were many cases of that kind actually, and on this particular trip I arranged to have certain veterans' organizations in the various cities in which we were planning to stop prepare some material in advance and to dig out some sample cases, and it was my intention if those cases proved to be true and legitimate on careful investigation by me and my assistant, Fred Morrison, to present those actual cases, perhaps the actual men themselves to you on the air for what they were worth.

One of the veterans' organizations very kindly and cooperatively actually sent an advance man along a large part of the route that we took to coordinate the information that his organizations gathered before that information was turned over to us.

I am very happy to be able to report to you that when it came to the point of actually producing any material and any real cases in which disabled veterans of the war have been unable to get their settlements within a reasonable period of time there was not one single case to be found. The veterans' organizations were not able to produce any; various other sources to which Mr. Morrison and I went on our own responsibility to make our own individual inquiries were unable to produce any cases. There have been plenty of second-hand rumors, but when those rumors were traced down they proved to be otherwise than represented.

I do not mean to say, of course, that that closes the matter. We still are open to all the information that anyone wants to send in and we will investigate every case fully, but it does mean to say that so far as we have been able to establish thus far, the Veterans' Administration in Washington under Gen. Frank T. Hines does most definitely seem to have done a remarkable and highly admirable job, particularly in view of the fact that for many, many months that organization was sorely understaffed and undermanned.

Voting by Milwaukee Soldiers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the unanimous consent request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] to permit all Members of the House to extend their remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of March 31, 1944:

VOTING BY MILWAUKEE SOLDIERS

Wisconsin's satisfaction in the fact that it has its own law to register votes from citizens in the armed services, here and abroad, is likely to be seriously disturbed when this spring's election is over. The State's system just cannot take the place of a Federal ballot plan, if such a plan functioned properly, so far as men in overseas service are concerned.

Ballots were mailed out to 30 men in the armed services overseas for the city primary election recently held. Only one of the ballots has so far been returned and that ballot arrived in Italy where the soldier was stationed, 3 days after the primary. Since the law requires that the ballot, properly filled out, be received here before close of the polls on election day, the lone ballot from Italy was of course not counted.

The same thing will probably happen in connection with the election to be held Tuesday. It may be doubted that it will be very different in November. Few soldiers serving overseas will really get to vote for President or anybody else.

A good Federal ballot law would at least have served to guarantee to the great body of servicemen the right to a valid vote for President. The muffing of that law by Congress is one of the unpardonable mistakes of recent months.

There Is a Limit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 3, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, for months over the radio, Walter Winchell has been creating class hatred, disunity, giving utterances to false, malicious charges, all designed to create a lack of confidence in the people's Government. Some time ago he sent to Members of Congress a Communist book, perhaps thinking that Congressmen would fall for it. He learned they did not. More recently he has been following the Communist Party line by intimating that Members of Congress were guilty of sedition; that Congress as a whole was not entitled to the people's respect. He called it a "House of Reprehensibles."

Nothing but his egotism and the support of the Jergens Co. which employs him to sell its cosmetics and the curiosity of some members of the public keeps him on the air, unless it be that payment for the radio time he uses is made by interested persons who hate America, its prosperity, the happiness of its people, and its republican form of government.

The fourth-termers, headed by WALLACE, who tells us that a revolution is on its way, have been smearing everyone who showed any signs of effectively criticizing the New Deal.

One division of the smear brigade put its foot in it this week. One of them went a little too far. Some bright man in the War Department thought it could get away with sending to the libraries which furnish books to the men in the Army a certain magazine article which belittled General MacArthur.

MacArthur's gallant defense of the Philippines, his successful campaign to save Australia, the brilliance of his strategy in retaking so many of the Japheld islands in the Southwest Pacific, despite the meagerness of his supplies and his lack of armed forces, has aroused the envy and the jealousy of the New Dealers.

Even the President in his radio talks has withheld deserved commendation which was due MacArthur.

While our boys fought and died in the southern seas and on the islands of those seas, the bulk of our equipment, the majority of our men, were dispatched to the battle of the Atlantic, Africa, and Italy. As Churchill so well said, our sacrifices, our losses, our inability to rescue our men in the Philippines, were due to the diversion of our forces to aid Britain.

But this smear of MacArthur was a little too much and it was promptly in the Senate challenged by Senator VANDENBERG. The New Deal smear artist, caught with his fingers in the wringer, was rebuked by Secretary of War Stimson, who issued an order putting an end, at present at least, to the dissemination of smear literature by those connected with the Army.

It is about time the Navy, having stripped Winchell of his uniform, his pay, and his duties, ousted him from his position as a Reserve officer of the Navy.

The smear artists and some of their gullible listeners and readers have gone too far, and some of those who repeat their sayings, recommend their books and pamphlets, will ultimately hang their heads in shame to think they listened to and passed on such trash.

Senator VANDENBERG performed a signal service when his action forced Secretary of War Stimson to rebuke those who were smearing General MacArthur.

Brumidi's Handiwork in the Capitol Building as Described in Verse by Horace C. Carlisle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under general permission to extend my remarks, it gives me pleasure to make this statement:

The room in which the Military and Naval Subcommittees of the House Committee on Appropriations conduct their hearings is the first room in the Capitol Building which the noted Italian artist, Brumidi, decorated with his handiwork. That was back in 1855, and I am sure there is no finer work of its kind to be found in this grand old structure.

The President's room in the Senate side of the building stands also as a monument to this great artist, as do also the receiving room of the Senate, the District of Columbia room, rooms occupied by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, certain of the corridors, and "inside the high top of the dome."

These great works of art have been described and eulogized in verse by the widely known poet, Horace C. Carlisle, a member of the staff of the Architect of the Capitol, and who often has been spoken and written of as the Poet Laureate of Congress.

I have a copy of seven poems Mr. Carlisle has penned on these noted works of Brumidi. I shall include them as a part of these remarks, and express the hope that they may be examined by the Joint Committee on Printing with view to publication as a public document or as a pamphlet for free distribution to the visiting public:

BRUMIDI

(By Horace C. Carlisle)

BRUMIDI'S FIRST EFFORT IN CAPITOL ART

The exiled Italian Brumidi,
Past master in creative art,
Found in this Republic a speedy
Response to the call from his heart—
The Capitol of our young Nation
Was needing a talented man,
One gifted to put in creation
A marvelous artistic plan.

So he, with an urgent ambition
To sing from the walls with his brush
The songs of triumphant tradition
Too richly for hist'ry to hush,
Began, in the southwestern corner
Of our Nation's Capitol, where,
Above the rebuke of the scorner,
He climbed to the glory heights there.

With nature's and history's flowers,
Of which he delighted to dream,
Brumidi spent many grand hours,
Bewildered by their glory gleam,
Until, on the walls and the ceiling
Of this ageless Capitol room,
He lastingly placed them, revealing
American life in full bloom.

He, while learning life's living story
By living so close to the sod,
Caught inspiring glimpses of glory
By lifting his eyes toward his God,
By whom he had been educated
To use his expressible brush
In making what God has created
Sing on, after death whispers "hush."

As long as in grandeur and beauty
The National Capitol stands,
As long as devotion to duty
Stands first in our country's demands,
Brumidi, whose rare art creations
Yet live, to be never outclassed,
Majestic in time's estimations,
Will silently speak from the past.

Like Lincoln, enshrined in the pages
Of history, and in our hearts,
Brumidi "belongs to the ages"—
And his recognized greatness starts
With his first, unfading creation,
In Washington, tactfully planned
To be, throughout time's whole duration,
The Capital of our great land.

THE PRESIDENT'S ROOM IN THE NATIONAL CAPITOL

The gifted Italian Brumidi stands high,
As master of creative art—
He's gone, but those pictures of his occupy
A place in America's heart,
Symbolic of all that's majestic and grand
In our Nation's Capitol, where,
In artistic excellence, with his own hand,
He's written his epitaph there.

The President's room, in the Capitol, is
A monument that has endeared
Brumidi to us, thru those paintings of his,
Which always will make him revered.
The ceiling and walls of this historic room
Here picture America's past,
'Mid rainbows of promises, bursting in bloom,
Whose fragrance is destined to last.

Intelligence, purity, power, and charm,
With faith, hope, and charity, speak
A noble significance, sweet as a psalm,
From faces inspiringly meek,
Creating more hope in America's heart,
Supported by justice and truth,
Suggesting that wisely, thru picturesque art,
She cherish the days of her youth.

The President's room is a choice beauty-spot,
Much prized for its jewels of art
Whose marvels of int'rest are never forgot,
But live, like love's vow, in the heart—
And every American that's ever come
To visit his Capitol, who
Has seen this inspiring, historical room,
Feels Washington's dream coming true.

While manhood and womanhood are pictured there,
Childhood justly predominates,
And Nature's first fruits, as an answer to prayer,
Which she in abundance creates,
Add multiplied beauty and charm to the scene,
That could not by words be expressed,
Inciting emotions, as calm and serene
As hope for the heart that's at rest.

Those wonderful pictures were aptly designed
In every detail in the heart
Of this master-craftsman, who's really enshrined
Himself in his treasures of art.
He lives in his pictures, on Memory's walls,
Which proudly the Nation reveres,
And will, till the curtain of destiny falls
Upon the last vanishing years.

RECEIVING ROOM OF UNITED STATES SENATE

In the National Capitol's northeastern part,
And adjoining their guarded retreat,
Is the mem'rable room, rich in picturesque art,
Where the Senators purposely meet
Their constituents when they inquiringly come
To discuss the great problems that lay
On their minds, in the Land of the Free and the Home
Of the Brave, in this uncertain day.

This Receiving Room owes its American charm
To the tactful Brumidi, whose art
Has inspired proud America to keep a warm
Place for his wonder works in her heart.
No one ever comes into this room, and looks up
At the colorful scene, so sublime,
Without feeling its pictures fill his hopeful cup
With a gratitude that grows, with time.

Tho' Brumidi has long since passed on, still he lives
In his pictures, of national thrift,
As apparently thru them he purposely gives Aspiration an inspiring lift.
Until Washington fades from America's mind,
And his influence dies in her heart,
And his hopes in oblivion's tomb are enshrined,
Will Brumidi live on, through his art.
Just as actions speak louder than words, to us all,
Pictures tell more than mere letters can,
As they silently speak from the ceiling or wall
To the subconscious heart of a man,
And implant in his mind such historical truth
As should therein be fixed, firm and fast,
To remain, like the things learned in childhood or youth,
Unforgotten on through to the last.

That Brumidi was partial to children we know,
From the fact that they predominate
In the most of his Capitol pictures, which grow
On us there, as beneath them we wait;
But, methinks, next to children, he justly admired
Lovely women, as his pictures prove,
Whom, with his humble brush, he has richly attired
In a beauty that age can't remove.

At the right to the entrance to this royal room,
Overhead, upon its southern wall,
Three immortal Americans seem to assume Supervision, there, over it all.
Since Brumidi was such a past master of art,
All Americans ought to take pride
In the wonderful works of his mind and his heart,
Which will down through the ages abide.

BRUMIDI IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ROOM

A quarter of a century Brumidi proudly spent
In decorating, in his special way,
The Capitol in pictures, with one purposeful intent
Of painting scenes, to live beyond his day.
His heart within him yearned to leave no stone unturned,
As daily toiled he, with determined zest—
And every small detail he wrought with great concern—
For he did nothing that was not his best.

The District of Columbia Room gives ample evidence
Of his unquestioned mastery of art,
There painted on the ceiling, proving clearly his intents
To fix his pictures in the human heart—
He wished them to remind the wide world of mankind
How great a debt of gratitude we owe
To this great Government, so wondrously designed
That no dictator's voice can overthrow.

"A little child shall lead them" must have sunk into the mind
Of great Brumidi, for the children play
A large part in his paintings, and are artfully enshrined
In District of Columbia Room, where they Look down on us in love, it seems, from up above,
And lift the meditations of our hearts
To planes of thinking which Brumidi would approve,
For he admired admirers of the arts.

Beneath the paintings on the ceiling, just above each wall,
Of this historic room, one word appears,
Just half-way 'twixt the corners, at the center of it all,
Which widens in its meaning, with the years.
These tactful pictures tell to human hearts quite well
The truths that he determined to impress
There on the people's hearts; for pictures do excel
The printed words whose purposes they stress.

While Physics on the northern wall, expertly painted, shines,
Geography adorns the eastern wall,
Telegraphy the western wall becomingly enshrines,
And Hist'ry tells the story of it all.
No one now living knows just why Brumidi chose
These words, and for what cause he put them there,
And history, till time shall come down to its close,
May never to the wond'ring world declare.

The District of Columbia Room belongs to all the States,
And yet it does, in fact, belong to none—
Herein the District laws are planned, but from it emanates
The rule of conduct for none but its own.
The artist, we presume, resolved to give this room
The very best that it was his to give—
And, through the coming years, down to the day of doom,
In these, his pictures, will Brumidi live.

BRUMIDI'S GONE—HIS WORKS LIVE ON

The Senate's great Committee on Appropriations holds
Its sessions in a chamber which Unconsciously unfolds
Whole chapters in our history,
As great minds dwell upon
The priceless art productions that Brumidi's brush has done.

As elsewhere in the Capitol,
Brumidi's works in art,
In many noted places, play
A meritorious part—
The purposed pictures that his hand
Has left upon these walls
Will, in all likelihood, be there
Until time's curtain falls.

Some great historic events
He's pictured with his brush
Upon the walls too feelingly
For time to ever hush—
Yea, pictures speak a language which
The wise and unwise know,
For which Americans praise God
From whom all blessings flow.

Brumidi's wonder works in art
Need no interpreter—
They're understood by every one
Who is a worshipper
Of nature's great creative God,
On whom the great and small,
As they bid life on earth farewell,
Are more than apt to call.

Our military solons were
The favored ones for whom Brumidi decorated this Unique committee room—
That's why war scenes predominate,
To signify the fact
That we'll be ready for our foes
Whenever we're attacked.

Brumidi on this masterpiece
Of his could not have smiled
Unless he'd glorified it with
The beauty of a child;
For art, to him, fell short of art,
Unless he found a place
To paint the idol of his heart,
A child's inspiring face.

YES, BRUMIDI IS GONE, BUT HIS PICTURES LIVE ON

Amongst the majestic, immortal productions,
In pictures, by Brumidi's hand,
Adorning the Capitol, none in constructions,
Or beautiful sentiments stand
Above those portrayed in the corridors, reaching Across it, upon the ground floor,
From its northern entrances, justly beseeching
That we love America more.

Brumidi was master of natural hist'ry—
Through pictures, he, rather than words,
Described, in a manner that still is a myst'ry,
Profusely, the flowers and birds,
And reptiles, and many of God's living creatures,
In whom every scientist prides,
Which elevates him amongst history's teachers
In whose hearts his mem'ry abides.

The walls of these corridors, gleaming with glory,
And ceilings, of perfected hue,
Tell silently there, in his pictures, the story
Of Brumidi's dream, coming true.
What we have achieved, and today are achieving,
And will yet achieve, he has told,
In pictures, from which he'll continue receiving
Just praise from the young and the old.

Brumidi has painted the great occupations
Of men, through the tools they employed,
By which they attained their desired expectations,
Or whereby their foes they destroyed—
These historic pictures nobody can question,
As true as the instinct of birds—
Whole chapters of hist'ry they teach by suggestion,
Through pictures more welcome than words.

He studied the Acts passed by God's Legislature,
And was versed in Natural Law—
By instinct, he followed the teachings of Nature,
As he, with prophetic eye, saw
Far into the future, whose coming expanses,
In this way, he loved to record—
For our works are making us, as time advances,
A Nation whose God is the Lord.

Through Nature, Brumidi beheld God in action—
Her law he resolved to obey;
But God's Divine Law shaped his every transaction,
And kept him from going astray;
While Nature's law guided him in his endeavor
To paint pictures on the stone walls
Of yesterday—and of today and forever—
To live, until time's curtain falls.

BRUMIDI STILL SPEAKS FROM THE CAPITOL DOME

Some things cannot be, irrespective of cost,
Replaced, hence Brumidi's sublime,
Much treasured creations must never be lost,
Nor dimmed by the tarnish of time—
As long as the National Capitol stands,
To which multitudes daily come,
They'll worship the wonderful work of his hands,
Inside the high top of the Dome.

The top of the Dome, through this painting so rare,
Apparently bids us behold
"The glorification of Washington" there,
Uniquely, but graciously told;
For this work of art, representing the birth
Of this great Republic, whose vast Resources have made it the greatest on earth,
Illumines its pioneer past.

Surrounded by virgins that there represent
The Thirteen Original States,
George Washington, ready to spend and be spent
For his Nation's welfare, awaits
The growth of its Government which, as he'd planned
And hoped for, at some future day,
Would meet every need of this law-loving land,
In justice's peaceable way.

When he had completed the scene 'neath the Dome,
Brumidi instinctively felt,
Perhaps, that his masterpiece was yet to come,
As he went to work on the belt
Around the Rotunda, there on the inside,
Half-way from the circular floor,
Methinks, with a feeling of national pride
That he'd never felt theretofore.

Brumidi, when he had perfected his plan,
And on his new task had begun,
According to trustful tradition, began
To meditate proudly upon
The perfect fulfillment of his master-dream—
But fell from his scaffolding there,
Yet caught and held on, with a power supreme,
Till rescued from his fatal scare.

His artist-assistant was then deputized
To finish this great work of art,
Which brilliant Brumidi had aptly devised,
And made a most promising start;
But he left the work—when death folded his hands—
Unfinished, just as it appears,
Which may stand unfinished, as it today stands,
Unchanged, through the challenging years.

Here and There

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, my opposition to typical New Deal waste, inefficiency, and disregard for constitutional government has been so often expressed that some folks consider my statements biased. So, once again let me quote a New Dealer who has never wavered in his unquestioning support of the President's words and acts.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is 78 years old; he has served in the House 38 years; he is a vigorous, persistent advocate of a fourth term. On April 3 he just could not take it any longer. The press quotes him as stating that Secretary of War Stimson and high military officials have "30,000 officers sitting around in cocktail lounges with nothing to do."

Then he made this assertion:

They were appointed to give them some kind of prestige, but the Army cannot find jobs for them. * * * The cocktail lounges all over the country are full of them.

An unequivocal charge made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] that 30,000 individuals were given rank, uniform and compensation for no purpose other than to add to their standing and importance.

Never once has any criticism of the Army or the Navy been uttered by me. But here is a man who insists we must give the Commander in Chief, who is responsible for the conditions which exist, a fourth term. Nothing will be gained by discharging the subordinates, keeping the big boss. If the gentleman's charge is true, then we need another Commander in Chief.

TOO FEW THERE

There may be too many high ranking officials hanging around the cocktail lounges in Washington. I do not know. There are too few fighting men on some battlefronts. MacArthur never has had either all the men or the munitions he needed, though he has fought, if the press statements be true, a winning battle.

Here in Washington a wife just let me read part of a letter from her husband who is with the Coast Artillery, antiaircraft division, at Anzio. He enlisted in 1941 as a private; he is now a first lieutenant. As his unit was being shelled he wrote:

You know I've changed so much I don't even like myself any more. Sat in a beat-up chapel today and tried to figure myself and the world out. Got nowhere; sometimes wonder if I'll ever finish these letters I write to you. Shell just landed and shook the place up. This living so close to death for long periods does strange things; some crack up and go back as neurotics; some think it out and say "What the h——" and start to ignore the whole thing; don't decide anything—just wait and believe that it can't happen to them. Most, I believe, fall into a class with me; I hate it; I want to live, and at times I'm desperately afraid—and I know that I can be hurt or killed—that's a lot of nonsense about believing that it won't happen to you. We just go on and do our jobs hoping that it will be someone else. You feel sorry for the guys when they get it, but in the back of your mind you're saying "Thank God, it wasn't me." Damn, another close one; thought it was coming right in with me. Anyway, I look a little different. I'm thin now, much thinner than you have ever seen me. At times I look at myself and it scares me. Little lines here and there, and my eyes are old; and my mind, God, I don't think the same about anything. I have no respect for property; I've taken an ax to furniture for firewood; and, oh, I'm mixed up. You are about the only thing that remains the same.

Another boy just back from the Italian front, war-shocked, said there were five Germans to every Allied soldier on that battlefront. If his statement is true, if there are 30,000 officers in cocktail lounges, then there are too many in uniform here, too few aiding those who are doing the actual fighting there.

Let me repeat a previous statement. There is too much "playing at war"; too much make-believe here in Washington; too much government by men, rather than by law; too little "equal justice under law." At least a little more effort on our part is needed.

Investigation of Small-Loan Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, in the San Antonio, Tex., division of the United States district court a secret grand jury session, which started November 29, 1943, is being held under the antitrust laws of the national chain small-loan companies that operate under the Uniform Small Loan Act of the Russell Sage Foundation, as well as those that are operating under any illegal scheme or device that can be found for them to operate under. What is hereinafter said is not to be construed to be in criticism of the just-mentioned investigation. However, it does seem cogent to inquire why such an investigation should be circumscribed to the narrowness of the antitrust laws and isolated in Texas.

On June 27, 1941, I introduced House Resolution 251 for the purpose of investigating the small-loan racket. Another such resolution will be introduced by me. The following facts are part of those upon which I shall ask the approval of the Rules Committee and the House for the said resolution.

The only persons that can explain the condition and the facts that have led up to it are those that are solely responsible for them. These persons are: Mr. Leon Henderson, former Price Administrator; Mr. Rolf Nugent, former O. P. A. official; Mr. Frank Hubachek, the law firm of Hubachek and Kelly, attorneys for the Household Finance Co.; Mr. Byrd Henderson, president of Household Finance Co.; Mr. Charles Watts, president of the Beneficial Industrial Loan Co. of Newark, N. J.; Mr. Jackson R. Collins, attorney for the Beneficial, and Mr. Edmond Ruffin Beckwith, former attorney for the Beneficial of New York and now the "Moses" for the Beneficial and the small loan interests in the American Bar Association; Mr. P. B. Leverich, western director of the Beneficial located in Los Angeles; Mr. L. J. Styskal, sometime attorney for the Household Finance Co., local loan company of Chicago; and the King, Ogden, Taylor group of Atlanta, Wilmington, Nashville, Miami, New York, and Boston; Mr. Rufus Dewitt King, Miami, Fla.; Mr. John M. Ogden, Miami, Fla.; Mr. Jerry H. Taylor, Atlanta, Ga. These three men own or control the Family Finance Co. of Wilmington, Del., the Miller Management of Nashville, Tenn., the Security Bankers Operating Bureau, the United Operating Bureau and many other so-called management companies, all of which are engaged in the small-loan racket. Mr. Fred Snite and Thomas Griffin of the local loan company of Chicago; Mr. Licthenstien of the loan company of St. Louis; and Mr. Snow, their attorney.

The Remedial Loans Division of the Russell Sage Foundation has had as its directors for the past many years, Mr. Leon Henderson and Mr. Rolf Nugent. Actually, the Russell Sage Foundation is not in the loan business. It only sponsors the so-called 42-percent per annum uniform small-loan act and specifically and generally its attitude is that it is the only authentic and recognized factual and statistical agency for the small loan and consumer credit business of the Nation.

The national regulation of small loans is at the present time, and has been since the middle of 1941, under the supervision of the Federal Reserve Board under regulation W. Whatever type of small loan a loan concern makes, the Federal Reserve Board licenses them. Mr. Frank Hubachek, Mr. Leon Henderson, and Mr. Rolf Nugent are purportedly the authors of the Executive order that created the Federal Reserve Board as the licensing and supervising agency. Likewise, they and the others heretofore mentioned were largely responsible for the rules and regulations thereunder. If not actually so, their attitudes and opinions were reflected through Mr. Leon Henderson, Mr. Hubachek, and Dr. Rolf Nugent.

In the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 9, 1941, and September 16, 1941, entitled "Consumer Credit Loan Conditions," I set out in detail how borrowers were manipulated both under the Uniform Small Loan Act and under the high-rate or 250 percent per annum scheme then, as now, being operated widely throughout the United States. King, Ogden, Taylor, and at least some of the aforementioned firms are still operating under this method, and are licensed to do so by the Federal Reserve Board. Returning now to Mr. Leon Henderson, when he was director of the Remedial Loans Division of the Russell Sage Foundation: In the late 1920's Mr. Leon Henderson brought about the arrest in Raleigh, N. C., of one Harry Drake of Chicago, who was operating somewhere around a hundred 240 percent per annum offices throughout the Nation with the total capitalization of around a million dollars. On this million dollars, Drake was netting over a million a year. Drake received a year's jail sentence for violation of the laws of North Carolina. This sentence was suspended, it is understood, due to negotiations of Mr. Leon Henderson, which provided in substance Mr. Drake retire from the loan business and the further condition that Mr. Drake was to sell out his national chain of offices to Rufus Dewitt King, John M. Ogden, et al. It was further required of Mr. Drake that he not oppose the passage of the Uniform Small Loan Act in any State, nor was he to engage in the small loan business, nor was he to molest King and company in the continued operation of the 240 percent per annum offices purchased from him. Mr. Leon Henderson and the gentlemen just mentioned in Household and Beneficial Industrial Loan Co. were all a part of the agreement to let Mr. King so operate the old Drake offices for a specified period of time. As late as the latter part of 1943, Mr. King et al. was still operating the offices and is now operating a goodly number of them, and under the same tactics and charges as Drake used.

Under some guise or another, these same offices are being operated nationally in Missouri, Nevada, Montana, Kansas, Arkansas, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Oregon, and many other States. In the latter part of 1943 the attorney general of the State of Texas secured a judgment against the Miller Management—name under which old Drake offices are being operated—of Nashville, Tenn., for $50,000 for violation of the Texas laws. Mr. Leon Henderson and Mr. Nugent and Mr. Hubachek were all in a position where they should have taken official notice of this and other of King's operations. It is a matter of common knowledge, the attorney general of Texas found it out, I have known it for the past 4 years. Mr. Henderson and Mr. Nugent and the Federal Reserve Board have been informed of it, yet no action nor explanation from either or any of them, nor from the Russell Sage Foundation nor from any of the men hereinbefore mentioned. It is to be remembered that all of the foregoing gentlemen hold themselves out as the guardians of the public welfare in everything that has to do with the making of small loans. To clarify the 240 percent per annum charge a little more, it is the old $6 for $5, $2 for $10, $4 for $20 scheme.

On September 2, 1939, King, Ogden, Taylor's Family Finance Co., of Tennessee, a subsidiary of the Family Loan System, Inc., of 200 West Ninth Street, Wilmington, Del., filed a registration statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Family Loan System is the Dr. Jekyll side of King et al. loan operations. At the time of the filing of the statement with the S. E. C., Mr. Leon Henderson was a Commissioner and at the time of the filing of the statement King et al. were operating the Miller Management Co., the United Operating Co., and many others under the 240 percent per annum scheme. On the date of the filing with the Commission none of the King et al.'s nefarious operations were revealed. On that date King had loans outstanding in California, somewhere between $600,000 and $1,000,000, upon which they were netting 100 percent per year, part of which was owned by the Miller Management Co. These operations were felonious. I have documents in my file that reveal that they were. It was a felony for Family Finance Co. to omit their California operations in their statement to the Securities and Exchange Commission. In the month of August 1941 the S. E. C. was given a copy of a complete statement setting forth all these matters just referred to. The men to whom these facts were revealed took no action. The grapevine had it that they were afraid of the political power of Mr. Leon Henderson. Unless the continued failure to reveal this information to the Commission takes this felony without the statute of limitations, King and his cohorts are without the pale of the law even now. It was well known in loan circles that the Family Loan System had filed the registration statement and there is little doubt that Mr. Hubachek was one of Mr. King's legal advisers in this transaction.

Come now to the political machinations, the meetings in the Household's Waldorf-Astoria suite between King, and others, and his attorney; Byrd Henderson of Household Finance and Hubachek and Kelly; Mr. Watts of the Beneficial and his legal advisers; Snite and Griffin and their legal advisers, at which meeting States are divided up between them, like pawns; they agree among themselves to let each other alone in certain given territories and to manipulate borrowers into certain individual loan balance averages in certain localities; and also agree on who is going to put how much in the bag for what State and for whom in reference to legislation. It was at one of these meetings that a $500,000 "kitty" was made up for the passage of national tax legislation which put the national chain loan companies under the business management tax exemption laws. This act became law in 1935. Congress should find out and the people should know who received the $500,000 and what was done with it. Within the last 2 months, an employee of the Beneficial Industrial Loan Co. admitted to a judge in Lansing, Mich., that he bribed legislators and that the money was given to him by the Beneficial for the express purpose of bribing said legislators. The following is an Associated Press story, under the date of January 22, 1944, in reference to this bit of corruption:

Circuit Judge Leland W. Carr's one-man grand jury today ordered the arrest of 20 members and former members of the Michigan Legislature and 6 officials of finance companies, charging they corruptly conspired to influence legislative votes on bills in the 1939 session of the legislature.

The warrant charges a common-law conspiracy by making and fulfilling promises of bribes.

The warrant charges that bribes were paid on three different pieces of legislation, one of them regulating small-loan interest rates, a second providing procedures for foreclosing chattel mortgages and limiting deficiency judgments on such mortgages, and the third a bill to regulate retail and installment contracts covering motor vehicles.

Among those for whom warrants were issued are 3 State senators, 10 State representatives, 7 former legislators, and 6 finance company officials.

Arrest of all those named in the warrants was ordered immediately and Judge Carr said most of them would be arraigned Monday.

Judge Carr's grand jury was created for the purpose of investigating alleged corruption in the Michigan Legislature in its sessions of 1939-41.

Right under the nose of the Federal secret grand jury investigation in San Antonio, Beneficial, Household, and King have their antiusury societies with their high-sounding names which are made up of representative lawyers of the State of Texas. Texas at this time has no so-called uniform small-loan act. King has several million dollars still out in small loans to needy borrowers at 240 percent per year in the State of Texas. Legislative activity is going on in the States of Missouri, Indiana, New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and other States.

Considering Mr. Leon Henderson's former high position in the O. P. A. and many other Federal agencies and that of Dr. Nugent and Mr. Hubachek, it seems only reasonable to ask why the O. P. A. has neglected to give any consideration to ceiling prices on small amounts of credit extended on small loans. Is it possible that these gentlemen know nothing of the manipulations of borrowers of the Uniform Small Loan Act of the Russell Sage Foundation and also the operations of Mr. Rufus Dewitt King and his gang? Also is it possible that Mr. King's continued operations of the Drake chain of offices was unknown to them? When all of the foregoing, plus many other corrupt facts not mentioned herein, are supported in evidence by public records, documents, and an indelible cumulation of events they speak for themselves.

In closing I go on record that the presumed battle between the 240 percenters, the Sage Foundation, and those lenders operating under its Small Loan Act, has been, and is, a sham battle perpetrated upon the legislatures of the many States that have passed the act. In this sham battle and scheme of deception of the American people and their National and State Governments, this crowd has duped many Members of Congress, Governors of many States, State legislatures, the American Bar Association, the Better Business Bureau, the Legal Aid Society, some of the Nation's outstanding colleges and universities, national labor groups, and many other outstanding people and organizations, including a large segment of the publications.

Nothing herein contained should be construed in criticism of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice nor the secret grand jury investigation at San Antonio. But it does seem reasonable to inquire why, due to my 1941 resolution to investigate this racket, I was not consulted. However, those directly in charge of the investigation should not be impugned or criticized. It is my sincere hope that Mr. Henderson, Mr. Nugent, and Mr. Hubachek can satisfactorily explain the condition that exists within and without the Government in reference to small loans. For the information of Congress and the public, I refer to my extension of remarks, entitled "Consumer Credit Loan Condition," in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of September 16, 1941.

The Veterans' Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. TOLAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am inserting a speech made by me over the radio. This legislation is of tremendous importance to the men and women already in, or to be inducted into the armed forces, as well as to their families. This has been indicated by numerous inquiries directed to my office. I have taken this means to acquaint my people with the provisions of the bill.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is singular to note that for the first time in the history of Congress, in the United States Senate, the veterans' bill of rights was endorsed by 81 Senators, and passed that body unanimously. It is now before the House of Representatives and should become law during the week of April 12, 1944. Personally, I am wholeheartedly in favor of this bill.

I will now give you a brief digest of the bill as proposed; and then explain these provisions.

1. It provides for hospitalization, review of claims and adjudication thereof, and parliamentary procedures; prevents discharge until provision has been made for adequate rehabilitation into civilian life.

2. It permits aid given to discharged veterans by recognized veterans' organizations.

3. It authorizes a reviewing authority to pass upon nature of discharge and to correct or modify that discharge in accord with facts presented.

4. It provides for the education of veterans who have disrupted their schooling and to continue study of their chosen vocation.

5. Provisions are made for loans for the purchase of homes, farms, and business property to be made by Veterans' Administration to an honorably discharged veteran.

6. There is established a job-counseling and employment service for veterans.

7. It provides for a maximum of unemployment compensation to veterans payable within first 2 years after discharge.

8. Provisions of disqualification for unemployment compensation in accord with stated regulations.

9. Provides unemployment compensation ranging from $15 a week for single men to maximum of $25 week for veteran with three or more dependents.

10. It sets up safeguards against duplicate benefits.

11. Responsibility is placed in the hands of the Veterans' Administration for carrying out unemployment provisions of law.

12. It provides for the authority of enforcement of unemployment regulations.

13. It requires claimants to make honest reporting of all pertinent facts and developments.

14. There are penalties for making false statements and fraudulent receipt of compensation punishable by fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

15. It defines exact meaning of terminology used in the unemployment compensation provisions.

16. All laws are to be administered by the Veterans' Administration applicable to this act, and appropriations shall be made for carrying out provisions of act.

When this bill is passed, the Congress has done common justice for the men and women who are offering their lives for the preservation of this Republic. But, it will do more than this. It will strike a powerful blow for the preservation of the very future of our Nation. Now is the time to pass this bill. Not wait like we did in World War No. 1 and again have a bonus march on Washington.

This bill of rights will be costly perhaps, probably around $3,000,000,000. Yet its cost is trivial in comparison to the shocking cost in lives at the end of this war. It was a terrible cost and a sacrifice for millions of our girls and boys to give up their education, jobs, and ambitions to become human targets for the enemy; to live in squalor, disease, and with death everywhere so that we may be safe at home. We must, and will, do our share on their return, not necessarily with bands, but by economic security for them and their dependents. Nothing short of this will do, for the very life of this Nation will depend upon how we treat approximately one-tenth of our population when they return home.

I think it is the best money we can spend for the future welfare of this Nation. The men and women who compose our armed forces not only hold the safety of our Republic in their hands on the battle fronts today; they hold its destiny for generations to come.

By the time this war is over, we are told that 13,000,000 of our men and women will have seen service in our armed forces. They represent the cream of our resources, the very backbone of our Nation, and this Republic can ill afford to treat them shabbily and consequently lose their skills and leadership.

As I see it, there have been two basic goals which we achieved in this bill.

The first has been to throw every possible protection about the veteran—to bridge the awkward gap between release from the armed service and reintegration into civilian life. We recognize that the burden of war falls most heavily upon the citizen soldier who goes forth to become the armored hope of mankind.

We seek to preserve his rights; to see that he gets a square deal; that he is not imposed upon; to protect him against the injustices which result from errors and human failures inherent in a large-scale, mass demobilization; and to protect the community as well, insuring its stability, which widespread despair, confusion, and dissatisfaction could destroy.

And the second goal is to see that the veteran is not penalized for reasons of his service; that he is given a fair break; winning for himself those traditional American opportunites of achievement and fair play, which he has defended and preserved for us all here at home.

His most immediate need, perhaps, is the first classification—the "bridge the gap" part of the program. He must be guided as he leaves the service; he must be apprised of his rights and aided in obtaining them; he may need hospitalization; he most certainly will need money to carry him until he can find suitable employment; he needs a single place—one concentrated agency—to which he can go for the solution of all his problems.

In the veteran's bill of rights we have provided all this for him. We have, first, declared the Veterans' Administration to be an essential war agency, and have armed it with priorities in personnel and material so badly needed to enable it to meet all of the veterans' needs.

And, having strengthened the Veterans' Administration, we have given it over-all control of the activities and benefits affecting the veteran. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs will channel down through existing agencies in administering the program; but his will be the responsibility for its success both to the veteran and to the Congress.

No longer may the wearied veteran be pushed from pillar to post among several Government agencies in a tragic search for his rights and benefits.

The bill authorizes and directs the Veterans' Administration to construct additional hospital beds, which will be badly needed when the flood of human casualties flows back home. We have provided that he may use suitable Army and Navy hospitals when they become available.

The Veterans' Administrator is authorized to place designated officials in Army and Navy hospitals to adjudicate disability claims of veterans about to be discharged: The Army and Navy are directed, as well, to permit authorized representatives of accredited veterans' organizations to go into those hospitals to advise the veteran of the benefits available to him, and to aid in preparing claims for compensation.

We have, we believe, included provisions that will make it impossible ever again for penniless, disabled, and discharged veterans to be left waiting for months before their claims are adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration, and to have their compensation begin. The fact that little or no blame can be attached to the Veterans' Administration for that delay has made it nonetheless tragic.

We have provided for boards of review, within the Army and Navy to review the so-called blue discharges; discharges without honor, which have been given in far too many cases for trivial reasons. Men have been discharged without honor through no fault of their own other than what the Army calls inaptitude for military service. Beyond that, we have provided that the benefits of the "bill of rights" shall be open to all veterans discharged under any conditions other than dishonorable.

We believe that we have thrown every possible protection about the men and women of our armed forces as they take the first steps into civilian life. And, through a generous scale of unemployment compensation or readjustment allowance we have continued that protection through the difficult hunt for a job that will follow.

The "bill of rights" provides for unemployment compensation of $15 a week, plus $5 for one dependent, $8 for two dependents, and $10 for three or more dependents, for any 52 weeks during the first 2 years immediately following the last payment of mustering-out pay.

The veteran will be entitled to 3 weeks of unemployment coverage for each month in the service, up to the maximum of 52 weeks' pay. The unemployment compensation is generous, but it is hedged about with protections essential to the welfare both of the veteran and of the community.

A word on this history of this legislation. It was first drafted by the American Legion, an accredited veterans' organization, which drew upon its 25 years' experience in veterans' rehabilitation.

It does not represent the last word on the veteran subject. But, America can well congratulate herself, as well as the American Legion, that this great humane, necessary measure of justice will soon be enacted into law.

It must not be forgotten, however, that with all our talk about the proposed wonderful projects scattered throughout the Nation after the war not one dime has, as yet, been appropriated by the Congress for the post-war period; and, lest we forget in the excitement when the war is over, now is the time to remember and provide to pay back to our brave boys and girls the terrible price and sacrifices they made and endured so that we might live as free men and not as slaves.

Legislation of Interest to Mining Men—Prospective and Enacted

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important and basic industries of our modern life is mining. Economists speak of mining as an extractive industry because it consists of taking valuable material from the earth, not as food and fiber are taken in agriculture, but as raw minerals or metals for industry. I regard mining as ranking alongside farming and about as basically important to modern civilized life. In time of war, especially a mechanized war as of today, mining is as important to the winning of the war as is the production of food and fiber, and yet, strange to say, it is not apparently so regarded. I am the representative of a State which is outstanding both in mining and agriculture. I am interested in the development of both these great extractive industries, and accordingly I am amazed to see the different attitude on the part of Government toward these two fundamentally important fields of production.

MINING RELATIVELY NEGLECTED

Government has done much less, a great deal less, for mining through the years than has been done for farming. One of the most prominent departments of our Government, with massive buildings and thousands of employees here at Washington and tens of thousands throughout the country and with its numerous staff of highly trained scientists, administers to the need and fosters the development of agriculture. There is an agricultural agent in every county to be as helpful as possible to farmers. Of this I approve, but I can't help contrasting such solicitude for one basic industry with what I feel is neglect of another equally important industry.

The mining man is the forgotten man, although in this mechanized war in which we are engaged, he is vitally important. The Government has done less to encourage mining than it has done for other producers of needed material. I have continuously raised my voice to change this situation and improve this indifferent attitude. Much has been done but, in my judgment, not enough.

A SIGNIFICANT BILL PASSED

Most of the members of the House Committee on Mines and Mining are Congressmen interested chiefly in coal. While there is coal in Arizona it is largely on Indian reservations and not produced commercially; therefore, my interest in coal has been a national one rather than a local one. I was a member of a subcommittee, with Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, chairman, interested in producing liquid fuel from coal, shale, and other substances. Our committee reported out a bill, and it has recently passed and become law, authorizing an appropriation of $30,000,000 to establish pilot plants to obtain liquid fuel from coal and other substances by the use of certain formulas, some used in Germany for the production of synthetic gasoline.

These formulas are patents and, of course, the German formulas are enemy property now held by the Alien Property Custodian of the United States and those patents are thus subject to our development and use. In view of the fact that Germany's supply of gasoline is from the lowest-grade coal, we would do well to begin to use that source in this country, considering our great wartime need and our dwindling oil supplies, and that we can now do with this recent act. Only a short time ago our chairman, JENNINGS RANDOLPH, flew into Washington Airport on a plane fueled by gasoline made from coal, which was the first plane to arrive at the Nation's Capital using that kind of fuel. The West has much coal and shale from which high-grade gasoline and smokeless fuel may be made for cleaner cities of the future.

LEGISLATIVE STEPS SOON TO BE TAKEN

I am a member of the House Committee on Mines and Mining. True, I sought membership originally on this committee to get certain bills passed from time to time, granting relief to ex-servicemen who had unpatented mining claims when they entered the armed services, or relief for prospectors during the depression, and later during the war, who needed to be freed by law from using manpower and vital critical war materials called for in doing annual assessment work. In fact, I have at this moment a bill, H. R. 3579, suspending certain requirements relating to work on tunnel sites, which bill I am assured by my colleagues on the committee will be reported favorably at the next meeting of that committee, and should soon become law. However, I now prize my membership on this mining committee for more significant reasons.

At the first meeting after the Easter recess the House Committee on Mines and Mining will divide itself into certain subcommittees according to the plan agreed upon in the latter part of March. It is understood that I am to be chairman of the subcommittee on nonferrous minerals and metals. I believe this arrangement will make it possible to sponsor and further mining legislation better than has been done heretofore. I am not sure that there will be a subcommittee on the precious metals, but if so there are three westerners, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE] and the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLE], as well as the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK]—all very much interested in the production of both gold and silver.

PRECIOUS METALS FOR MONEY

As for myself, I am interested in both of the precious metals, and my interest in silver is not alone because of its industrial uses but also because of its proper place in our monetary system. Perhaps it is too much to expect bimetallism as a national program, such as Bryan advocated in 1896, but I seriously believe it is not too much to expect international bimetallism following this war. From the interest that I can notice by both political parties and the increasing interest by some of the leading commercial nations, international bimetallism seems more and more logical, and, to my mind, inevitable.

My voice shall be raised in favor of international bimetallism at any and every opportunity which I may have in post-war economic policy and planning, of which special committee in the House I am now a member. Never before in my opinion has the need been so great or America's opportunity so paramount to speak out for international bimetallism as at the present time. This is a big subject and many minds are working on it at this moment, and about it I hope to have much to say at a later date.

WAR METALS IMPORTANT

Senator JAMES SCRUGHAM, of Nevada, has taken the lead in the fight for home development and production—and later the protection—of the strategic and critical minerals and metals. I have worked hand in hand with him during all the time I have been in Congress. That was particularly true when he was a Member of the House.

We were able to accomplish much as a part of the defense program before the outbreak of the war. This was done by way of aid to the United States Bureau of Mines for work of exploration, by the establishment of the Metals Reserve Company to aid in procurement of the most needed war metals and later in the encouragement of the mining industry through higher pegged prices and bonus payments to bring out production. I think the prices have not been pegged high enough on copper, lead, and zinc but we did succeed in getting them raised above the original pegged prices in the case of lead and zinc, and we did succeed in getting bonus prices to increase production, especially in the case of copper.

Now we are trying to provide for stock piling so as to have safe reserves and yet protect the market price on these minerals. Senator SCRUGHAM'S bill—and I have an identical bill which is H. R. 2895—has met with enthusiastic support by the mining West but with much opposition here at Washington. At every meeting of the special committee on Post-War Economic Policy and Planning, I attempt to drive home a point with respect to mining policy. For instance, on March 16 I questioned William Clayton regarding the stopping of foreign importations as a first step in disposal of war surpluses. The mining industry has contributed greatly to the winning of the war and must be protected as best it can be at the conclusion of the war.

Food Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PETE JARMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission heretofore granted, I wish to insert two recent editorials from the Rome (Ga.) News-Tribune. While it is fully realized that we are at war and that it is therefore impossible for governmental agencies to function normally, it is sincerely hoped that the condition outlined in these editorials can and will be remedied.

[From the Rome (Ga.) News-Tribune of February 28, 1944]

ASTOUNDING OBSTRUCTION TO FOOD PRODUCTION

Not long ago the News-Tribune carried an editorial describing the plight of several farmers who are finding it difficult, if not impossible, to carry on their operations under existing conditions, particular reference being made to the situation facing the owner of a 1,500-acre farm on the Coosa River near Pell City.

This owner had been working from 10 to 20 German war prisoners in an effort to keep production going, but was in great difficulty because the truck with which he had to haul the prisoners between Camp McClellan and his place had fallen to pieces and he could not get another one.

Immediately upon publication of the editorial the farmer in question was called to Fort McClellan, where there are some 400 abandoned trucks, and was assured that the Army would cooperate fully in trying to remedy the situation, though it was explained that since the Army no longer had use for the machines, they had been turned over to the Treasury Department for disposal.

Much encouraged, the farmer then obtained from the O. P. A. in Pell City approval of his request for a truck. The application also was approved by the Agricultural Adjustment Agency at Auburn and by the Office of Defense Transportation in Birmingham. Then it went to the Office of Emergency Management in Washington—and was promptly turned down with the suggestion that he renew it after the expiration of 3 months.

This action has forced the abandonment of operations on this fruitful 1,500-acre farm, though 400 trucks stand idle at Fort McClellan, while the prisoners who were at work producing food and other essentials on the farm also are idle.

Now, the irony of this amazing situation is emphasized by the fact that on the very same day, February 21, that the farm owner received notice of the rejection of his application for a truck with which to carry on he also received a letter from the United States Department of Agriculture, through his county agent, urging him to put forth maximum efforts in the production of food. This letter opened with an underscored statement reading as follows:

"The need for foods produced on the farm for our fighting men, our allies, and our war workers not on farms is greater than at any time in the history of our country. Every farm person in our country has a real responsibility to do an important job for our great cause—the American way of living."

So there you have it; one agency of Government denying a large grower a truck that is essential to the operation of his farm and another agency urging him to produce upon the maximum scale.

This situation would not be of great importance were it an isolated instance, but such things are happening all over the country and threaten seriously to reduce the production of food in this year of supreme need.

Another angle to this case is the fact that while he had the war prisoners working for him this owner caused some two carloads of pulpwood to be cut because of the imperative need of this material—and now he has no way to get it to town. He also produces livestock on a considerable scale, having a herd of 250 beef cattle. If he can't get transportation for his workers, he will have to sell his herd and give up cattle raising at a time when beef is of tremendous importance.

It would seem that there should be enough common sense somewhere to prevent such astounding and alarming futility from being practiced by those who are shaping agricultural policies.

[From the Rome (Ga.) News-Tribune]

NEWS-TRIBUNE EDITORIAL BRINGS CONFESSION OF FUTILITY

A recent editorial in the News-Tribune calling attention to the plight of a Pell City farmer who is having to abandon the operation of a 1,500-acre Coosa Valley farm because he cannot get a truck to haul prison workers from Fort McClellan has attracted wide attention and efforts are being made to correct the situation. However, responsible officials in Washington confess their inability to surmount the red tape involved.

A copy of the editorial referred to was sent to Secretary Wickard by Congressman PETE JARMAN, of the Sixth Alabama District, and a friend of the farmer in question, and in reply Mr. JARMAN received the following communication:

WAR FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, February 24, 1944.

Hon. PETE JARMAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR PETE: Secretary Wickard has asked us to reply to your letter of February 5, with which you enclosed editorial on the farmers' truck problem.

For nearly 2 years we have tried to secure a short procedure for obtaining Army trucks for the use of farmers. Surplus trucks in serviceable condition must by law be sold to the highest bidder through Treasury Procurement. The highest bid necessarily is the price ceiling placed upon such equipment by the Office of Price Administration. We understand that where higher prices have been bid and paid, the bidders afterwards filed claims for refunds on any amount above the ceiling price and that these refunds have been granted. Any farmer who conforms to the conditions of sale is eligible to bid on surplus equipment.

The War Food Administration, through its field organization, has been calling attention to scheduled sales of Army equipment. We understand some farmers have made purchases of Army trucks, but that the complicated procedure of competitive bidding is confusing to most farmers who are unable to make trips to attend sales. We have worked with the Office of Defense Transportation endeavoring to channel surplus Army trucks to farmers, but laws covering the disposal of surplus Government property make all such proposals very cumbersome.

The stock pile of trucks still remaining from those manufactured before February 1942, when production was stopped, contains very few trucks suitable for farm use. The production program for trucks is very largely taken up with military requirements with only a small production allocated for civilian use. Of this latter, there will be very few trucks available for farm use. The situation is serious, particularly as regards additional truck equipment, but a great deal can be done toward solving the problem through cooperative pooling of trucks among farmers and other such conservation methods.

We shall continue to do everything to make more transportation available to the farmer.

Sincerely yours,

MARVIN JONES,
Administrator.

Note the observation, "For nearly 2 years we have tried to secure short procedure for obtaining Army trucks for the use of farmers." That is an abject confession of futility. Red tape has been piled upon red tape until the whole appears to be absolutely insurmountable, and in the meantime farmers must, in many instances, curtail operations, though abandoned Army trucks may be close at hand, as is the case in reference to the farmer down the Coosa River, who is only 50 miles from Fort McClellan, where some 400 trucks stand idle.

As to the "pooling of trucks," to which reference is made, that is utterly fatuous in most instances. In the case under discussion, the full-time use of a truck is absolutely essential in hauling the workers on a 100-mile round trip daily, and in performing other functions on the farm.

Meanwhile, the Agricultural Department is strenuously insisting upon increased farm production and the needs for the armed services, for the Allies and for the people at home become increasingly acute.

As the News-Tribune said in the editorial which brought the above observations from Mr. Jones: "It does seem that there should be enough common sense somewhere to prevent such astounding futility from being practiced by those who are shaping agricultural policies." But thus far such common sense has not appeared.

If some means of surmounting the towering stacks of red tape is not discovered without waiting another 2 years, hunger will face millions of persons whose needs could be met by intelligent handling of the farm problem.

The Enemy of Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of a radio address delivered by me over the network of the Columbia Broadcasting System from Boston, Mass., Saturday, April 1, 1944:

I have a message from Washington tonight for the home folks of 10,000,000 young men and women who are wearing the uniform of the United States.

It is not a pleasant message. But it is a message which, in fairness to them, I feel ought not to be held back.

To you—the mother and father of that boy in Italy, the wife of that sailor who is tonight somewhere out on the Pacific—it is to you that I address this message, for you know, as only you can have learned, the full meaning of sacrifice.

Most Americans, whether they have sons and husbands in our armed forces or not, are willing to undergo such privations as this war makes necessary. Your friends and neighbors, though some of them may be spared the anxiety that you are going through, are for the most part willing and eager to do all they can to hasten the day of victory.

Most of them stick faithfully to the rules of rationing because they know that those rules are essential in the conduct of the war.

Most of them cooperate voluntarily in the effort to keep prices down because they know that that effort is an integral, vital part of their country's total war effort.

They realize that a nation with an uncontrolled or upset wartime economy on the home front would be handicapped in producing the supplies that are needed on the fighting front. They understand that gasoline and tires and critical war materials have to be rationed here so that our fighting men will get all they need over there.

And they are doing their part.

Of course, it is true that we have among us a scattering of people who are still not willing, or who still do not understand the need, to do their part. I know that we still have some dealers who violate price controls, we still have some consumers who try to get around the rules of rationing.

Perhaps you, too, have known people of that sort. No big country ever existed without them. We should not be shocked that we have them with us, and we may hope that as this war goes on, they will learn better.

But what is shocking, what is more directly and more seriously endangering the safety of your son or your husband in this war and jeopardizing his future in the time of peace to follow, are the activities of an even smaller minority, a political minority of men who should and do know better.

This group, which is made up of leaders of the Republican opposition in Washington, has adopted tactics which strike at our country's security against the greatest enemy we shall have to face on the home front of this war—the enemy of inflation.

Do not be deceived about this danger. Inflation can lengthen the war your boy is fighting. It can invalidate the peace on which his whole future depends. That is why I have felt it my duty to address this message to you.

Do not be deceived, either, about the cause. Inflation is caused by the acts of those who are unwilling to make sacrifices to meet the wartime needs of their country. And that is why it is necessary that you should be taken behind the scenes for a moment in our Nation's Capital and shown what is going on there, and why you must be warned of its effects.

Two years ago the cost of living in America was on its way upward at a rate that spelled danger to business, danger to labor, danger to the farmer, danger to war production, and above all these, and because of them, danger to the soldier.

Under the leadership of our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Congress enacted on January 30, 1942, a law to stop it. That law was the Emergency Price Control Act. An act to amend it, known as the Stabilization Act, was passed later that same year.

By the authority of these acts, your Government was enabled to set up the machinery with which we could fight off inflation. That machinery was given the name of Office of Price Administration.

Now, everybody knew that O. P. A. was plunging into a pretty thankless job. We Americans understood that our boys across the sea needed gasoline for their planes and we wanted them to have it. We were willing to go without. If inconvenience and sacrifice were part of war, we could take it. But some of us—yes, many of us, at first—saw no need to take it and like it.

Some of us, from time to time, said so. And O. P. A. became just what it was expected to be—a big headache.

But the threat of inflation was checked and that boy of yours overseas got the gasoline he needed and he was—and is today—giving the Germans and the Japs something worse than headaches.

So it was worth it. O. P. A. could stand the headaches, even the stomachaches, for that. And if people complained, and if politicians tried to make their own kind of capital out of these complaints, well, that just couldn't be helped. Price control and rationing, if they helped that boy of yours who is winning the war, were worth it.

Let me tell you tonight—you parents of that boy—they did help. They are helping now. The pressure for inflation in this country has been and still is terrific. Yet for the past year, the line has been held. In the spring of 1943 the increases in the cost of living were stopped by O. P. A. Today the general level of price stands where it stood then—which is less than half the level reached in World War No. 1.

Where we would be today without those controls, what our supplies of material for the job ahead of our armed forces would be today without rationing, only the God who watches over that boy of yours knows.

But on June 30, 1944, the term of legal authority for those controls runs out. Either the acts were renewed before that date or our main, frontal barriers against inflation are dropped. Therefore a bill has been introduced to continue the acts for 1 year, and that bill is now before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency.

Meanwhile, we face an election in November of 1944. And this brings me to the heart of my message to you parents and kinfolks of those who are fighting our battle abroad.

It brings me to the distressing picture of men who have given themselves, for political advantage, to a wholly partisan attempt to undermine those controls against inflation. It brings me to an unseemly story of political maneuverings, of grudge fighting, of men who see temporary gains for themselves in taking potshots at a target that has shielded the Nation and those who are fighting to preserve it.

The administration, being in office, is responsible for doing that job of holding the line against inflation. The Republican opposition, not being identified with the Executive, is not responsible, as a political entity, for that job.

But there is a difference between being not responsible and being irresponsible. And within the Republican Party there are forces, there are men who, with an almost unbelievable disregard for the consequences to our Nation in these perilous times, have taken the political course of attacking the mechanics of price control for such political advantage as they may derive for themselves out of such attacks.

I charge these men in the Republican Party with irresponsibility, for it is irresponsible to exaggerate, in time of war, the small sacrifices that people must make so that your boy in uniform will be well found in his grim assignment.

I hold those Republicans irresponsible who play on the minor irritations of a war-beset citizenry, who deliberately encourage grudges among them, grudges against the Government workers and volunteers who are charged with the task of making our economic controls stick.

I hold those Republicans in Congress irresponsible who have sought and are now seeking special exemptions from control for those private interests from whom they hope to gain political support in return for the favor.

I hold those Republicans irresponsible who have urged us to blame our own Government for that which we ought to blame on the governments of Germany and Japan.

I deem it a tragic show of irresponsibility on the part of that opposing minority of Republicans to indulge in this critical hour in attacks of mud, threats, and smears against Government agencies which have proved, in action, their worth in helping to prosecute this war to the earliest possible victory.

And I charge that Republican leadership with such irresponsibility and a reckless disregard for the future of our people when, after giving lip service to the general principle of price control, they proceed to welsh on the specific: when, after reaffirming by word and avowal the general stand we have taken against inflation, they proceed to undermine that stand by punching holes in the specific authority that we set up.

The long history of such attacks by the Republican leadership may be found in the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD over these months past. Their outcries against O. P. A., their moans and groans against what they call the bureaucracy, are there in profusion.

To you, the mother and father of an American soldier now fighting for his country, a perusal of those columns may bring some rather rude shocks. But I do not think you should be spared those shocks. I think you ought to know. I commend that publication to your most careful attention. If some of it does not make pleasant reading, remember it is your son's future that is at stake.

I would suggest that from now on you follow as closely as you can the progress through the House and Senate committees of the bill to continue price controls.

I would suggest that you make note of any effort to nullify the controls by plastering on crippling amendments to the bill. For as I have said, the Republican leadership gives only lip service to the principle of price control. Oh yes, they will say inflation is dangerous. But the amendments they propose to make in our laws are viciously inflationary.

I would advise you to be especially alert, for example, for amendments that would limit the power of price control to basic commodities and exempt so-called luxury items. Such an amendment would encourage our farmers to grow less corn and wheat and potatoes—the low-priced foods we need for war—and more of the high-priced foods we can get along without while war lasts. It would fill our stores with dress shirts instead of work shirts. It would give us orchids when what we need is cabbage. It would tell us, when our people want bread to let them eat cake.

I suggest that you be on the lookout for an amendment to take jurisdiction in price control cases out of the Emergency Court of Appeals, which was created for this purpose. Such an amendment would throw the whole question of price control into the general courts. It would bring chaos and conflicting decisions and end in making price control impossible.

I suggest that you watch out for an amendment to allow a profit on every product regardless of how high its cost of production may be. The controls of no other warring power allow this. For it would mean that our whole market would be geared to high-cost production, and the end result will be inflation without limit.

I suggest, further, that in all such attempts to cripple our controls, while this bill is before the House and Senate and their committees, you observe whether the Republican leaders attempt further to stir up public resentment against rationing and price control, whether they attempt to use this opportunity to make Congressional debate a sounding board for the purpose of turning minor irritations into political capital.

Yes, it is your son's future over the arduous weeks and months of warfare that are still ahead of us and over the years to follow, when, God willing, he will have come back to you

The question of whether we have more boom now in our markets will decide whether we are to have a crash later on. Time and again, this has been borne out in history. If your boy hopes to come home to a job in business or industry, the actions of your Senator and your Congressman at this time can help to make or break that chance.

If your boy hopes to come home and go into business for himself, his opportunity can be made or broken by what the Members of Congress do now. For there can be no triumphant peace, and all will suffer—the businessman, the farmer, the industrial worker, and the returning soldier—if we let inflation get out of hand while we are at war.

I have made this message, this warning to you, as strong as my power of words permits. Believe me, I have not overstated the danger. I know I have not overstated its importance to you, for that which is at stake means more to you than your own future, as it means more to me than mine.

A Threat to Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, newspapers and radio commentators headline our national manpower problem. It is the number one domestic issue facing ou Nation today. It is easy to headline the needs of thousands of workers in shipbuilding, aircraft, synthetic rubber, and other critical industrial production. Equally important, but not so easily dramatized, is the need for deferring workers in special services in the rural areas of the Nation. I have particularly in mind the deferring of farm mechanics, blacksmiths, and others who are so vitally needed if we are to maintain full farm production. Action must be taken on this problem or it will be too late. My mail indicates that many communities are now without a blacksmith or machine shop. Farmers are more dependent than ever on machinery because of an acute farm-labor situation. Their machinery is wearing out rapidly and parts must be replaced and repaired. Only a small percentage of needed new machinery is available. The only answer to the farm machinery problem is sufficient mechanics and blacksmiths to keep this machinery in operating condition. Farmers who have bought new combines from their county allocations have been advised by the dealers that they must expect to set them up with their own help and will receive no mechanical service whatever. A combine is an expensive piece of farm machinery and its successful operation depends largely on proper adjustments that must be made by someone familiar with the machine. This same situation applies to every other piece of farm machinery.

Recently the Salina Journal, of Salina, Kans., ran an editorial entitled "A Threat to Agriculture" which I am including as a part of my remarks:

A THREAT TO AGRICULTURE

Farmers this spring are threatened with a problem that easily could become one of the most serious they have faced. A late spring has delayed plowing and planting, with the result that when weather permits it will take long hours and continuous activity to produce the crops that are essential if the food is furnished that is necessary to win the war, and to protect the civilian population at home.

At the request of the Journal, a memorandum has been prepared by a man who knows whereof he writes. His statement is so clear, and the dangers he outlines so real, that the attention of Governor Schoeppel and others who may be able to help solve it, has been directed to the problem that has been created. Here it is:

"A situation has developed with reference to food production in this territory which I would like to bring to your attention. In several communities there is a shortage of farm mechanics who are competent to repair the old farm machinery which is necessary for farmers to use in the production of spring crops and later in the harvest because it is impossible to procure new machinery under present conditions. Several farmers have asked me to try and assist them in procuring a limited deferment for young men in their communities who are engaged in this work.

"Among the specific instances are the following—Dauer Bros., Falun, were carefully investigated by the county war board and both of them were recommended for deferment. Ralph Bogart of Gypsum is the only man in the only machine shop who is competent to repair farm machinery over a territory including portions of four counties, but he is under 26 and has been classified in I–A, which classification is now pending before the appeal board. Louis William Hubele, employed in the Fordson shop at Abilene, is registered and his employer states that while Hubele's occupation is partly that of a parts man, still he is very necessary in procuring parts for farmers over a wide territory and does considerable mechanical work in setting up and delivering new machinery and it has proved impossible for his employer to replace him. Upon appeal his classification of I–A has been sustained and it will be impossible to continue this service to farmers if this registrant is inducted. The local United States employment service which is in charge of such replacements, subject to the regulations of the War Manpower Commission, advises that farm machinery mechanics and car mechanics are listed as critical in a four-State area of which Kansas is one, and that they do not have in their files any men listed as qualified to replace any farm mechanics which would be inducted throughout the six counties of Saline, Dickinson, Ottawa, Ellsworth, McPherson, and Lincoln.

"Farm mechanics are not listed under the list of critical occupations. The U. S. D. A. war board requested postponement of induction of Mr. Weeks of the Weeks Implement Co., here in Salina, until after harvest, but was advised by Colonel Montgomery at Topeka that due to the urgent demand for men qualified for military service and the fact that he had been ordered to report for his induction, it would be impossible to grant their request. This man has been inducted. This leaves this firm with only one full-time mechanic to service a large territory which handles their type of farm machinery.

"As older farmers are not usually skilled in the operation and repair of power machinery, and the younger men who are familiar with this work have been inducted into the military service to a large extent, it has been necessary for farmers to endeavor to have their repair work done by paid mechanics and if these are taken out of the communities, it may result in the abandonment of a large acreage of farm land and a loss of production. This situation is now critical and it appears necessary for everyone interested to cooperate in an effort to meet the emergency in view of the requirements made for food production. We believe that if this matter is brought to the attention of those in authority it may be possible to procure some action to relieve the situation."

The Basic Cause of War: Monopoly, Limited Production, Unemployment—The Basic Hope of Peace: Independent Business, Full Production, Full Employment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we, the people of America, are engaged in the most terrible war ever waged by man against man—a war whose scope is global and whose victims are counted among all the races and nations in existence. Why are we cursed with the periodic scourge of war? Why cannot the races and nations dwell together in peace and harmony? Why are the masses of common people tricked by their leaders into aggressive warfare? Do the physical and mental traits of human nature force the men of one nation to seek the lifeblood of their fellows? I do not think so. Is it the unbridled lust for power and wealth among their leaders? Undoubtedly this factor is involved. But is it the basic cause for war? I do not believe it is.

Every tyrant or conqueror of ancient history has used the misery and desperation of his people as the base for his rise to power. The modern dictators—Mussolini, Franco, Tojo, and Hitler—built their aggressive military machines on the misery and starvation of their national subjects. No responsible person will deny this fact.

Let us investigate this factor of national misery and starvation. Why have these great masses of people become so impoverished and miserable, so desperate from an economic standpoint, that they have fallen victims to the siren songs of the dictators? Why were they willing to exchange their few meager personal liberties which they still possessed for the grandiose goals of the dictators?

It is said that a drowning man will grasp eagerly for a straw. These people were drowning in poverty with all its attendant evils of disease, misery, and starvation. The economic systems of Italy, Spain, Germany, and Japan had failed to satisfy the needs of a decent human existence to their people. When a man sees his wife and children starving before his eyes, he becomes desperate. He may not understand economics, but his own stomach cries for the answer and the sight of his loved ones suffering goads him into a state of desperation where he, like the drowning man, grasps for the straw of security. This, then, is the basic reason for the rise of power-crazed dictators. This is the basic cause of war. Economic desperation of the masses of the people.

CAPITALISTIC (FREE ENTERPRISE) SYSTEM USED BY AXIS AND ALLIED NATIONS

What type of economic system existed in Italy, Spain, Japan, and Germany before their collapse? Their economic systems were very much like our own. We can classify their systems before the totalitarian era as that of private capitalism, private ownership of land and improvements, private capital, private or individual enterprise. Yes, they were even known as "free-enterprise economies." I am speaking, of course, in general terms. The different nations' economies which we are discussing had their minor differences, but even as our economy differs in detail from that of Great Britain, we still observe the same general rules of private ownership that obtains in their capitalistic economy. Now among the great capitalistic nations of the world there have been varied amounts of natural resources and population. Each nation has shown different abilities for ingenuity and progress. This is commonly expressed in the term "have" and "have-not" nations, and numerous reasons are given for their respective positions in the register of nations. Attempts are made to justify or condemn each nation because of the basic causes contributing to its particular position. I do not intend to develop a thesis of either justification or condemnation of any particular nation at this point in my discourse. I merely accept their positions as an established fact and point out that the unsatisfactory conditions within four of the great capitalistic, free-enterprise nations have provided the human misery which is the basic cause for this global war—a war which has swept the more successful "have" nations into the same holocaust of war as the "have-not" nations.

In the past 100 years, I might almost say the past 50 years, momentous changes have taken place in our own Nation and in the society of nations. The impact of scientific and mechanical discoveries and inventions have literally brought into being a new conception of human existence and relationship. That new conception must be realized and its blessings made available to mankind. The knowledge we now have must serve humanity and must not be used to enslave humanity. Our present involvement in a global war is a result of improper and unjustified attempts on the part of individuals and nations to control and limit the use of our new-found techniques for their own selfish gain.

SECURITY OF INDIVIDUAL OR NATION IMPOSSIBLE IF SELFISHNESS OR ISOLATION PRACTICED

History proves that the security of the individual or the nation can never be established on selfishness or isolation. The scientific discoveries and mechanical inventions which have made possible an era of plenty that makes selfishness unnecessary have also produced an imperative. That imperative is universal security. We as individuals or as a Nation cannot live or die within ourselves. World security must be established when this war is over, in order that our Nation as an interdependent unit in the society of nations may have its separate security. The hopes of humanity and civilization are dependent upon the general acceptance of these undeniable facts. Will our political leaders and the political leaders of other great nations rise to the level of statesmanship necessary to plan on this basis? Will individual and national selfishness be sublimated to the prime consideration of world security?

Upon the answers to these questions depend the hopes of suffering millions for a just and lasting peace. International cooperation in the establishment and maintenance of world peace must be the prime demand of every citizen of every nation. I believe the leaders of the nonaggressor nations are agreed upon the broad general principles of world cooperation. I believe that a world organization will be formed for the purpose of establishing and maintaining peace in the society of nations. The first steps will undoubtedly be taken, but unless the basic cause of war is solved within the individual nations, it will be another Versailles, another experiment in futility. We will sow again the seeds of future wars. This must not happen.

SECOND STEPS MUST FOLLOW FIRST STEPS

After the first steps of world organization are taken, we must take the additional steps to provide stable, decent standards of living for the common people of the respective nations. We must help establish relative economic security among the have-not nations to insure our own security. Remember and never forget this undeniable fact: The security of the individual nation cannot be established on selfishness or isolation.

The factors of time, space, and transportation, through modern technology, have reduced distances between nations and will continue to bring the far places nearer and nearer, as science and invention progresses. I recall to you the statement, "We must help establish relative economic security among the 'have not' nations to insure our own security." By the phrase "relative economic security" I accept the premise that there will be a different level or standard of living in the different nations, but there must be a minimum standard, below which a nation's people should not be asked to live. A level must exist well above the line of economic desperation. Sufficient food, clothing, and shelter to prevent the desperate grasping for the straw of security. We must eliminate the misery of the masses upon which every dictator has "demagoged" himself into power. This means that commerce must flow between the "have" and "have-not" nations. It means that raw materials must be made available to the people of all nations. The surplus materials of the "have" nations must be made available to the "have-not" nations. This involves tremendous problems and complexities. I am confident the problem can be solved, in view of the fact that it must be solved—and that the alternative is bloody, global war.

What part can we, the people of the United States, play in this world problem? Of necessity we must take a leading part in the first steps of world organization and cooperation. We must play a major part in the succeeding steps of freeing international commerce from its previous bonds of selfishness and isolation. We have a greater duty and a more serious obligation, however. We have the opportunity to solve within our own Nation the major defects of the capitalistic system. I have stated before that of the six great capitalistic nations, four have failed to function well enough to prevent national economic desperation. The two nations whose free-enterprise system at the beginning of World War No. 2 were still functioning—Great Britain and the United States—however, were also having their troubles. Cycles of depression, unemployment, and deficit financing were also threatening our stability of government and reducing many of our people to economic desperation. True, the condition of our people did not approach the miserable status of the people in Italy, Spain, Japan, and Germany. Our people were more fortunate in many ways. Our natural resources were greater—lands, mines, and forests were still available for development. The energies of our people were practically unhindered in their activities. A greater degree of religious and political democracy obtained, and until recent years economic democracy came nearer to being the possession of our people than had ever been experienced by the people in the older capitalistic nations. Under these favorable conditions of free enterprise and individual initiative, we developed a great nation and the highest standard of living known to man.

WHAT IS WRONG WITH OUR ECONOMIC SYSTEM OF SO-CALLED FREE ENTERPRISE?

But something was wrong in our economic system. With all the blessings of natural resources, boundless energy, and individual ingenuity and initiative, we were faced with constantly recurring depressions—actually a stalling of our economic system, a refusal to function reoccurring every few years. When these depressions occurred, millions of our people lost their jobs and were soon faced with the same problems of subsistence that faced the unemployed people of Italy, Spain, Japan, and Germany. Someone will immediately ask, "Why did not our people fall victims to a dictator during the last great depression, as did the people of Europe?" and the question is justified. Two great factors, in the opinion of students of history, undoubtedly influenced our Nation's destiny at the critical moment. The percentage of desperate people was lower than that of the European nations and the leader who arose during our crisis, President Roosevelt, believed in democracy, and led the people back to employment through democratic procedure. It is my firm conviction that the American people at that time were in a dangerous mood, and a totalitarian-minded leader might have tipped the scales toward an American brand of fascism.

But whether we deserved our good fortune or not, we weathered our latest and severest depression. Deficit financing started the wheels of our economic machine turning and the total production demands of war are keeping them turning. The student of economics knows that neither deficit financing nor war can be continuous. We know, therefore, that the problem of unemployment in our free enterprise society has not been solved. A temporary expedient only is involved in our present full employment. The war's demand for goods will stop when the war ends. Our national debt will exceed $300,000,000,000. Only a full production, full employment economy can pay the service charge on this tremendous debt, plus the current cost of government. Further deficit financing then cannot be the answer.

IS FREE ENTERPRISE AS NOW PRACTICED REALLY FREE?

What is the answer? Are we to be told again that "free enterprise" as it now functions will lead the people into full employment? And, if so, what reason is given to the people that would cause us to have confidence in this promise? Was not the "free enterprise" of big business in control, without Government interference preceding the crash of 1929 to 1932? Have the champions of "free enterprise" changed their methods of operation or solved the cause of periodic depressions? Is there a blueprint of full production and therefore full employment which our business leaders subscribe to and advocate? Unfortunately for the American people, the answer is an emphatic No!

Oh, I realize there is a well-financed campaign, traceable directly to the centers of big finance and big business to sell the American people a bill of goods under the banner of "free enterprise." Millions of dollars will be spent to advertise those two words through newspapers, radio commentators, and all the various propaganda approaches. The selfish leaders of big business refuse to see the handwriting on the walls of international history. They have no new plan; they advance no blueprint for full production and full employment. They offer nothing different from the methods and procedures they used preceding every depression up to and including the crash of 1929. Let us not be tricked then by their slogan "free enterprise." Let us analyze this phrase: Does big business really believe in free enterprise? Has the unrestrained practices of our capitalistic system reached the point where real free enterprise and individual initiative are still possible? The answers to these questions will help us to gage the sincerity of these vociferous advocates of free enterprise. One of the troubles with the phrase "free enterprise" is that so few people agree on what it means. If it is as important as most of us believe, the phrase should be susceptible to clear interpretation.

REAL FREE ENTERPRISE—FREEDOM OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY

I happen to be a sincere believer in real free enterprise—the kind of free enterprise which has been the backbone of our Nation, until recently. Before giving you my interpretation of real free enterprise, I wish to lay a logical foundation. Our democracy was founded on the rights of an individual to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. In order to insure those inherent rights we guaranteed to our people either specifically or by implication three great principles, without which our Nation cannot endure: religious freedom, political freedom, and economic freedom. Religious freedom, the right to engage and participate in the religion of our choice; political freedom, the right to engage and participate in the political belief of our choice; economic freedom, the right to engage in the work or business of our choice.

Upon these three principles of freedom, our democratic society depends. If you destroy any one of the three, our democracy as we have known it will die. I believe sincerely in these three principles. My sworn duty is to protect them to the best of my ability. I believe that the American people have retained and are exercising to a satisfactory degree the first two freedoms—religious and political. I believe and I shall prove that we are swiftly losing the third freedom—the economic freedom which embraces the principle of real free enterprise. I shall define real free enterprise a little later.

When our founding fathers established the three principles of political, religious, and economic freedom, our commercial system was very simple and rested entirely upon the personal participation and ownership of the individual. Every man had the right legally and also the economic opportunity to engage in the business of his choice. Competition was on the basis of personal service and efficiency. Success or failure depended almost entirely upon the ability of the individual manufacturer or retailer. Thus the avenue of business enterprise was open to anyone who could raise a small amount of capital to finance his own enterprise. This was the environment of early American business. This environment no longer exists. Our business world today is no longer simple and independent. It has become very complex and interdependent. As our Nation developed and changed, the scope of all our operations broadened. Scientific discoveries and mechanical inventions multiplied our possibilities for production and distribution. Capital tended to accumulate in the hands of a few powerful financiers. It is because I believe that the development of great corporations, monopolies, and cartels threaten the economic freedom of our people that I feel impelled to point out the evolution of our business system away from economic freedom and "real free enterprise."

THOMAS JEFFERSON DENOUNCED MONEYED CORPORATIONS AT THE TIME OF THEIR BIRTH

Even as far back as Thomas Jefferson this change in our economic system was beginning and it caused that great believer in real free enterprise to say:

The masses of the people were not born with saddles on their backs, nor were the favored few born with spurs with which to ride them. * * * I hope we shall crush in its birth the aristocracies of our moneyed corporations * * * which already bid defiance to the laws of our country.

From the time of Thomas Jefferson to the time of Abraham Lincoln great strides were made in business development. The industrial revolution was beginning—the steam engine, the cotton gin, the first great railroads, the development from a simple agrarian economy to a complex industrial economy was changing the face of our country and the habits of our people

ABRAHAM LINCOLN FORESAW THE DANGER TO OUR REPUBLIC IN GREAT CORPORATIONS OR AGGREGATIONS OF WEALTH

In the midst of this great development our Nation was rent asunder by the War between the States. Following this war, one of our great Presidents, Abraham Lincoln, said:

As a result of the war, corporations have been enthroned, an era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before, even in the midst of war.

Those words, so pregnant with meaning, are just as applicable today—and sound the same note of warning in the midst of World War No. 2 as they did following the Civil War, 80 years ago. Lincoln was assassinated shortly thereafter and the people lost a great champion of real free enterprise. Combinations of capital and industry were rapidly forming themselves into powerful groups known as trusts in the post-Civil War era.

BENJAMIN HARRISON: "COMBINATIONS OF CAPITAL (TRUSTS) ARE DANGEROUS CONSPIRACIES AGAINST THE COMMON GOOD"

Many fortunes made during the Civil War formed the nuclei of these trusts, and in 1890 another President, Benjamin Harrison, gave this message to the common people:

Earnest attention should be given by Congress to a consideration of the question, how far the restraint of those combinations of capital commonly called trusts is a matter of Federal jurisdiction. When organized, as they often are, to crush out all healthy competition and to monopolize the production or sale of an article of commerce and general necessity, they are dangerous conspiracies against the public good, and should be made the subject of prohibitory and even penal legislation.

It was not until the beginning of the twentieth century, however, that a real attempt was made by government to check these great trusts in their antisocial and greedy development.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT USED THE "BIG STICK" ON THE MONOPOLISTIC CORPORATIONS

Theodore Roosevelt was inaugurated in 1901 and during his term in office made a partially successful attempt to break up these great trusts. The Sherman Antitrust Act had been passed July 2, 1890. Roosevelt tried to enforce it. In denouncing these great combinations of economic power, Theodore Roosevelt said:

A combination should not be tolerated if it abuses the power acquired by combination, to the public detriment. No corporation or association of any kind should be permitted to engage in foreign or interstate commerce, that is formed for the purposes of, or whose operations create, a monopoly or general control of the production, sale, or distribution of any one or more of the prime necessities of life or articles of general use and necessity. Such combinations are against the public policy; they violate the common law, and I believe the Congress can close the channels of interstate commerce against them for its protection.

Although he was successful in dividing into separate legal units most of these great trusts, we know that it was only a temporary check in their development.

WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT DENOUNCED MONOPOLY AND SUPPRESSION OF COMPETITION AS CONTRARY TO PUBLIC GOOD

Many of the divided units soon became greater in wealth and economic power than the original parent trust and Theodore Roosevelt's successor, William Howard Taft, had this to say about this grave question:

Through all our consideration of this grave question, however, we must insist that the suppression of competition, the controlling of prices, and the monopoly or attempt to monopolize in interstate commerce and business, are not only unlawful but contrary to the public good, and that they must be restrained and punished until ended.

The Attorney General, at my suggestion, has drafted a Federal incorporation bill, embodying the views I have attempted to set forth, and it will be at the disposition of the appropriate committees of Congress.

Congress did pass laws, but the powerful monopolies and corporations continued to grow in financial and political power. They either ignored or circumvented the laws which had been enacted to curb or control their operations. These great monopolies moved behind the State and National Legislatures and through their campaign contributions and control of newspapers they elected to public office, in too many instances, men who either openly fought the corporation's battles or silently acquiesced to their program of economic fascism.

WOODROW WILSON FORECAST CONTROL OF THE POLITICAL STATE BY GREAT CORPORATIONS

Woodrow Wilson, another great President and a true believer in democracy and real free enterprise, was inaugurated as President in 1913. He, too, as a great student of the history of economic development of our Nation, saw the danger to our traditional structure of government. He realized that a powerful economic state within a political state would soon dominate the political state, and here is his warning to the common people.

The corporations now overshadow partnerships altogether. Still more do they overshadow all individuals engaged in business on their separate responsibility. * * * A modern corporation is an economic society, a little economic state—and not always little even as compared with States. Manufacturers have been observed to develop a score of subsidiary industries. * * * Society in short * * * is building up bodies economic outside its bodies politic which may, if we do not find means to prevent them, dominate bodies politic themselves.

But Woodrow Wilson's crusade of domestic reform was interrupted by World War No. 1. Again national economic welfare and security were postponed because of war. This time it was a war 3,000 miles away, but by that time the development of commerce and transportation had reached such international importance that against our will, we became embroiled. During World War No. 1 our production of food and equipment soared to heretofore unknown heights. Our unemployed went to work. We operated on a full production, full employment basis.

FREE ENTERPRISE OF THE 1920'S—OUR GREAT BUSINESS LEADERS ADVOCATE A REPEAT

Over 1,700 millionaires were made during the war and big business entrenched itself more firmly than ever. The industrial plant was expanded due to the war demands an orgy of speculation and crooked finance followed. The great corporations expanded their fields of endeavor, ruthlessly eliminating or purchasing their competitors. They practiced during the Harding, Coolidge, Hoover regime their type of "free enterprise"; their brand of "rugged individualism"; their "freedom from interference and regulation by Government." The ruthless warfare of the jungle, the law of fang and club, was waged in the business world. If ever unrestricted, unrestrained free enterprise had its opportunity for full play, it had it during the years following Woodrow Wilson's death—a death which was hastened no doubt by the realization that these great financial forces he had fought before the war, had, during the war, obtained greater power; a power which they selfishly used after the war to defeat his plan for world peace. Yes, under false slogans, these great interests confused the people, brought pressure to bear upon their friends in the United States Senate and wrecked Wilson's plan for a World Court where the differences between nations could have been settled by arbitration. The events of the past two decades have vindicated Wilson and damned forever his opponents. The orgy of inflation and crooked finance brought our economic system to an almost complete stop in 1929. The "free enterprise" boys had overplayed their hand. Their oracles of business wisdom proved to be false prophets. Their great business leaders were discredited in the eyes of the American people. Some of them committed suicide. Others like Insull, the great utility magnate, and the oil tycoons, Doheney and Sinclair, were indicted. Some went to jail. Their crooked trails ran throughout the Government—even into President Harding's Cabinet. Their Secretary of the Interior, Albert Fall, was convicted and sent to prison for collusion with a great oil company in the Teapot Dome scandal. There was no cry during this period of "too much Government in business," but the common people know by the record which Big Business wrote that there was too much "business in Government"!

And what about the common people? The crash came in October of 1929, a depression descended upon the American people which made previous depressions resemble picnics. Our "free-enterprise" system failed to function. Over one-third of our people were thrown into economic insecurity. Fifteen million wage earners lost their jobs. Our discredited business leaders were panic-stricken. They had no plan then and they have no plan now.

Our present President came into office in January 1933 and through deficit financing started the wheels of our economic system turning and, as I stated before, World War No. 2 has kept them turning. When the war ends we face disaster if we depend upon the discredited theory of laissez faire, as advocated by big business. The development of trusts, great corporations, monopolies, and cartels has created a condition in our economic world which precludes and effectively prohibits the practice of real free enterprise.

What do I mean by "real free enterprise"? A society that operates on a real free-enterprise basis encourages the maximum number of independent business units possible, compatible with the need of society and their economic justification. The tendency of monopoly is to eliminate business units and limit production without regard to the need of society. Its sole concern is monetary profit. Therefore, monopoly eliminates real free enterprise.

Does that condition of real free enterprise, as I have interpreted it, exist today? I have given you the comments of Jefferson, Lincoln, Harrison, Theodore Roosevelt, Taft, and Woodrow Wilson, as they lived and analyzed the changing nature of our economic system. Let me now give you the final Presidential comment by our contemporary President—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT SUMMARIZES PRESENT STATUS OF FREE ENTERPRISE

He gives a powerful summary of our present status and a damning indictment against those vociferous leaders of big business, those hypocrites who blare the trumpets of free enterprise to confuse the people and, in their corporate, monopolistic power and practices, prevent its operation. I quote the words of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt:

> In place of the independent businessman we have the managing clerk of a chain store who cannot even make a credit sale, and a superintendent has taken the place of the factory owner. The small businessman has been crushed, merged, consolidated, or otherwise retired. * * * Local independence has been sacrificed to balance sheet values. * * * Private enterprise has become half regimented and half competitive, half slave and half free, which was as fatal to those who manipulate it as to those who suffer under its impositions.

The "free enterprise" which big business practices is the freedom for the biggest fish, who gets there first, to eat all the little fish in the pool. It is the freedom which allows all of the big fish (corporate monopolies) to form a trust or monopoly so they can more effectively eliminate the small fish (independent businessmen). The "free enterprise" big business advocates is for the right to continue its process of eliminating the independent grocer, druggist, clothier, movie owner, oil-station operator, and even the independent banker. Twenty-five years ago I started my career as a small independent businessman. During those 25 years I "was there." I have experienced the competition every independent businessman experiences. I have seen the change take place in my home town, a change that prevails throughout America. The bulk of the retail and wholesale business in my town and yours is done by local units of the great corporations and monopolies which dominate American business. We call them chain stores, chain groceries, chain drugs, chain movie palaces, chain banks, and so forth. And the word "chain" is more apt, more descriptive than most of us realize, for they are the economic chains of slavery which stifle individual initiative and prevent real free enterprise, the free enterprise which was envisaged and practiced by the founding fathers—the free economic opportunity which goes with freedom of religion and freedom of political choice; the economic opportunity for the boy and girl of today to enter a profession or independent business career of his own choosing, when he arrives at the point of entry into the business world.

The economic opportunity afforded our people in the development of our Nation was the dynamic force which built America. It gave full play to the instinct of personal adventure, the instinct of self-fulfillment, the hunger to build and manage one's own business. When business classifications are closed one after the other by the domination of great Nation-wide chains, this opportunity is gone. The intelligent man realizes that his chances for success are very small and he loses that dynamic urge to build his own business. His only alternative is salaried employment in an impersonalized corporation, where too often his personality is submerged and his initiative and ideas are regimented to the pattern most profitable to corporate procedure. Thus we see the present status of our economy completely changed from the American tradition of real free enterprise—rapidly approaching the end of individual initiative as we have known it—rapidly displacing the widespread independent ownership of farm, home, and business enterprise.

I contend that any force which unnecessarily destroys the independent farmer and independent enterprise also destroys home ownership, giving birth to some form of economic and political fascism, leading inevitably to revolution! If we here in America fail to recognize this truth and fail to take steps to reverse our present trend toward chain stores and monopolies, I say to you with no fear of an intelligent contradiction, that within a few years this country will be faced with the most vicious class war in the history of the world. I base this prediction on the known fact that any nation which liquidates its middle-class farmers, workers, professional men, and other enterprises, liquidates its economic liberty. You cannot liquidate economic liberty without destroying political liberty. When you have accomplished the latter the people revolt. For the past 25 years the small independent businesses of these United States have suffered an epidemic of liquidations on a scale unparalleled in our history and we must now repair the damage and prepare the cure. Where to start is, of course, the problem, but a start must be made—and at once.

I believe that "little people" should own little farms and little businesses, and that "big people," as they are commonly called, should be kept to those fields in which they do the best job toward making this a better life for everybody. The perpetuation of democracy depends upon the protection of "little people."

RESTORATION OF REAL FREE ENTERPRISE THE ONLY ALTERNATIVE TO COLLECTIVISM OR TOTALITARIANISM

This real free enterprise was supplanted in Russia by state collectivism, which means the operation of all business for the profit of the state. It necessarily eliminates the political, religious, and economic rights of the individual as we have known them. This real free enterprise was supplanted in the Axis nations—Italy, Spain, Japan, and Germany—by totalitarianism, which means the operation of all business for the profit of certain favored individual owners of great corporate monopolies and enterprises. This national plan also eliminates the political, religious, and economic rights of the individual.

In my opinion we will face the choice of these two philosophies of government during our next economic collapse—depression—unless we restore real free enterprise.

How are we to do this? In my concluding statement I intend to give my suggestions as to how we can restore real free enterprise.

In closing I wish to reemphasize my belief in the real free enterprise which built America. I believe that the traditional procedure of real free enterprise is the solution. I believe that economic opportunity which we once enjoyed should be restored. I believe that the cancerous growth of unchecked corporate holdings and monopoly power must be removed from our economic system. Unless this is done we face an impossible situation when the war is over. We will be required to find 10,000,000 more jobs than ever before, if our demobilized soldiers are not to walk the streets. We will need 15,000,000 more jobs if the millions of newly trained workers are not to displace every man over 45 years of age. This job-making problem cannot be accomplished by big business under its present procedure of monopoly control of production. They cannot meet the employment demands of the post-war world if they insist on tightly controlled and limited use of the newly increased plant facilities, which have cost the people of America $50,000,000,000 in public funds. Only full operation of our plant facilities, bringing full production of goods to our people, can furnish the full employment we must have. The shouting of "free enterprise" may temporarily confuse the people, but it will not prevent the collapse of an economic system that fails to serve its people. It will not prevent a greater depression than the depression of 1929. The people of America may not be so fortunate in their next crisis. The leader who emerges may have the ambition and ruthlessness of a Hitler.

DECENTRALIZE CORPORATE MONOPOLIES: FULL PRODUCTION AND OPERATION OF EXISTING PLANT FACILITIES, FULL EMPLOYMENT OF OUR PEOPLE

The time is closer than you think. Our only hope is in the intelligence of our people. Our only plan is to move fast and decentralize the monopolistic economic empires within our business system. Chain stores must be limited to a reasonable minimum of units. Additional units can be prevented by excise taxation. We must insist on full operation of our plant facilities in order that full employment may bring the blessings of full production to our people. We must restore the economic opportunity that is inherent in real free enterprise and give the independent businessman a chance to operate successfully again in our society. Our only chance to save religious and political democracy is to restore and perpetuate economic democracy.

May God give us the clarity of vision to demand the restoration of the real free enterprise of our fathers, and protect us from the fraudulent brand of "free enterprise" as advocated by the great corporate monopolies of big business.

Soldier-Vote Legislation

REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I join with other Members of the House in appreciation of the fact that the soldier-vote bill is now law. This is brought about notwithstanding the noncommittal attitude of the President. The Senate passed the bill 42 to 37. The House passed the bill 328 to 69.

Three options were open to the President. He could have approved the bill, thus making it law. He could have vetoed the bill, thus requiring a two-thirds vote by the Congress in order to make it a law. He could take no definite position and not be counted for or against the bill for a period of 10 days, whereupon it would become a law without Presidential action. He elected to pursue the latter course.

Mr. Speaker, this was surprising to many, in view of the message sent to the Congress on January 26, wherein the President condemned the Senate bill, the purpose of which was to furnish our service people with the complete State ballot. That message was delivered to the Congress after the bill had passed the Senate and while it was being considered in the House. The President said, in part:

I consider such proposed legislation a fraud on the soldiers and sailors and marines now training and fighting for us and for our sacred rights. It is a fraud upon the American people.

That is pretty strong language. Possibly the President did not mean it just that way, or possibly he has received additional information. Be that as it may, in a message delivered to the House on yesterday, advising that he would take no position for or against the bill, among other things, the President said:

The bill is, in my judgment, wholly inadequate to assure to service men and women, as far as is practically feasible, the same opportunity which they would have to vote if they were at home.

I quite agree with the President that, regardless of the kind of ballot used, it is not practically feasible to give to all of the service people all over the world the same opportunity to vote which these people would have if they were back in their home precincts; at best, the Congress can only make the effort. Nothing can be accomplished without State and Federal cooperation.

Again the President assures us that:

The Federal Government will and should do everything it can to get the State ballots to our men and women in the service.

Again I agree with the President. That promise means much to the soldiers who want to vote.

The President also says:

The Federal Government can insure, and in my judgment it is the duty of the Federal Government to insure, that every service man and woman who does not get his State ballot in time shall have the right to use a short and uniform Federal ballot.

Again I agree with the President. An official declaration of this kind on the part of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy is assurance that either the Federal or State ballot, as provided in this law, will be placed in the hands of all of our service people.

It is generally agreed that any State absentee ballot can be furnished to all service people within the United States. This being so, there is no necessity for the incomplete ballot in this country. Under the law, the Federal ballot can be used only by overseas service people, and by them only under two conditions: (a) That their States have certified their willingness to accept votes cast by the Federal ballot; and (b) that the overseas service voter has applied for but not received his State ballot; that is, it is the purpose of this law to place into the hands of our service people the State ballot when possible, and the bobtail ballot can only be used when the other ballot is not available. Is not that reasonable and just?

The Legislature of Michigan has amended our State law making it absolutely certain that Michigan service people will receive the State ballot and that this ballot will be counted. This is conditioned only on the desire of the soldier to vote and the ability of the Post Office Department, the Army, the Navy, and the merchant marine to deliver the ballots. It would seem that this should be ample assurance. It is gratifying to note that the services are already organizing and making preparations to carry out the President's promise as to delivery.

It must be remembered that no ballots—soldier or otherwise—can be legally counted in any State unless they find their way into the ballot boxes. Therefore, regardless of how many Federal ballots are sent into a State, those ballots only have vitality if they are placed in the State ballot box and counted along with State ballots. This of necessity requires State cooperation and approval.

This soldier-vote matter has been before the country and the Congress for many weeks. Under the original Green-Lucas bill, the President would have named a commission to deliver these bobtail ballots to service people in this country and abroad, under such rules and regulations as the commission might make. Later the commission would deliver the voted ballots to the States. There was no assurance that the States would count them. There are those who protested against the Commander in Chief, who probably will be a candidate in the election, naming this commission to conduct an election where he might be personally interested. On the other hand, it has been charged that some of those who opposed the Green-Lucas bill did not want these ballots handled in this way because they felt that it might aid a fourth-term election. All such charges should be ignored. Politics has no place here. There should be no compulsion or influence. Nevertheless, legislation should provide against any such contingencies. This new law does that very thing.

There has been much talk about giving the soldier the right to vote. That right is inherent in the qualified citizen. The purpose of the Congress has been to furnish the opportunity to the service people to exercise their right to vote. The real controversy has been as to method and not as to objective.

Mr. Speaker, I have received numerous letters asking for copies of the Federal ballot. Therefore, I am including herein a copy of the official ballot just as it will be delivered to those who are entitled to receive it. It is as follows:

OFFICIAL FEDERAL WAR BALLOT

Instruction: To vote, write in the name of the candidate of your choice for each office.

ELECTORS OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

(A vote for President includes a vote for Vice President of the same party, and shall be deemed to be a vote for the candidates by name for Presidential and Vice Presidential electors of his party in your State)

Write in the name of your choice for President _____

UNITED STATES SENATOR

(Only if a Senator is to be elected in your State)

Write in the name of your choice for Senator _____

UNITED STATES SENATOR, UNEXPIRED TERM

(Only if a Senator is to be elected in your State for an unexpired term)

Write in the name of your choice for Senator _____

REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FOR YOUR DISTRICT

Write in the name of your choice for Representative in Congress for your district _____

REPRESENTATIVE AT LARGE IN CONGRESS

(Only in the States entitled thereto)

Write in the name or names of your choice for Representative at Large _____ (Vote for one or two as the case may be)

It will be observed that where the Federal ballot is used, the soldier can vote only for President, Vice President, Senator, and Congressman.

It will be further observed that where the Federal ballot is used, the soldier must know the names of his candidates, must be able to spell the names correctly, and must write them in the ballot. How many servicemen will have this information?

Where the State ballot is used, the soldier will have before him the names of all the candidates running for all the offices in the election. All he will be required to do is to place a cross in front of the names of the men for whom he wants to vote, just the same as if he were voting in his home precinct.

If the soldier were given his choice of ballots, which one would he choose?

No, Mr. Speaker; there is no comparison.

To summarize the argument, the Federal ballot is opposed primarily because—

First. It denies the service man and woman the same full participation in the November election that the civilian here at home enjoys.

Second. It restricts the service man and woman to a vote for Federal officers—President, Vice President, and Members of Congress—only.

Third. Voters in the armed forces would be partially disfranchised in that they could not participate in State, county, and local elections. They would not be permitted to vote for any of the 34 Governors who will be elected in November.

Fourth. The ballot carries no names of candidates, thus preventing the casting of an intelligent ballot.

Fifth. The ballot is clearly illegal and unconstitutional, standing alone. It ignores the requirements of State election laws. Therefore, it could not be counted by election judges in many States.

Sixth. In the event of a contested election, which the Federal "bobtailed" ballot clearly invites, the Nation would face a chaotic situation.

The Congress has done its part. A proper and adequate method of soldier voting has been provided. If a State refuses to cooperate and the soldiers from that State are not permitted to vote, the responsibility rests entirely upon the State. The President's promise, to which I have referred, should remove all doubt as to Federal cooperation.

Of course, this law is not as those who favor the short ballot only would have it. It is not as those who favor the State ballot only would have it. Like most legislation in a democracy, it is a compromise at a point where the minds of both groups can conscientiously meet. It is the result of the sincere effort of the Congress to permit these service people, now scattered all over the earth, to vote for their public officials from President to coroner.

In the final analysis, the success of this law depends upon two factors: First, the cooperation of the States, and, second, upon the cooperation and ability of the administration, through the War and Navy Departments and the merchant marine, to deliver the State ballots, where practical, and the short ballots in other cases. I am convinced we will have this cooperation.

Senator Swan, Democratic Leader of Sacramento, Endorses the Candidacy of Hon. J. Leroy Johnson for the Democratic Nomination for Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. LEROY JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, for over 25 years my predecessors in office, Hon. Charles F. Curry, Republican, and Hon. Frank H. Buck, Democrat, have, each time that they sought reelection, filed as candidates in both the Republican and Democratic primaries.

These gentlemen rendered distinguished service for the Third District of California and each of them died while in office. Each time that they sought reelection they were given the nomination of both parties. Instead of serving as rabid partisans they tried to serve all the people of their district.

During my present term as the Representative of the Third District of California I have tried hard to emulate the distinguished service of these two able Members of the House.

I, likewise, have filed for the nomination of both parties. My party affiliation is Republican. Consequently it is very gratifying to learn that Hon. John Harold Swan, State Senator from the Sacramento district, and a distinguished Democratic leader and progressive thinker, has endorsed my effort to obtain the Democratic nomination. Under the rule permitting an extension of my remarks, I am making a part of this statement a letter which Senator Swan sent to the Sacramento Bee, without my knowledge or request. I hope my friends in the Third District of California will carefully read Senator Swan's letter, which reads as follows:

SACRAMENTO COUNTY, April 2, 1944.

EDITOR, SACRAMENTO BEE,

Sacramento, Calif.

DEAR EDITOR: A somewhat sinister note is injecting itself into the campaign for Congress in many of the California districts. I urge that in our Third District the highly unpatriotic appeal of blind partisanship be rebuked and discredited. I denounce as entirely improper in wartime the attack frequently made upon able Congressmen by minority groups that such Congressmen should be defeated for reelection because they have not in every instance followed the desires of such groups when such desires happened to coincide with the desires of the President. The basis of the attack is that the individual Congressman is not following the leadership of our Commander in Chief and therefore is almost guilty of treason and under no circumstances should be returned to Congress.

It is axiomatic in a representative democracy that a Congressman's first duty is to his constituents. If he does not vote their will insofar as it can be learned or insofar as he by his election platform has expressed it, then the people of his district have no voice in the Government and are completely and effectively disenfranchised. Before any political critic condemns a State or National legislator, he should first ask whether or not the legislator has voted the will of his district. If the legislator has expressed the sentiment of his constituents, then democracy is functioning, and no attack on the legislator is soundly based or justifiable.

In wartime all must make sacrifices. Organized labor has made great sacrifices, and perhaps in order to keep the good will of all Americans, must make, as labor usually has done, greater sacrifices than any other group.

My public voting record in committee and on the floor of the State senate clearly shows that no other member has been a better friend of labor than have I. In 1941 the American Federation of Labor tabulation of votes showed that my voting record was the best in the senate. The American Federation of Labor made no tabulation of votes for the 1943 session, but the C. I. O. tabulation, just released, for that session shows that I am the only member of the senate with 12 "good" labor votes and no "bad" labor votes. What I say, therefore, I say as a proved friend of labor.

I regret that some of the leadership of organized labor seeks to defeat our capable and distinguished Congressman, LEROY JOHNSON, because some of his votes have been displeasing. I believe that he will prove in the long run to be a better friend of organized labor than many of those who profess to doubt his friendship for all who work for a living. I urge that the membership of labor support the candidacy of Congressman JOHNSON. He is honest, intelligent, and courageous, and will always give fair consideration to the needs of every group.

Congressman JOHNSON does not know that I am writing this letter. I have endorsed his candidacy because he has demonstrated great ability and because I resent the narrow partisanship that seeks his defeat on the ground that he has not been a rubber stamp for the Chief Executive.

I cannot as a Democrat be a party to an attempt to defeat a capable and efficient public servant merely because he is a Republican. We must place country first and party second.

All of my friends in the Democratic Party and in the ranks of organized labor will benefit our country and our district by voting for Congressman JOHNSON's reelection. Neither of his opponents, and one of them I count as a personal friend, an individual of demonstrated leadership ability, can hope to accomplish at this time what Mr. JOHNSON's experience will enable Mr. JOHNSON to achieve.

May we in the Third Congressional District decisively rebuke the sinister contention that our country's welfare needs now in Washington only rubber stamps of the Chief Executive and his bureaucrats.

Respectfully,

JOHN HAROLD SWAN,
State Senator, Nineteenth District.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the Kansas farm women agree that the O. P. A. operation of poultry and eggs has been "fowl."

There is a thrill about the sowing of oats—it is always the first planting of the new year.

Oh, Lord, please roll away the stone from the tomb of blood and tears. We don't mind the sweat.

The most constructive thing the Republican Party could possibly do this year would be to destroy politically the destroyers.

Unlike the long-promised second front, a definite and tremendously important battle is set for the first Tuesday in November.

The farmer works eternally with nature—he never knows for sure what he is going to do tomorrow, but there always is something that he can do.

We love the memory of Jackson and Lincoln because they had seen and felt and experienced personally the rough and tumble of life. They knew what it was all about.

We revere the first President for three things in particular: as military leader of the Revolution, as the first President, and as the author of the Farewell Address.

Aside from the annual supply bills, Congress is not so busy. The war is getting set. While a military victory is coming, we will be chiefly concerned with extending or executing O. P. A. and planning the party conventions.

Two undecorated heroes at home—Johnnie Corrigan of Powhattan, for 19 years a great leader of youth in a small high school, and Mrs. Ivan Clements of Jackson County, mother of 11, a correspondent of note, who drove 40 miles in a snowstorm to attend her district convention.

Montana's Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the press in recent weeks has carried statements to the effect that nearly every State has lagged in meeting its draft quotas. I should like to call to the attention of the House the fact that Montana is one of four States which has not been deficient in furnishing its share in fulfilling its quota. This means, of course, that Montana has had to continue on an increased scale the induction of fathers, and it also indicates that in proportion to our manpower we are in this war, as in the last, being asked to carry more than the national load. Out of a total of 127,958 persons registered for the draft in ages 18 to 44, inclusive, we have sent, up to December 9, 1943, 47,388. This figure indicates a tremendous drain on our manpower, and when one considers the loss that Montana has suffered, not only in the draft but to defense industries as well, one can begin to comprehend the potentially dangerous situation in which we find ourselves at the present time.

The First World War left Montana bankrupt in land, men, and money, and unless something is done the Second World War may leave us in a worse condition. On the basis of what information I have been able to gather, Montana's contribution to the armed forces has been proportionately greater than that of most of the other States, and the Army Selective Service officials admitting this during the first year of the draft said that the situation was caused by the fact that it took so long for credit for enlistments to get back to Montana draft boards. The result was that the draft quotas were not reduced in proportion, and it seems logical to assume on the basis of facts enumerated that when this war is over we will again be found to be one of the States contributing the most in proportion to population in carrying on the war. Now we are being called on to produce more food with less men and less machinery; to produce more materials; to contribute to every drive connected with the war, and to place all our resources at the beck and call of the Nation in its hour of emergency. These we are glad to do, but we want it done on an equitable basis and we want Montana to be given every fair opportunity along with all the other States in the Union.

There have been no draft rejections in Montana on account of illiteracy and there have been very few rejections on the grounds of physical disability. We are not asking for any special favors, but we are asking for the opportunity to be treated as an equal and not as an orphan whose resources can be used at will with no thought for the future. In this respect it might be well to point out that we are now trying to bring about the development of our water resources on the Missouri and Columbia River basins. We hope that when the bill for the authorization of the Hungry Horse comes up after the recess that the Congress will keep these factors in mind.

Montana is one of the two States in the war which has not received a war industry. Montana has lost in population since 1940 a total of 88,237 people out of a 1940 population of 559,456. Despite this we have not only met every draft quota and exceeded some, but we have also, according to press reports which I have gathered from Montana papers, been one of the few States to exceed its 1943–44 quota of student nurses. Our quota was 442 and our enrollment is 525 student nurses enrolled in State nursing schools to date. Although we have exceeded our quota in student nurses, the national average on January 1, 1944, was 37 percent behind its quota.

In the 1943 industrial salvage campaign, Montana passed its State quota by 80 percent and according to Mr. E. G. Nelson, of Minneapolis, regional and general industrial Salvage chief, our State recorded the highest percentage of any State in the Nation last year.

In the matter of bonds, Montana has oversubscribed every campaign to date. During the Fourth War Loan campaign we oversubscribed the quota set for Montana by over $10,000,000 and many of those bonds were the "E" group which indicates that they are being bought by the ordinary folks, and it also indicates our confidence in our country. Fifty-two and five-tenths percent of the State's total sales in the fourth campaign was in "E" bonds compared to the national average of 32 percent. There were $220,172,000 E, F, and G bonds sold, which is more than one to every Montana family. In the Fourth War Loan drive Montanans purchased $124,968,900 in bonds with total quota of $97,300,000. This is $27,668,000 over our quota.

These facts, and they are only a few of the many which I could call to your attention, have been accomplished in one of the States which has enjoyed the least in war contracts. It demonstrates that there is among the people of Montana a loyalty, a desire to do their full part, a satisfaction in assuming the burdens as well as the benefits of free government, that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world. It shows also that Montanans are standing right behind their boys on the fighting fronts and is living proof that Montana has been exceeded in patriotism and sacrifice by no other State.

My purpose in calling this to the attention of the House is to show that Montana has done its full share in carrying on its part in this war in which we are all engaged. You may rest assured that Montana will continue to do its share, and more, until final and complete victory is won against our enemies and until a peace is assured which will do away with this system of barbaric struggles which has been our unfortunate lot in recent decades.

Repeal of Daylight Saving

REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, one of the surprising features of the Second World War is the change it has wrought in established methods of warfare. The reversal in tactics, weapons, engineering, and practically every phase of military procedure amounts to a revolution. The reversal in preconceived notions extends to measures affecting civilian economy, and includes such items as rationing, price control, civilian defense, lend-lease and, last but not least, daylight saving.

Daylight saving was adopted with general approval and acquiescence and on the plausible representation that it would save electric power, contribute to health, and accelerate factory production. The critical and conclusive test of experience has demonstrated that it accomplishes none of these objectives. On the contrary, it wastes power, is deleterious to the health of young and old, and is one of the prime factors in absenteeism.

The rapidly rising tide of sentiment against artificial time is indicated in the many letters received on the subject. Here are excerpts from some of them received in the last 3 days. They are widely distributed both geographically and industrially.

Some are from physicians:

CARRUTHERSVILLE, MO.

Please rid us of this farcical and nonsensical regulation, the so-called daylight saving time. This attempt to regulate our personal lives, by moving the clock up an hour, is one of the damnedest fool things ever forced on the general public. To me, a public health officer, the greatest objection comes from the standpoint of the school child in the rural districts.

Certainly in the administration of any public health program, there can be no excuse for arousing 6 or 7 year old kids at such an early hour and exposing them to the elements, while they are still half asleep and unable to protect themselves. The wait in the cold until the bus arrives is not conducive to the prevention of diseases brought about by exposure, to which this age child is very susceptible.

FRED L. OGILVIE, M. D.,
Medical Director, Pemiscot County Health Unit.

MEXICO, MO.

Get this nonsensical "daylight savings" repealed. Not one reason for it and many why it should be abolished. Get this job done and earn our undying thanks and gratitude.

R. S. WILLIAMS, M. D.

EUREKA, MO.

Do away with this useless and most harmful "war saving daylight time." I have talked with many people in this part of the country and they are all for going back to our regular time.

It is time that the parasitic "time" bug that got in someone's bonnet was squelched.

JESSE S. SARGENT, M. D.

COLUMBIA COUNTY, GA.

Let us return to standard time. This war time has caused so much unnecessary confusion, loss of time, expense, and suffering.

Yours truly,

J. L. WEEKS, M. D.

Letters from clergymen and pastors of churches:

UNION, MO.

In the morning paper I notice there is a bill before Congress to change the time back to the standard schedule.

I do not know how much the time affects business and the farming industry, but I feel sure the change of time had mitigated against the work of the churches, and that I am voicing the reaction of many other pastors. So I am sincerely hoping to see the change back to the standard time.

The St. Louis Globe Democrat made a favorable comment on the proposal on its editorial page this morning.

R. A. HUTSON,
Pastor, First Baptist Church.

BOYD, MINN.

We have had too much tinkering by New Deal theorists with the calendar, the clock, and the unchangeable law of supply and demand. To say the least, the war time is a nuisance in farming communities. Get us back to safe and sane government before we have complete regimentation.

ST. JOHN'S LUTHERAN CHURCH,
A. W. FUERSTENAU, Pastor.

ST. JOHN'S RECTORY,
Summerville, S. C.

Work to have a bill passed so that the Nation can return to rational clock time and get away from this abnormal way of living.

I have written our Senator relative to the bill and will be pleased if all Congress will make it so we have normal conditions and do away with all this tampering with old institutions that have served this Nation all these hundreds of years.

JAS. A. MCELROY,
Pastor.

PERRYVILLE, MO.

Bravo—set the clocks back. None of our people here like it in wintertime.

Rev. F. G. WIEBERG,
Pastor, St. Boniface Church.

PLAINFIELD, N. J.

Mr. Robert Garland, of Pittsburgh, was, as you know, the prime mover in the agitation that resulted in the national adoption of this fast time in 1918. He is generally regarded as the father of daylight saving time in the United States. Last winter I wrote to him and asked him if he approved of it for winter as well as summer. He wrote back:

"Please understand that I never advocated a change of the clock in wintertime. This simply amounts to a change of the clock and cannot properly be called daylight saving time."

You say it helps factories in defense work by saving 500,000 kilowatts a day of electric power needed by the factories. But as they are now working 24 hours a day, the advanced time does not give them 1 minute more to make ammunition to smash Hitler. While the defense work is going on without stop, it is not hastened by the different shifts of men coming in and going out an hour earlier. The work is being done regardless of who does it and regardless of whether the clocks on the wall are right or an hour fast.

Consider another proof of the truth of Mr. Garland's declaration that "a changing of the clock in wintertime cannot properly be called daylight saving time."

Representative J. W. WADSWORTH of New York says that recent estimates of power authorities showed that only 2 percent of electrical energy could be saved by advancing the clocks during the winter. And that, he says, does not take into account the extra voltage used by farmers in the very early morning hours. Hence, the saving is less than 2 percent.

In view of this negligible amount of electric energy saved by this device—less than 2 percent—there is no justification for the cruelty inflicted on people by this so-called winter daylight saving.

The effect of this scheme on the morale of the people is bad, and morale is a tremendous factor in winning the war. Why cruelly compel those who must rise at 5 o'clock on a cold, dark winter morning to rise at 4? Or those who rise at 7 to get up at 6, still cold and dark and lonely? The best rest and sleep come to us in the early morning hours, and being compelled to get up a full hour before we normally have to get up unfits one for the day's work.

You say that if an air raid and consequent black-out came in the early evening, the fast time would enable folks to get home before the alarm. But an air raid might as well come in the dark early morning. No one can tell when the planes will come. We have to take our chances at both ends of the day.

The people will gladly make all necessary sacrifices, but please don't ask for unnecessary ones.

Letters from schoolmen:

HANNIBAL, MO.

Eliminate daylight saving time. Restore the country to standard time and sanity. I have yet to find one person who can present one provable argument that daylight saving time is any advantage whatsoever or that it contributes in any way to winning the war. I hope the Congress passes this bill and thus eliminates one of the most asinine pieces of legislation that has been thrust upon a helpless public.

A. E. PRINCE,
President Hannibal-LaGrange College.

TROY CENTER SCHOOL,
Columbia City, Ind.

I am principal of a school which embraces the entire township. Every child is transported by bus. We are forced to take up school one-half hour later because our children are having to stand at ends of lanes or major road connections waiting in the dark for the bus. Then again, we're losing an hour of rest because who wants to go to bed at 8 or 8:30 when it isn't even dark, but the clock necessitates getting up that extra hour in the morning. Farmers to transact business in town must stop work and go early in the afternoon or everything is closed.

ROXIE BARCUS,

FULTON, MO.

Much gratified to note from the newspapers the introduction of the bill to change the time back to the old basis. I greatly approve.

Wars aren't won by twisting the hands of a clock.

Sentiment here is almost unanimously in favor of a return to standard time.

L. S. HOPKINS,

BONNOTS MILL, MO.

We don't like the system of daylight saving time.

The daylight saving time keeps farmers from accomplishing a full day's work.

If the time goes back to central standard time, many people will be pleased. I know our teachers will be.

SCHOOL SISTERS OF ST. FRANCIS,

QUINCY, ILL.

Return to original time. As a teacher, I realize the disadvantages to children during the winter months. It is better also for our rural population and our churches. I cannot see that daylight-saving time is of any advantage to industry during the winter months at least.

MARY B. INGMAN,

Organizations and officials are represented:

ARKANSAS CITY, KANS.

I am enclosing a copy of an editorial which we had written in one of the local papers, also a sample petition which has appeared in both newspapers. We have asked the citizens of Arkansas City to sign these petitions and send them to the schoolhouses where they are collected by the different P. T. A. units.

Steps have been taken to contact our Congressmen and Senators and ask them to support your bill.

Needless to say we are very anxious that your bill receives enough favorable support to pass it.

MRS. E. S. BERRY,
Chairman of Committee on Time Change, Parent-Teacher's Associations.

ERWIN, TENN.

I am very much interested in House Resolution 4428, to restore standard time during the months of January, February, November, and December.

In my opinion the standard time should be restored during the entire year, but if that cannot be done I am heartily in favor of your resolution and hope it will pass.

Yours very truly,

JAMES J. MCLAUGHLIN,
General Solicitor, Clinchfield Railroad Co.

GRAFTON, N. DAK.

Board of governors, Grafton Civic Club, supports eliminating daylight saving time. This board definitely approves action that Nation's time return where belongs. The rural people want to avoid time arguments with townsmen when daylight saving time is an injustice and handicap to farmer and labor problems of this great Northwest, especially among potato, beet, grain growers. We Americans of standard quality should abide by standard time. Therefore approve measure and accordingly likewise request our Representatives in Congress.

BOARD OF GOVERNORS, GRAFTON CIVIC CLUB,

ATLANTA, GA.

I saw an article this morning in the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution where you had introduced a bill to eliminate daylight saving time and restore the country to standard time. In other words, to return to "horse-sense" time. I am 100 percent on anything to abolish these "crack-pot" laws and ideas that have been forced on the people. More power to your undertaking.

N. L. CAMPBELL,
Editor and Manager, the Railroad Journal.

Have Congress set the timepieces back to standard time. We lumbermen cannot have electric lights in the woods and still they work on this fool time so we have to get along the best we can in the dark.

Hoping you all will have some sense and do the right thing is the prayer of committee A of the Lumbermen's Association Eastern States.

EVERETT, WASH.

Whereas the daylight saving time has been tried and never found to serve the purpose; does not save fuel, light or other claimed savings; has worked a hardship on the farmers of the United States of America, and the farmer loses by trying to feed earlier; Therefore be it

Resolved, That we go on record as opposing the daylight saving time and petition the President of the United States and all public officials to restore standard time as soon as possible.

OFFICE OF THE CITY COMMISSION,
Dayton, Ohio.

There have been much confusion and dissatisfaction within the State of Ohio each spring and fall because of the recurrent time change.

Within our own city there is a very large segment of the population who find through experience that the so-called fast time accomplishes nothing for the war effort, but proves to be, according to their conviction, a definite drawback. Factory workers complain to us that they are not able to get their required hours of sleep during the summer months when we operate on fast time. Farmers in our vicinity make similar complaints against fast time. As a consequence of loss of sleep defense workers tell us that production suffers.

The city commission has unanimously authorized me to write that the situation in our city would be better by the enactment of the bill.

OSCAR F. MAUCH,
Clerk of the Commission.

Congressman CANNON,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I notice in a paper, under an Associated Press date line, that a bill is pending to restore standard time in the United States.

We discussed this matter at the board of directors' meeting of our local Kiwanis Club just before we saw the clipping mentioned, but felt there was nothing we could do about it. If there is anything we can do about this, I feel sure that our club would be glad to help in any way possible.

LON B. ROGERS.

STEUBENVILLE, OHIO.

Put the clocks back on standard time.

This tinkering with time twice a year is certainly a nuisance.

FRED M. COLEMAN.

INTERNATIONAL FALLS, MINN.

I note that a measure is under consideration to restore the country to standard time and to eliminate the so-called daylight saving time under which we have been operating recently.

This measure meets with hearty approval. I can see no useful purpose served by the present time arrangement. It is not suited to this part of the country at all.

I trust Congress will be successful in eliminating this nuisance.

M. M. ABBOTT.

Letters from all sections and all industries of the country:

IDAHO FALLS, IDAHO.

I know of nothing in the New Deal propaganda that has caused more trouble and inconvenience than this war time. We cannot begin work earlier than daylight. Our help does not start any earlier and wants to go home after 5, which is only 4 p. m. standard time, the middle of the afternoon. I will be surprised if we do not have a shortage of many farm crops and if weather happens to be against us it might be serious.

GEO. WHITING.

DAYTON, OHIO.

Change this war time. Last summer I was in a hospital, had an operation, and you can well imagine the long evenings till dark.

MRS. DAISY FREIER.

GRAND JUNCTION, COLO.

There are lots of nonsensical things to come up, but this war time leads all. Agriculture works from daylight until after dark at all seasons and if the city guys want more time off they can start an hour earlier in the morning and not have to disrupt the whole fabric of time by the foolish idea of setting the clocks forward 1 hour.

I have never yet talked to a single person who could see any sense in it.

H. O. LAMBETH.

GRASS LAKE, MICH.

The clocks must go back to standard time in order for the farmers to raise food for the nations.

F. J. HELM.

DAYTON, OHIO.

Dayton is to change time April 30, to eastern war time, and I surely don't approve of it. It seems like getting up in the middle of the night and retiring when it is still daylight.

More electricity will be consumed when we are told to conserve it.

Miss VERNA GLUECKERT.

HILLSBORO, TEX.

We, the pupils and teachers of Union Bluff School, Hill County, Tex., would like to add our names to the long list having already asked that our clocks be set back to standard time. We find that it works a great hardship, particularly through the winter months, to go to school before it is light.

UNION BLUFF SCHOOL TEACHERS AND PUPILS.

BALTIMORE, MD.

We of this community have twice voted down the so-called daylight saving. All winter long we get up in the cold, bleak predawn hours, and all summer we fight the youngsters to get them to bed in broad daylight. It is a vile and abominable arrangement.

E. N. HUTCHISON.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The time has worked great hardship on working people and farmers, not only in loss of rest and sleep, but in added dollars of expense for heat and electricity used. Please get us back to God's time.

M. J. H. HUBER.

RICHMOND, VA.

I read with a great deal of pleasure of your proposed bill to restore standard time in the United States of America, and I surely hope you will be able to get it to become law.

In this section of the country it is hard to find any daylight saved by this so-called daylight saving time between the months of October and March. We arise before daylight, often in the cold rain, snow, and sleet and have to burn lights which could be unlighted if we were allowed standard time.

(Mrs.) GERTRUDE WILKINSON.

DAYTON, OHIO.

The men and women of our city and county are wrought up over the confusing time, changed every 6 months, for what purpose no one seems to know. It serves no real purpose. It is detrimental to farmers, war workers, and industries. Last week our city commission passed an ordinance advancing the time 1 hour for the summer. Today, labor unions and others are circulating referendum petitions to have the voters rescind this action.

JOHN F. AHLERS.

PINE BLUFF, ARK.

I am a railroad shop worker. Ever since the change, or most of the time, we are required to start working at 6 o'clock sun time—7 war time—and working only 8 hours a day we get off at 3 sun time—4 war time—in the evening, which is about the middle of the evening. It forces us to get up 2 hours before daylight, burning electricity, get to our jobs an hour before good daylight, and burn electricity another 1½ to 2 hours until it gets light enough to see how to work, and then quit work when the sun is 2 to 3 hours high in the evening.

We ought to elect a Congress that has sense enough to let God's sun time alone.

M. M. HAMILTON.

During the winter months I go to work in the dark and return in the dark, where if we were on standard time I would go to work in daylight.

We were told that it was done to conserve electricity, but such statements are not borne out by the facts.

J. S. HOLMES,
Albany, N. Y.

GEORGETOWN, TEX.

This law is one of the worst blunders our representatives in Washington have made. If you will trace just how and where this idea started, you will find it was in some of our large plants where the office personnel and the golf players wanted more time in the evening for sport. Small plants have to work at a loss in this way; they have to go on peak load in the early morning hours, where formerly they usually are able to reduce their power and loads by, say, 12 o'clock midnight or even much of the time can start cutting down the loads by 10 p. m. Millions, with school children to get off to school, have to get up as early as 4 a. m. I firmly believe four-fifths of our people would vote for a repeal of this law, and the same with the soldiers that are in training. I heard a man say the other day his boy writes he has to get up at 4 a. m. Just take a look at this and see if you can find any class of our people that this law really benefits and helps in any way.

This new time is most inconvenient, confusing, demoralizing, and depressing. How we look forward to eastern standard time once more.

A SOUTH CAROLINIAN.

MAUMEE, OHIO.

In a 59-mile radius from here we have to contend with three different times.

Have noted a good many railroad accidents. Could we not suppose these employees working by one time, they and their families living by another, could cause accidents; clocks in hotels with two time hands, one city time, one railroad time. Then here is the home life—twice a year the thousands of babies must be adjusted to change of another time, plus habits of adults.

Let's get back to sane living conditions.

H. T. HATTON.

TREMPEALEAU, WIS.

In operating a large farm and hiring considerable help, I have found this "Roosevelt time," as we call it, the worst handicap that could be imposed on me. Millions of hours of manpower time have been lost on account of this foolishness, as a farmer's work must conform quite closely with sun time.

W. NICHOLLS.

NEW FRANKLIN, MO.

We don't mind working hard and long hours on standard time and doing the best we can. Where we have to pick up extra help, which is hard to get, and they work daylight saving, and our regular help work standard time, it upsets things and is very unsatisfactory for us.

And for the country children standing on the roadside in the cold and darkness waiting for a school bus, it is very unsatisfactory.

I have talked to many people in different lines of business and I have yet to find anyone that favors daylight saving time.

C. ALBERT SMITH.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Since the advent of the so-called contradictory daylight saving, I've never heard one person approve it.

It—the daylight saving—is not a saving in any sense of the word, at any time of the year, only a drain on one's health and nerves, to say nothing of the increased fuel and electric bills when it is preached on all sides to conserve both.

During the administration of President Harding, so strong were the protests against daylight saving here in Washington, he said never again would there be daylight saving in the District of Columbia.

EDITH M. GALLANT.

WABASH EMPLOYEES' HOSPITAL,
Decatur, Ill.

Hospital days start at 7 a. m. under this silly war time. Nurses and other hospital employees get up, have breakfast, and walk to work before dawn, about 8 months of the year. During half the year there is a tremendous waste of electricity while the morning work is being done. The long afternoons are not a boon, as supper in hospitals is early.

RUTH E. ROBERTS,

Eliminate daylight-saving time and restore the entire country to standard time. We are entirely in favor of setting the time back.

N. F. BEECKMAN.

MANAKIN, VA.

We have never liked daylight-saving time and have never been able to see how we saved anything by it. The truth of the matter was, we had to burn lights much longer in the morning, still they preach, save electricity.

L. C. CLARKE.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

Put forth every effort to see that the bill is passed. Daylight saving was never designed to be helpful to working people; it means their getting up in the dark early hours of the morning and going to bed during daylight.

For anybody who can sleep late or for those who have leisure for playing golf, daylight-saving time is a great boon; but the majority of Americans are working people, and should be considered. They were certainly overlooked when this bill was made effective. They were punished (penalized) by the passing of this wartime measure. Please do something about it real soon.

HELEN BRELSFORD.

DALLAS 1, TEX.

This daylight-saving time has been a terrible mistake and ought to be abandoned. If this bill is brought to the attention of enough voters, the reaction will be overwhelmingly in its favor.

M. H. GUILLOT.

CULPEPER, VA.

To eliminate daylight-saving time has appealed to the heart of every farmer and school child in Virginia. Children are compelled to rise before daylight and stand by the roadside, in all kinds of weather, awaiting a bus to take them to school. Children 6 and 7 years old have to submit to such cruel treatment.

Let us have God's time again in this beautiful world that man has almost ruined. The harm it has done children. Save electricity; what a joke that is. The cost is just the same no matter what the clock says.

MRS. J. H. ARMSTRONG.

BLUEMONT, VA.

I wish to endorse bill to restore standard time; the present fast time is a sample of the laws sponsored by the New Deal.

WALTER I. PRIEST.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

May I too add my protest against daylight saving. It is one of the worst things people have had to endure outside of the war. I am the mother of several children—some of which go to school. I get them up in the dark; they eat their breakfast in the dark; go to school in the dark.

MRS. BUTLER.

BELLEVILLE, ILL.

Keep the clock where it belongs and not an hour ahead, as it is with the present crazy idea of daylight saving time which does not save a thing, and we have to use electricity to see to wash our faces. That's one of the craziest ideas and was originated for the benefit of the golfers. Daylight saving time does not save a darned thing. What a crime to have to stop work at 3:30 p. m. instead of the correct time, 4:30 p. m.

G. J. HEINTZ.

BUTLER, OHIO.

War time is a mistake. Rationing may be a nuisance but as a handicap to the producing farmer it cannot compare with war time.

Farming is tied to the sun. It cannot be otherwise. The nearer a standard time can be to sun time the better. The net effect of war time is you start on sun time and quit on war time. We lose that hour.

War time is a handicap to farming and benefits no other producing industry.

Do your darndest to get the bill through.

PAUL D. LEEDY.

LAWRENCE, KANS.

We in the Middle West want the clocks set back to where they should be.

Yours truly,

DAYTON, OHIO.

As a war worker in the city of Dayton, and one who sees so many disadvantages of fast or war time, I heartily approve of the bill for establishment of standard time for the Nation. About 95 percent of the employees where I worked are against war time.

HAROLD DAGANHARDT.

GRAY SUMMIT, MO.

We live on a large farm and are willing to help in any way we can to help win the war, but feel that daylight saving time has worked unnecessary hardship on the farmers and school children. Children have to meet the school bus at 7 o'clock. The farmers need all the help they can get this year. Setting our clocks back will help a lot.

MR. AND MRS. WILFRED BEUMER.

PACIFIC, MO.

In advocating the change of time I am voicing the sentiments the businessmen, farmers, and laborers in this community.

We hope and pray you will accomplish this move. It has been one of the most detrimental and inconvenient laws ever enacted.

L. A. BROWN.

COLUMBIA, MO.

I have lived in St. Louis, which is one of the big cities supposed to be affected favorably by the use of the extra hour of sunshine, and have lived in smaller towns, and as yet I fail to see the benefit of it. Certainly there are inconveniences. Everyone does not get up at 7 a. m. (or later) and for the ones (most people, I think) who get up between 5 and 6, a light has to be burned in the morning 365 days of the year. On the other hand, before the daylight saving time there are a few months of the year when one can get up and do without lights if we use the "Lord's time" for our clocks.

Mrs. C. H. PRAGER.

NEW HAVEN, MO.

Set our clocks back to the old time. We are 100 percent for the bill.

OSCAR RUEGGE.

WENTZVILLE, MO.

This so-called daylight saving time is certainly a disgusting thing.

Just because the clocks are pushed up an hour is no sign that the dew will be off our crops an hour earlier. When we hire help they want to quit for the day when the sun is still way up and when we have business which needs our attention in town we must go in the middle of the day or else everything is locked up, way before the day is past.

We're using more oil for lights than before, just because we have to be up in the morning long before daylight.

BOSTON, MASS.

I was delighted to read in the newspaper that you had introduced a bill in Congress to eliminate daylight-saving time and restore the entire country to standard time.

Daylight saving is the most ridiculous, useless, inconsistent, and irritating law Congress ever thought up to plague us working folk.

At first it was stated that on account of the war plants, it was necessary. If the war plants are working 24 hours around the clock, then how could daylight-saving time be necessary or consistent?

Later it was stated England was on this time and therefore it would be best for us to be on the same time. How long since the United States has had to do as any other foreign power? We Americans have always in the past given and done for England but why should we copy her? Are we not capable of running our own country without any advice from outside?

Thirdly, why change the clock? If certain business desires to open an hour earlier all well and good, but what is to be gained by forcing others to change their time?

Fourthly, electric-light bills are far higher since the change, as for 7 months those of us who rise at 5 a. m. standard time leave nome when dark and arrive home when dark. Also, in the North, most apartment houses do not have the heat on so early and, of course, there is no sun to help warm up.

It's most difficult for one to live most of their life on standard time and suddenly change over to life an hour or two ahead without physical discomfiture. Those of us who may suffer from sinus, asthma, or bronchial ailments find the early morning air an aggravation to those symptoms.

Yours for repeal of daylight saving time.

RUTH LOUISE LEIGHTON.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

The bill to set the Nation's clocks back to where they were before all this silly meddling with daylight-saving time, deserves prompt enactment into law.

Because school children here had to get up in the dark during the winter months the State of Ohio compromised the time back and forth. We now go back to some other time tomorrow, April 30. We have railroad time, city time, daylight time, and State time. For sheer nonsense and utter confusion this variable time business is about the most stupid mistake that could be inflicted on the Nation. All talk about saving electricity is just poppycock. What you save in the evening you burn in the morning.

C. STEVEN GOBY.

EARL WOOLEVER.

ALBANY, N. Y.

I was pleased beyond words when I read an article on setting back the Nation's clocks. It's tough to get up and out in the pitch dark in the cold. The earlier it is the colder it is, and the school kiddies are out all winter at 8 o'clock in the pitch dark in wintry weather. If there were one ounce of sense to the measure or it kept boys from suffering over there we wouldn't mind. But it's no sense at all. It doesn't even save electricity, as it was supposed to. All the houses are lighted up till 8 and 8:30 on dark mornings.

I do hope with all my heart the clocks will be set back and let's have the ordinary time we always had.

This new time is just about as sensible as if we wanted to lengthen a skirt, so we cut some off the top and sew it on the bottom.

Mrs. FLORENCE B. WILSON.

ATTICA, IND.

The farmers will owe a debt of gratitude, that can never be paid, for your efforts to set the clocks back. Let us say the clock says 7 p. m.—the time really is 6 p. m. Farmer goes to milk and cannot milk because the flies are so bad. It is 8 p. m. by the clock and I go to shut up the chickens so we can go to church; they won't go in because they know it is only 7 p. m. I could go on and on—you just have no idea the nuisance it is.

MARY SHUPP.

SEATTLE, WASH.

Please eliminate daylight-saving time. It is silly, unnecessary, and profits no one. Do help us get rid of it forever.

ELISABETH V. CLARK.

GRAND HAVEN, MICH.

It is about time you fellers down there waked up to the fact that there is no use setting the clocks ahead. It is bad for the farmers and for outside workers, such as carpenters, bricklayers, and painters, and for school children. In the summer it is light until 10 o'clock and the children want to stay out until it is dark and it is about 11 o'clock before they get to bed and that is not enough sleep for them; in the morning it is so wet the farmers can't get to work on time; the only ones it is any good for is the golf players and that don't earn the common man a living; and the sooner the clocks are put back to central standard time where it belongs, the better.

DIRK VAN DOORME.

ABILENE, TEX.

I cannot resist writing to encourage the move to return our clocks back to normal. I am so thankful someone in Washington has realized the terrible disadvantages of this thing, we cannot see that changing our time has helped the war effort in one single instance. Instead it has proved to be only an irritant.

The time has come when even cowhands quit work according to the clock. Many good daylight hours are wasted in these abnormal afternoons. The sun is high when they stop. It is the same thing when we try to harvest wheat.

We were told in the beginning that it was necessary to change clocks to conserve electric power in cities. Now, when we know factories are run 24 hours daily, swing shifts, and so forth, we wonder, where is the saving of electric power? Certainly not in our homes. We retire an hour early by the clock, but next morning, because it is still dark, we burn lights an hour. There is no difference.

But I am writing to present the difficulties of mothers and school children, particularly.

With two boys in grade schools, consider my plight. Especially the 9-year old son. He needs 10 hours sleep each night. So every night it is a struggle with frayed tempers resulting, to make him come in from play, with lots of pleasant daylight playtime left, and command him to go to bed. Next morning, he has to be awakened while it is still dark to reach school on time. For the 3 winter months, what's worse, he has to go to school in the dark.

We Texans like to think we are as patriotic as the next ones. If we could see that all this worry and trouble were actually helping the war effort we would never complain. But for 2 years of it now, we fail to see any good at all. May the bill be successful and soon.

"Thanks for listening"—

MRS. H.

PERU, ILL.

About daybreak usually occurs the minimum temperature during the 24 hours; therefore, we may deduce that Nature herself attaches significance to that time of day.

Consider (December, 1942–January, 1943) clocks reading 8:18 a. m. at the hour of sunrise. This necessitates consuming electricity or using other means of artificial lighting.

The writer finds himself at a loss to understand why avoidably consuming electricity for this purpose, can effect a saving for war effort; or any other use.

The sun does not shine through (December, 1942) until nearly 9:00 a. m. Clocks indicate noon hour only a few hours after actual daybreak.

Changing the setting of clocks will not disrupt Nature nor cause her to change the cycle of daylight and darkness.

At any rate, this winter is proving unsuitable for this situation that has been arbitrarily created necessitating having artificial light. And which latter could otherwise have been avoided.

LISZT LENZEN.

DES MOINES, IOWA.

In these trying times, why must we have unnecessary hardships heaped upon us? Setting the clocks ahead is an unnecessary hardship and a detriment to us at all seasons of the year.

If setting the clocks ahead in any small way helped the war effort, everyone would be resigned to the change, but it does not help the war effort. All war plants work the clock around, three 8-hour shifts.

I have talked with dozens of women about their gas and electric bills and all agree that never in the history of their housekeeping have the gas and electric bills been so high.

We are burning lights hours longer each month than is necessary on account of setting the clocks ahead, and it is a deplorable condition to have our children going out into the darkness to school all fall and winter.

In the summer the nights are hot and it does not cool off much before midnight. The early morning is cool enough so one can sleep but, if we are forced to retire before it has cooled off, and forced to get up while we could sleep, think how little real sleep and rest we have had to start the grind of a hard day's work.

I want you to know how very much I, and my family, and my neighbors, and friends appreciate the effort to restore standard time. We thank you from the depths of our hearts.

MRS. JOHN L. MORTON.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.

Glad to note in our papers for the 27th the introduction of a bill for return to standard time.

Believe this would be generally helpful to industry and to the country at large.

ISLAND CREEK COAL CO.,
JAMES D. FRANCIS,
President.

SHENANDOAH, IOWA.

I'm sure if I had the time to visit my Iowa farm friends I would get 100 percent vote for your measure. I have never heard anyone claim any advantages in favor of war time.

MRS. A. L. RODGERS.

COATS, KANS.

I am a wheat and stock raiser. Have six tractors and understand the help problem. In the busy farming season we try to use all our daylight but what a curse it is for our boys to switch the tractors off when the sun is high, the moisture rapidly leaving your soil and telling you to please remember the shows and other attractions all start on war time. In harvest the dews keep our combines out of field in morning and with war time our help just won't stay with us late in evenings because it makes too long a run. In the schools in winter our kiddies go to school before daylight, study in their classrooms by artificial light, using our electricity, then in order for our children to get their needed rest we must send them to bed in daylight, but neither we, Congress, nor Roosevelt can make them go to sleep.

Restore the Nation to standard time.

BEN SCHREPEL.

DAYTON, OHIO.

This business of changing the time is a pain in the neck and not only that but in the summer when a hard-working man is able to get a little sleep in the morning when it's cool up comes this ridiculous business of changing the time so that when it's hot in the evening the workingman must go to bed in order to get sleep; next morning finds himself tossing all night because of the heat.

Being a workingman in a factory, I am asking you to see that bill No. 4489 be passed.

M. VIDA.

ELLINWOOL, KANS.

Time of day is by the sun and you cannot do any thing to change the sun and I don't think anything should be done to change the time, and I hope it will be changed back. I have talked to dozens and none like it.

I have three sons in the service. All in the Navy, and I sure want this war to get over. I just feel that changing back to God's time will help.

MRS. GEORGE CECIL.

PIGGOTT, ARK.

We farmers of this community will surely welcome the day when Congress sees fit to turn back the clock to where it belongs—with the sun. It does work a hardship on farmers who are trying to help feed the Nation.

MATTIE KERSHAW.

GALVESTON, TEX.

We hail with delight and approval the bill to set the Nation's clock back 1 hour and once more recognize the fact that it is the sun and not the law that fixes the time.

The effort to adopt the so-called wartime to our private lives and business has produced only confusion and inconvenience.

Our schools had to change the hour of opening during the winter because it was not yet good daylight when the children reported at schools. Our merchants changed the hour of store openings.

While the inconvenience and confusion due to the change has been great, there has been positively no real benefit. It was in line with changing Thanksgiving Day.

E. R. CHEESBOROUGH.

DAYTON, OHIO.

The result of this change of time as experienced last year is very confusing.

I am in sympathy with the bill calling for establishment of standard time throughout the Nation. I have written our Representative urging him to use his influence so that the bill will be passed.

CHESTER STIDHAM.

PLATTSBURG, MO.

I am certainly glad that some person in Congress at last appreciates the need for a return to standard time. The present arrangement works a hardship on the farmer, lessens production, increases the use of electricity, and makes it difficult for children to catch a school bus at 6:30 a. m.

Don't give up; we are for you.

R. A. SHOEMAKER,
County Chairman, Clinton
County Finance Committee.

PADUCAH, KY.

This daylight saving time is such a nuisance half of the people have never pushed their clocks forward. Farmers can work only by sun time.

The Catholic school here which has a large attendance goes by the old time. Their studies begin at 9:30 new time. So please do everything you can so our light bills will be less.

Mrs. J. B. SMITH.

FAIRFIELD, OHIO.

According to a 3 to 2 vote of the commissioners of Dayton, Ohio, the time will be advanced 1 hour April 30, 1944, and turned back October 1, 1944. The result is very confusing.

You recently introduced bill No. 4489 in the Federal House of Representatives calling for establishment of standard time throughout the Nation.

I believe we should all be on standard time and I have written our Congressman to do what he can to see that the bill will be passed.

DUFF G. ROMSPERT.

MIDDLEBROOK, VA.

Nearly everyone in this section has expressed dissatisfaction with this war time, and wondered how to best start a move to have the clocks set right.

If there is anything we can do, please let us know how we can help.

MRS. L. A. TYLER.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.

Please do all you can to get all the States back on eastern standard time.

A. D. W.

AUGUSTA, KANS.

Put the clocks back where they should be. Congratulations, thanks, and the best of luck. I'm glad someone is making a fight on this sort of foolishness. The Nation has never gained 5 cents from it.

EARL W. WOLF.

EMPORIA, KANS.

Congratulations on the bill to eliminate war time. This should not have been passed in the first place. Return to eastern standard.

LEONARD G. FORT.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Set the clocks back to standard time. If you succeed in getting it through, you will have earned the eternal gratitude of the people of the Nation.

It is not only a menace to farmers and country people but to city dwellers as well. All this winter children were starting for school long before daylight. There is no light saved by this practice. What little is saved in the evening is used up in the morning.

If some like to get up early so as to have time off in the afternoon, their work schedule should be advanced so as to suit them; but they should not expect the whole Nation to be inconvenienced because they so desire. The powers that be who make these changes do not have to leave their beds until the sun is well up; but they seem to care nothing for the annoyance and trouble they cause others. For a long time I have hoped that someone would bring this matter to the attention of Congress.

KATHERINE R. AMES.

CARROLL, IOWA.

The bill to change the clocks back is in full accord with the wishes and desires of all midwestern people. Eliminate daylight saving and restore the entire country to standard time.

A. J. HODGES.

STACYVILLE, IOWA.

Set the clocks back. It is a handicap for farmers.

With the help as short as it is, we lose one hour on quite a few days in the year. We all stand back of the bill to get our standard time again. With the manpower shortage, we need all the sun hours we can get.

BERNARD J. MAY.

EOLIA, MO.

I notice from my paper that you have proposed a bill in the Congress of the United States. We are very much pleased that there is someone in Washington who is interested in setting the clock back. That has always been an inconvenience to us farmers of this country, and if it doesn't interfere with the war effort we can assure you that we are in accord with you in regard to this bill. So I hope you will be successful in passing it.

With best wishes for you and your family.

Yours very truly,

ROBT. L. BERRY.

WELLSVILLE, MO.

Of all the wartime controls, this so-called daylight saving has been the most senseless and disastrous. The average person has never seen where it helps to win the war.

ROGER Q. SHAW.

DAYTON, OHIO.

We favor the bill to put the country back on standard time.

L. G. SCHNEBLE.

CHICAGO, ILL.

The daylight saving law is really nonsensical. It saves nothing. It affects the health of the people. Changes habits of going to sleep and to work. We are 1,000 percent for standard time.

A. C.

DAYTON, OHIO.

I cannot for the world understand how we can save electricity by changing the time to an hour ahead. Taking, for instance, a worker leaving for work at 6 in the morning must at least get up at 5 or 5:30? Where is he saving electricity; it is still dark. If there are four or five people in the household going to work at that time, there will, at least, be four to six different rooms lighted, including the kitchen.

I cannot agree with the people who play golf, etc.; there is a war on and who should be given the right to have some rest in the summer morning when it isn't too hot to sleep. Let the golfers, etc., sacrifice their recreation. We workers are not having much and we're not squaking, therefore I am asking you to see that the Cannon bill No. 4489 is passed.

MRS. M. VIDA.

RICHMOND, VA.

The so-called daylight saving law was enacted for the intent and purpose of using less artificial light, thereby saving electric current. Having kept tab on this during the First World War. I found there was a definite loss instead of a saving for 7 months, and during the other 5 months, there was neither gain nor loss. Of course, we only had it in effect then from the first Sunday in March until the last Sunday in October, and all of us were glad when it was over. Our present law being a year-round proposition, the loss is greater and the aggravation worse.

No businessman can roll out of bed and take a seat at his desk in his office; no workingman can roll out of bed and take his place at his bench or lathe in the factory. Someone must be up an hour ahead of him to prepare his breakfast and his lunch to take with him, but more than this of the attending disadvantages, I found during the long days in the middle of the period, there was a long afternoon of idleness, which filled the highways with joy riders and dissipaters, and filled the alleys with crapshooters, idlers, loafers and troublemakers. The records show that the above condition during that period resulted in a substantial increase in accidents and crime. I find the fewest number of people wanted this condition thrust upon us, and nearly the whole population is looking eagerly forward to its discontinuance.

We do not want any amendments. We want a repeal; we want a national observance of standard time.

A RICHMOND BUSINESSMAN.

KLAMATH FALLS, OREG., March 29, 1944.

Representative CANNON,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: I was so happy to see that Congress is considering abolishing that—most of all, diabolical laws, known as daylight saving. It has worked a hardship on both old and young, and has done no good anywhere. In the North and West it is very cold to get up an hour earlier, and sit around waiting for it to get light enough to see how to work. In the South, the dew is so heavy, they cannot even pick cotton, till the sun comes out. I have been a southern Democrat for 60 years. But too many unnecessary things have been meddled with. Set our clocks back so we will not have to prepare dinner in the middle of the afternoon, the hottest time of the day.

MRS. FRANCES MACKEY.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.

Change the time back to its original setting.

This change in time has cost most building contractors money on all their work. The standard time of work is from 8 a. m. to 4:30 p. m., and with the change of time it is generally too dark in the winter to start work at that time in the morning unless you have facilities for lighting. Therefore, it is necessary to start between 8:30 and 9 a. m. If you set your time at 9 a. m. and the quitting time is 4:30 p. m., this requires the workmen to work till 5:30 to make the 8-hour day.

Further, it is a cost to communities, for schools and people. They have to light and heat buildings earlier when the weather is colder in the mornings and carry on to later in the evening when most personnel works a little later. Families have to heat and light their homes longer hours and use more fuel.

With some States on regular time and others with advanced time it is confusing to everyone. I have never seen any good come of it since it has been in effect.

W. A. ABBITT.

WILLARD, MO.

Of all the silly things that I ever heard of, I believe daylight saving is the worst. We dairy farmers were asked to save on electricity, yet when they moved the clock up an hour we were forced to burn from 1 to 3 more hours of electricity.

If I had the gas to get around, I could get several hundred farmers that would sign the petition to turn back the clock, so do the farmers a favor by getting the job done.

H. E. BRAY.

DAYTON, OHIO.

Speed the day when House bill No. 4489, calling for the establishment of standard time throughout the Nation can be brought to a favorable vote. War time has been a sad mistake. No one has ever been able to show enough saving to make up for the inconvenience and the confusion it has caused farmers and war workers.

CARLOS D. CARNEY.

HILLSBORO, OHIO.

Let us have standard time for Nation.

Let's go back to the old time.

HENRY B. WILLIAMS.

SOUTH BEND, IND.

Please add my protest against this fast time. It brings undue pressure and a nervous tension which is undesirable in wartime or any other time.

MRS. LOREN SCHAFER.

SHELBYVILLE, IND.

I am very much in favor of your measure going back to regular time. The law is a great hindrance to the farmer and the man who labors from daylight until dark.

SYLVESTER TOWNS.

SANTA FE, MO.

Turn the Nation's clocks from daylight saving time back to God's time. Of all the rations and war worries we've had there is none that compares with this daylight savings time. It has cost us a greater fuel bill; also kerosene bill for our lighting. And above all has been nerve wracking. I sincerely hope the time will be set back.

MRS. EUGENE SHARP.

DAYTON, OHIO.

The bill calling for standard time throughout the Nation is 100 percent correct and should be passed as quickly as possible.

D. D. CERRETA.

SOUTH CHARLESTON, W. VA.

Daylight-saving time has disrupted practical working hours for the entire country. It has not saved or gained anything. Many plant workers ive many miles from their places of employment and therefore must leave their homes at an unreasonably early hour to get to work.

The darker hours are simply moved from the evening to the morning, so there can be no saving of electric power. Most plants are operating on a 24-hour basis anyway. Those who promulgated this change in an age-old custom perhaps go to work at a late hour while most wage earners go to work at 7 or 8 a. m.

J. W. KEADLE.

GURDON, ARK.

Restore standard time. We have been handicapped too long with this senseless war time. Am truly glad others have the grit and good sense to try to have standard time restored.

S. E. SIMONSON.

DAYTON, OHIO.

Discontinue war time. I can understand how the bureaucrats need some impetus to get them to work an hour earlier, but we don't need it out here. War time has only meant confusion and unnecessary hardship.

S. H. ANKENEY.

ARDMORE, OKLA.

I have heard more complaint on the daylight-saving time than any other one thing connected with the war. These complaints come from every place. People who work in rural districts, especially, claim that any entertainment in the towns under daylight-saving time forces their hired help and themselves to quit work so early that it is almost impossible to get in a day's work. Especially is this true when there is a heavy dew.

Please do all you possibly can to get this bill through and have at least that much of our life normal.

J. L. MURPHEY.

CULLISON, KANS.

Change the time back to where it should be. I haven't words in my vocabulary to say what I think of this war time, and if I did I would ruin the English language.

WARREN E. MILLS.

BALTIMORE, MD.

Our whole organization, as well as our friends, would like to have standard time back again.

ROBERT C. SHADDICK.

BALTIMORE, MD.

Certainly hope we can get standard time back again as we would like to have an extra hour in which to rest.

Z. WHITEFORD.

DEERFIELD, MICH.

Set the clocks back. In the spring when a farmer is putting his crops in, the ground is frozen till about 9 o'clock; then when you harvest you can't combine till about 10 o'clock. Then everybody is ready to stop work in the middle of the afternoon.

FRED MCMAHON.

DAYTON, OHIO.

Abolish this nonsensical, idiotic, and utterly useless war time forced upon us 2 years ago by somebody who doesn't have to go outside their door for one earthly thing, who have lovely electric lights inside and out at all and any hour.

We farmers have to till our land by God-given daylight that comes and goes at the same time it has for ages, regardless of how you twirl the hands of the clock.

It is my fervent prayer and hope that the bill will be approved.

MRS. CLARA JAMES EBY.

HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Representative CANNON of Missouri,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am glad to see that Congress is considering a bill to relieve the country of one of the worst curses that has been forced upon us during this crisis, the so-called daylight saving time. The public did not want this in the beginning and have never been satisfied with it, but have been forced to abide by it, though it has never been of advantage to the country or any class of business. You can see all types of industry going to work in the morning under a flood of electric lights, in order to finish their day's work little past the middle afternoon.

W. A. DAVIS.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

Please get the daylight saving time changed back to the old schedule. While I am a city dweller, I find it a great disadvantage to me and my business.

LOUIE REESE.

ST. PAUL, MINN.

Aside from the fact that advancing the clock has increased the use of electricity by at least 10 percent it has deprived hard-working war workers of hours of much needed rest thereby contributing to absenteeism. It depletes the strength of the women causing many of them to withdraw from war work. I do not know of a single woman who does not find it necessary to work at home as long as there is daylight. No wonder the women are breaking down under the strain.

GLADYS STREENZ, War Worker.

BOYDTON, VA., March 30, 1944.

Representative CANNON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Rid the country of the so-called daylight saving time. It has always been an absurd thing. It interferes with our whole economic system.

Let us get away from the fallacy of daylight saving. There is no truth in it—never has been and never will be.

J. H. BAPTIST.

PADUCAH, KY.

How happy you would make us people here if we could get Congress to set the time back.

In the winter we get up in the middle of the night, and in summer go to bed with the sun shining. We have to burn lights half of the morning. The farmers don't like it either. Cattle go by the sun and they can't change them. I am just one in this town who is dissatisfied.

MRS. NEVA LEIBEL.

FORT WORTH, TEX.

Please eliminate daylight saving time and restore the country to standard time.

TOM CHAPMAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

If you can get Congress to see the folly of this daylight saving nonsense it should call for a medal of highest honor. I am confident our Senator TYDINGS will back you up on that. He's level headed.

PERRY F. SKINNER.

ST. PAUL, MINN.

Please, I beg of you to make the Congressmen understand that we are not saving any electric power by the clock being 1 hour fast here in Minnesota. My light bill is twice as high; it's a very expensive act for the laboring class. So please give us back our standard time.

MRS. WM. ROCK.

PLATTSMOUTH, NEBR.

I read in the Omaha World Herald, and also heard on the radio, that a bill has been introduced to abolish daylight-saving time. I wrote to a State representative a year ago and he said that law was useless, but was made in Washington and would have to be changed there. I don't know why they keep it up, for the help don't like it either.

MRS. JOHN MCLELLAN.

BAY CITY, MICH.

Of all the foolish ideas, changing the time of day is one.

Here it has caused many a hardship on people, young and old. It was perfectly terrible. It did not save any time or electricity either, as the lights were burned in the morning way up until 10 and 11 o'clock in lots of offices and factories, so instead of making things better it made them much worse.

MRS. GEORGE DAVIS.

PANA, ILL.

Daylight-saving time is so uncalled for. Our children had to go to school in the dark, and these old men that work at the mine had to go to work in the dark, and our greenhouse workers couldn't go to work till 8 o'clock because they have no lights. If a petition will do any good we will send one. The whole town is for the old time. We are so glad somebody has taken it up.

MRS. C. A. WRIGHT.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.

By all means turn back the clocks to standard time. The world has been all wrong since we had daylight saving.

D. C. W. V.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

The undersigned, all residents and qualified voters in the Birmingham area, use this method to convey to you that we are desirous of a bill being passed by Congress that would return the country to standard time.

(Many signatures.)

MECHANICSVILLE, MD.

The quicker daylight saving is abolished, the better. The time we have now does not accomplish anything but confusion and annoyance.

BENJAMIN C. WOOD.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

Putting the clock back to normal would certainly be a godsend to people in Missouri where it is so hot in the summer.

MRS. CORA J. HELTZELL.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

Three cheers for the bill to set the time back to standard, as it makes it very bad having to go to work in the wee hours of the morning. One of the girls was knocked unconscious and her purse taken away from her coming to work. If this bill passes, there will be many grateful women.

VIRGINIA MARSHALL.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

Repeal the Daylight-Savings Time Act. Since its enactment I have talked with people in all walks of life and all agree it has not benefited them. My friends who operate a farm in Illinois have also expressed their disapproval of it.

Today the St. Louis Globe-Democrat in an editorial said it was a good move and that it was nonsense to pass it in the first place.

JOHN J. JARVIS.

CLIFTON SPRINGS, N. Y.

Restore the clocks to standard time. That would be one of the best things that could be done. People will tell you their electric bill is higher than ever before. And there are so many accidents with people going to work before daylight.

P. LINEHAN.

MORRISON, ILL.

Abolish daylight saving. I trust the bill will receive favorable consideration. Thanks and God bless you.

ALBERT O. OLSON,
An old ex-marine.

TEXARKANA, ARK.

Am glad to know this crazy time we have had for the last year or so bothers other people beside hundreds of people down here. Please help us out.

D. G. BURCH.

DALLAS, TEX.

This is to voice hearty approval of the steps being taken to have the time set back to normal.

Considering the adjustments we are constantly called upon to make at a critical time like this that are vital such an absolutely worthless change has been the height of folly.

CAROL COX.

MEXICO, MO.

Work is done all around the clock in essential industries, so why tamper with time? The sun pays no heed. And we must work by the sun.

Here's hoping everyone will vote to turn back the clocks and get along with the war.

MRS. Z. E. TATON.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

By all means end this fool daylight-saving time.

C. E. BROWN.

LOUISIANA, MO.

In order that we may get the work done on the farms, and produce the crops essential to winning the war and to relieve the shortage of farm labor, get central time restored and our clock set back 1 hour to the old time.

P. E. RICHARD.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Give us back our real time once more. We believe in running America the American way and not the way of England. Those responsible for this should hear the complaints from these people. Let's have standard time.

A. B. WILLIS.

BALTIMORE, MD.

Keep the good work up. Rule out this daylight law.

JOE CARTER.

HERMANN, MO.

Set the Nation's clocks back to God's sun time. It cannot be estimated in dollars how much it will help to produce and save crops. The same is true in town. It is waste instead of saving. From October to February the homes burn 1½ hours electricity to get breakfast and be ready at 7 for shoe-factory advanced time when it really is only 6 and the factory burns another hour of electricity.

If we have to face another manpower shortage on the American farms this year, it will be an immeasurable salvation of time if the clocks are put back to sun time.

G. GUMPER.

DAYTON, OHIO.

There are thousands of war workers here in Dayton, including factories and the two airfields, and we certainly want the slow time, our usual time, instead of the fast time which makes us get up in the dark and go to work in the dark, go to bed in the summer in the heat of the evening, and burn more electricity all the time.

CHAS. C. GRAY.

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

Abolish war time and restore standard time. It is important.

As a letter carrier in the post office in New York, war time presents a number of problems during the winter months. In New York we commence work at 6 a. m., and in the residential areas we letter carriers leave for the first delivery at 7:15 a. m., a time when the streets are totally dark. Because mail boxes in apartment buildings are in many instances located near the street, it is difficult to see these mail boxes in the darkness in order to effect delivery of mail.

Keep up the good work to the end that war time shall be abolished and eastern time restored. As previously, each State will decide for itself as to how many months of daylight time it desires.

LEON SAMIS.

COLUMBUS, OHIO.

I do not know when I have read anything that pleased me so much as the bill to set our clocks back.

I understand the clocks were advanced 1 hour to save electricity. I want to tell you how it worked in my home this past winter. As you know, Ohio went back to central time. My daughter would sit up from 1 to 2 hours after I retired, studying her school work, then I got up 1 hour and 30 minutes before she did in order for me to get to work at 8 a. m. on the railroad (fast time), while she went to school (slow time).

This ran my electric bill up about 65 to 70 kilowatt-hours a month. To save electricity, restore the clocks to normalcy.

I pray that the bill will go through.

L. B. CAILEY.

RICHMOND, VA.

I was gratified and pleased to read in the morning paper of a bill to eliminate daylight saving time and restore the country to standard time. For the South, particularly, the daylight-saving time has been a menace to health for children as well as grown-ups—the bedrooms not cooling off until after midnight. Then in winter it is so dark at 8 a. m. (really 7 a. m.) that women are afraid to go to work. It certainly does not save electricity as lights have to be turned on to get breakfast.

MARIANNE E. MEADE.

HILLVIEW, ILL.

School children, farmers, everybody tired daylight-wasting time.

HARRY C. DUFF.

SCHENEVUS, N. Y.

Every farmer and American backs the bill to discontinue war time. The sooner the better.

JOHN WILSON.

JACKSON, MICH.

The most sensible thing I have heard of in a long time was the badly needed bill to put the country back on standard time. I have heard more people complaining about going back to wartime than I have about the war. The fast time has never really helped anybody except the soft-ball players and golfers. I think if we were on standard time we wouldn't have so many young children out on the streets at 11 or 12 o'clock or later, because if it got dark earlier the children would get sleepy sooner and go to bed at 8 or 9 o'clock,—when they should—instead of staying out till all hours of the night. Please put this bill through.

MARION D. MCCLURE.

RAHWAY, N. J.

Please add our names to those protesting daylight saving time. It has been a real hardship. It has been the cause of waste of fuel and electricity during the fall, winter, and spring months. Please end this unnecessary inconvenience.

(Mrs.) MARY M. BROPHY.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

I have just read an article in our local paper on a bill to put the Nation back on standard time. Regardless of the importance of the many war measures before Congress, this is one of the most sensible things I have heard yet. In all my years I cannot recall any measures passed by our Congress that have upset the American apple cart so much as this thing called saving time, daylight.

EDWIN J. DREISBACH.

BLOOMFIELD HILLS, MICH.

I hope you will press this bill with all your might.

In the Detroit area we were told that eastern war time would be a valuable contribution to the war effort, in that it would cut down on the use of electric power. What a fallacy. In our household we arise at 6 a. m. and in winter our lights have to be on until at least 9 o'clock.

Our electric bills for power have been double that of previous years. I checked with the Edison Co. on this.

In war plants the lights are left on all day, regardless of the time, so there is no saving of power there.

On the side of health, the condition is not normal. In summer, to be sure, we do have daylight until about 9 o'clock, but after men and women have put in 8 hours of hard work in a war plant, they are not physically fit to use the hours in which they should be getting adequate rest in other pursuits. You know, and medical men know, that a working man or woman cannot do good work without sufficient rest. The additional daylight offers a great temptation to many to added strain upon their physical strength, with the result that they get but 5 or 6 hours' sleep. The result is a lagging of production, and a much greater incidence toward accidents. I think if a check could be made on this in war plants it would give you a powerful argument for the return to normal time. From my own standpoint I find no argument, whatever, either from a saving standpoint on power or health.

(Mrs.) MARTIN WENDELL.

AURORA, ILL.,

Am so glad to learn of this advanced time repeal.

Am a teacher, and all winter we had to burn electricity from 7:30 to 9 a. m. in our high school. People who come to our high school from the country and smaller suburbs are just full of grief about the hardships this advanced time causes. Dairy farmers cannot get men to do their work because of the early milking time when the milk must be cooled before it can be set out for collection at 6 a. m. The milker really has to milk about 3 to 4 a. m. and the cows do not respond. Do push the bill hard so we will again be able to operate on time suitable to man and animals.

Schools will do much better on standard time. Children do not go to bed in daylight, and are out just that much sleep and are drowsy next morning in classes.

(Miss) CLARA BOHNSTENGEL.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

Bill to return to standard time a good one. Sure hope Congress puts it over. We have had enough foolishness for awhile.

J. S. ROBERTSON.

KEWANEE, ILL.

I am very much interested in the movement to return to standard time and hope that you will be successful.

The present arrangement has no advantage over standard time in our effort to produce more manufactured goods or farm crops. Farmers are compelled to conform to it by circumstances over which they have no control.

Manufacturers gain nothing, in fact they lose by the daylight saving, or I should say daylight slaving, because most factories have men who are over 40 years of age and to deprive these older men of that extra hour of rest in the morning is a terrible strain on their tired bodies. Younger people can stand the strain for awhile but the older men and women cannot.

For people who can stay in bed as long as they care to it doesn't make any difference what time is used.

Victory gardeners will be able to accomplish more in their gardens because they will not be so tired. We raised good gardens before we had daylight slaving.

Like the Jap general who said that his men knew how to sleep, what he wanted was to teach them to stay awake. That is what our Government is trying to do to us.

ROY L. WOOLHEATHER.

DANVILLE, VA.

Was so pleased to see from the paper yesterday that Congress is considering a bill to do away with daylight saving time. It is such a foolish measure. As much light is used in the dark mornings as would be saved at night. If the administration would use more time for constructive things and less in upsetting old established customs, they might be more pleasing to the voters.

MRS. J. E. PERKINSON.

BENNETTSVILLE, S. C.

The bill to go back to standard time is highly approved by us.

"Fast" time never has suited this area. We waste more electricity than we save.

H. D. HARRALL.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

It's good to know that somebody has courage enough to try to give back the old time.

We hope the next Congress will not try to change everything, including the sun.

D. D. METCALF.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.

There are 6,500,000 Texans besides myself who approve the bill to do away with this ungodly daylight savings and hope it will go through at the earliest possible moment.

Of all the damnable, inconvenient, idiotic legislation that was ever foisted upon a suffering humanity this is about the worst that ever happened. The instigators of this inane and childlike legislation ought to be boiled in oil. Instead of saving anything it has doubled our light and heat bills and caused an untold amount of profanity.

W. B. WILSON.

PROSPECT, N. Y.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN, SENATORS, PRESIDENT, TOO: Give ear to a pitiful rhyme. And pity the farmers that fell in the soup when the Government doctored the time. I'm a man of few phrases, me learnin' is scant, and I'm longin' to make meself clear. It's bad in the summer, it's worse in the spring, and it's fierce in the fall o' the year. In balmy Sptember I rise from me bed and I dress be the light o' the stars. And I finish me dreams as I wait for the cows, with me head hangin' over the bars. The cock on the roost sees me lantern go by and he thinks it the morning's first gleams. But e'er he's done crowin' he's left in the dark, and the chickens all laugh in their dreams. Me pigs are reposin' on pillies of mud and me horses are sprawled in the stall. And I question the wisdom that sent me abroad an hour too soon in the fall. I'd willingly go to me bed with the birds and be up with the song o' the lark, but curs'd be the notion of savin' the day by blundrin' about in the dark. I hope when the guilty one knocks at the gate, for Peter to open the lock, he'll say. Step aside, you've an hour to wait. You're the buckoo that twisted the clock.

J. WARD WILLIAMS.

HAWK POINT, MO.

Every citizen in this community is opposed to daylight saving time. It is a nuisance. It is wasting time.

County school children have been forced to stand in darkness, shivering in the cold morning hours, waiting for a bus. Day workers are forced to do the chores around home in darkness before going to work. Farmers find it inconvenient from every standpoint.

A. K. Schaper, cashier, Peoples Bank of Hawk Point; Otho Barley, Joe Tomek, W. H. Dunard, Ed Kliene, Oscar Beck, Charles J. Brozi, Sr., C. H. Prior, R. G. Logan, directors.

Mr. Speaker, the outstanding feature of these letters is their spontaneity. It is not unusual to receive half a bushel of letters or telegrams in one morning when legislation sponsored by some pressure group is under consideration in the Congress. But there is no group, no organization back of these letters. They are from the heart. The writers saw an obscure item in the newspapers telling of the unheralded introduction of a bill to repeal a useless, obstructive, and obnoxious law, and out of a deep conviction on the subject sat down and wrote these letters. They express the overwhelming sentiment of the Nation at large. If there are communities which prefer artificial time, let them adopt it locally. Surely no such community will insist on the inconvenience and loss and suffering this law entails on the entire country merely to serve personal and provincial needs.

Poland's Post-War Status

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, on the evening of April 2 I made an address in the city of Detroit dealing with Poland's post-war status, using Poland as a symbol for the problems presented by all the smaller European countries. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I have flown here from Washington tonight, my fellow citizens of Michigan, to do three things: (1) To pay my tribute of personal respect to an old and deeply cherished friend; (2) to join in the birthday celebration of a great daily newspaper which is an everlasting credit to itself and to its Polish-American constituency; (3), and chiefly, to tell my Polish-American friends that as their representative in the United States Senate, and as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I shall contribute every effort within my power to put America's voice and America's influence and America's effort behind the unimpaired rebirth of the great and heroic Polish Republic.

I think I know whereof I speak when I assert that while this noble aspiration particularly grips the anxious hearts of those of you who look back with abiding love to the stricken land of your brave fathers, it no less grips the hearts of all Americans who want this war to justify itself in the fruits of its ultimate and inevitable victory. Poland is the symbol of a cause which is greater even than she is herself. We desert the cause if we desert the symbol.

* * * * *

The fact that this is the fortieth anniversary of the Polish Daily News—and that Poland once more suffers from tragedy and disaster—presents me with the theme which I wish briefly to pursue. And so, my fellow citizens, I discuss the war in which we are engaged and the peace aims for which we give our blood and sweat and tears.

In the final analysis, we are Americans, all; and, regardless of original nativity, we wage this war to conclusive victory primarily and dominantly in behalf of the freedom and the welfare and security of our own United States. Without regard to race, birth, color, or creed, we salute the Stars and Stripes; and we respond to no other allegiance.

But we would be lacking in enlightened self-interest if we did not recognize the fact that, for the sake of America as well as for the sake of humanity, we also fight for a better and a safer and a happier world, and for organized international justice and fair play and security for big and little nations. We fight to unchain liberty in a free world from which international pirates shall be permanently barred by the organized conscience and the united vigilance of freemen. And, Mr. Chairman, I know of no better typical test to apply to the progress which we make toward this emancipation than to apply the test to Poland. This World War No. 2 started on Polish soil in defiance of cruel aggression against outraged Polish independence. It cannot end in equity or honor except as independent Poland once more takes her exalted place among the free and sovereign nations of this chastened world. If hope for Poland ever dies, hope for all continental democracy will lie in the same grave.

I want to be as realistic as possible in my discussion of this scheme tonight. I want to be as frank as the necessary restrictions and the inevitable uncertainties of war will presently permit. If we have erred at all along this line in recent months, I fear we have erred on the side of too much strategic silence in the face of danger signals on these new horizons of our destiny.

First let me say that I agree emphatically with American statesmen in high places who appropriately counsel us that we must not jeopardize the winning of the war by splitting apart the essential fighting unity of the United Nations through prematurely quarreling among ourselves over the nature and the definition of the peace to come. I agree that we must be patient and tolerant with one another, that we must ever subordinate the lesser to the greater current needs, and that we serve no useful end by dangerously disagreeing among ourselves over such things, for example, as future national boundaries before we have won the united victory which alone can give us the right to control the answers to such questions. The first and paramount necessity is to win this military war with maximum speed and minimum casualty. Dominating every other impulse, we want victory—and then we want our soldier-sons back home.

On the other hand, we cannot too often remind ourselves—and our allies—of the solemn promises which we have exchanged with each other, of the ideals and objectives which we have mutually sworn to defend—all for one and one for all—and of the obligation which our statesmanship owes to these soldier-sons to match their courage with our own in clinging relentlessly to the winning of a just and lasting peace. We cannot too often search our souls to find if we are keeping faith, or whether we are drifting, or whether we are compromising with expedient appeasement. At least, we of America certainly have the right to discuss events as frankly as do our major allies. We do not have to be the only silent partners in this enterprise.

And so, upon this occasion, I speak of Poland, typifying other conquered lands; and necessarily I speak of Russia. I would not withhold from Russia any measure of exalted credit for the magnificent and invincible battle, at awful cost and against awful odds, which she wages against our common foe. On the contrary, I proclaim the tremendous fact. I would not withhold full and free and grateful acknowledgment of the cumulative debt which all the United Nations, ourselves included, owe to the Soviet Socialist Republics for the indispensable and intrepid heroism with which they have hurled back the Hitler Huns and brought the hour of our common victory infinitely nearer. I would not withhold the expression of our prayerful hopes that, despite the basic difference in our ideologies, these bonds of war shall be cemented in the subsequent bonds of a friendly and cooperative peace.

But neither, Mr. Chairman, would I withhold the equally candid disclosure of our anxieties that we may be drifting toward misunderstanding and bitter disillusionment—which cannot possibly be good for either one of us or any of our allies—unless we speedily restore a better understanding of what we thought we meant when, at the altar of our common sacrifice, we swore to each other to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them.

I have said that Russia fights magnificently. So do others in full and equal measure. So does intrepid Britain and her indomitable commonwealth. So does China, against incalculable odds. So does our America, with a prodigality and devotion unmatched in martial history. So do the nations that have felt the tyrant's heel. Poland, for example—Polish legions at the battle fronts, Polish aces in the air, Polish underground resistance in the stricken homeland, the most dangerous belligerence of all. It is a fraternity of combat. It must be followed by a fraternity of peace in which all shall share the decisions and the blessings for which they strive and die.

I do not mean that we should turn aside now from the war itself to attempt now to settle many definitive questions which must necessarily remain more or less fluid pending victory. But I do mean that we should never for an instant retreat from a firm restatement of our understanding of our mutual pledges; and we should never, by our silence, invite the presumption that we do not intend, at the right time and in the right place, to urge every reasonable and practical achievement of a peace that shall be permanent because it shall be just. Our real war aims should never become a mystery to us or to our allies.

This leads me to quote from an anxious appeal made to Soviet Russia 3 weeks ago by a group of unimpeachable American patriots, all of whom were vigorous pioneers in the cause of aid to Russia, and none of whom by any stretch of the imagination could be accused of domestic, partisan malice:

"The apparent determination of the Soviet Government to insist upon a unilateral settlement of the Polish problem, without mediation or consent either of Russia's allies or the Polish Government, has come as a shock to American opinion. * * * The American and British peoples cannot forget that Poland was the first nation to stop Hitler's procession of bloodless victories. The Poles determined to fight even though war meant the temporary conquest and enslavement of Poland because they believed that the justice of Poland's cause and the loyalty of her allies would insure her resurrection in the end. * * * They made this decision at a time when Russia thought it necessary to collaborate with Hitler; and yet Poland, after suffering untold agony, is now asked to surrender far more to Russia than she refused to give Hitler. * * * We appeal to our Russian allies to take cognizance of the legitimate disquiet of the American people. We ask this not only because it would strengthen our unity in the war and hasten the day of victory, but because it would cement the friendship between the Russian and American peoples in the crucial years to come."

Mr. Chairman, that is a friendly and temperate statement. Also, it is an understatement. It is devoid of threats—as it should be. But it is packed with wisdom and with truth. I fully understand that there must be many major readjustments in the peace to come, and that we cannot hope to anticipate the details of these readjustments. But we can hope to preserve the spirit of democracy and self-determination when these readjustments are made. And whether it be at Quebec, or Moscow, or Tehran, or whether it be in the Kremlin or in Downing Street, or in our White House, we can, if we will, keep this precious spirit alive.

I repeat that I am using Poland tonight as an example. Other conquered peoples invite a similar prayer in their behalf. I repeat, also because it cannot be repeated too often, that the security and welfare of our own United States is always and forever the first charge upon our hearts and hands. Whatever is necessary must be done. It is declared in Holy Writ, "He who provideth not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel." But we can be safe and happy only in a safer and a happier world. Whether we like it or not, we cannot live wholly unto ourselves alone. Whether we like it or not, we face external obligations. Whether we like it or not, we must exert our total influence in behalf of peace with justice.

And so I ask, What would peace with justice for Poland be?

Obviously I cannot expect to answer with intimate specifications. No one can today. We have not reached that point. For example, when new Poland shall again arise either as a separate unit or as a sovereign state in what might well became the United States of Europe, there is room for considerable, legitimate difference of opinion as to precisely where new Poland's boundaries should be drawn—although certainly they cannot honestly be drawn along the line of the criminal czarist partition of Poland more than 150 years ago, or the line of the no-less-criminal partition of Poland in 1939. As for the so-called Curzon line—it is merely the consultation of authentic history to remember that it was only an armistice line proposed originally by the Supreme Allied Council in 1919 and again when Britain intervened in the Russo-Polish war in 1920, and that it was declined by Russia. The question was settled by the peace of Riga in 1921, representing a reasonable compromise between extreme Soviet and Polish aspirations; and Russia subsequently pressed for treaties of nonaggression based on mutual respect for these existing borders. Let that paramount fact never be forgotten. Poland and Russia concluded such a treaty in 1932 and, at Soviet initiative, extended this pact for 10 years in 1934. Yes, and Poland loyally lived up to these obligations and rejected three offers from Hitler to cooperate on the basis of surrendering territory to Germany in the west at Russia's expense in the east. I simply recite unemotional facts—omitting many other bitter facts—which will deserve full credence when the time to mark new boundaries comes, if we are still wedded to a peace with justice.

As I have said before, I concur in our own State Department's plea that this is no time—until we have won the war—to start the reallocation of innumerable controversial boundary lines. But if it is no time for us to do so, then it is no time for others to do so either, and I know of no reason why our Government should not persistently and relentlessly say as much. It is a poor rule which does not restrain all the United Nations alike and in equal measure; or which, by the same token, does not permit as great a candor in Washington as is enjoyed by Moscow.

But I speak tonight upon a broader and more basic phase when I deal with the question, What would peace with justice for Poland be? Our State Department said, on July 23, 1940:

"The policy of this Government is universally known. The people of the United States are opposed to predatory activities no matter whether they are carried on by the use of force or by the threat of force. They are likewise opposed to any form of intervention on the part of one State, however powerful, in the domestic concerns of any other sovereign State, however weak."

That was sound and brave in 1940. It is sound and brave in 1944. It will be sound and brave and right when peace comes to this distraught earth. Let's say it again. Let's keep on saying it so that none may misunderstand our foreign policy. Admittedly we cannot always have our own way about these things because we are not the sole dictators of global destiny; and I do not believe we ever intend, upon our own responsibility, to police the whole, round earth to force our judgments upon others. But we can always assert our ideals and our purpose to cling to them as best we may. Therein lies peace with justice for Poland and for kindred victims of this Axis crime.

On August 14, 1941, we promulgated the so-called Atlantic Charter. There is plain language in its first three points to which the signatories unreservedly subscribed:

"1. Their countries seek no aggrandizement, territorial or otherwise.

"2. They desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned.

"3. They respect the rights of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see soverign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them."

Apply that rule to new Poland and new Poland will be content.

On September 24, 1941, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics endorsed these objectives, and on January 1, 1942, joined the other United Nations in dedication to "the common program of purposes and principles embodied in the Atlantic Charter." We signed, too. So did Poland. These "purposes and principles" mean much to Poland, or they mean nothing at all to anybody else. I'll agree that the cruel circumstances of war often alter the best intentioned plans. But they need not alter purposes and principles. Our purposes and principles are not supposed to be the object of unconditional surrender. Yet, if we are to accept, by our silence, some of the unilateral decisions which appear to have already been pronounced by one of our allies—without consultation and without the consent of other allies—we have already mortgaged this portion of our program, regardless of the ultimate triumph of our united arms.

I go on with the record. Now comes lend-lease. Why did we extend billions of dollars of critical and indispensable lend-lease aid to Russia? To help us win our war. For that purpose, I do not hesitate to say that it has been worth all it cost. But "our war" is something more than the military defeat of Hitler and Hirohito. That would be only temporary victory. No one need to grope in doubt upon this score. It is written in our lend-lease agreements. For example—and it is a very pertinent example—it is written in our standard master lend-lease agreement with Russia. It was signed on June 11, 1942. He who runs may read. We are extending "mutual aid in the prosecution of the war against aggression." We are laying the bases "of a just and enduring peace." We are mutually subscribing to the "common program of purposes and principles embodied in the Atlantic Charter." We are asserting that "the defense of U. S. S. R. against aggression is vital to the defense of the United States of America."

Fit those specifications to Poland, my fellow countrymen, and all will be well. No aggression. A just and enduring peace. Withhold them from Poland—and from other victimized nations in this tragic war—and we shall find that we have merely won another Versailles, then another Munich, and then World War No. 3.

The record is clear. The future is not. Our promises are clear. Our prospectus is not. Our American "foreign policy," as of today, is sound when it puts military victory in this war ahead of every other consideration. Beyond that point, our American "foreign policy," as of today, is a vague and often mystifying generality. Frankly, it is largely locked up in the White House—across from which Kosciuszko still dominates Lafayette Square. The poet righty said of him:

"Hope, for a season, bade the world farewell,
And Freedom shrieked, as Kosciuszko fell!"

Hope will similarly bid this world farewell if this war does not terminate in a just peace. I have touched but one of its pregnant factors here tonight. I repeat Poland is a symbol. I repeat that I would not disunite the war effort by premature efforts to organize the subsequent peace—particularly on the eve of what may well prove to be the most important military movement in the history of civilization. But I also emphatically repeat that I would never for an instant let the world forget what we think we are fighting for. I would never accept voluntary bankruptcy for our ideals. "No aggression. A just and enduring peace." Ah, yes; it is easier said than done. We cannot dictate the charter for the world's tomorrow. Our major allies have earned the right of consultation—and this obviously includes indomitable Moscow. But God knows that we have earned the right of consultation, too. So has suffering, sacrificial Poland. So have others who have flung their naked hearts and lives into this global defiance of a global plague. My prayer—my challenge—is that none shall be forgotten, exploited, or ignored when the great accounting comes.

"No aggression. A just and lasting peace."

Then free Poland in a free Europe—a symbol of the world's emancipation—shall rise again.

Freedom of Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHAN GURNEY

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on freedom of speech, delivered by me on the America's Town Meeting of the Air program, broadcast from Cincinnati on April 6, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Freedom of speech is guaranteed under our Constitution. Just how that can be adapted to radio is, as I see it, the question before us tonight.

There is not enough actual time on the radio for each and every one of our 130,000,000 people to state their ideas on every question over the radio, so let's be practical about it, and instead of talking about freedom of speech, let's talk about fairness—fairness by first, the actual operators of the radio stations of the country—fairness of the listening public—and fairness, yes, of the business world that uses radio as a medium of advertising.

It is my sincere judgment, first, that radio—with a very, very few exceptions—has handled their radio programs in a mighty fair, clean way. If they had not in, say, the 10-year period just past, they would not now be on the air, for our American people have a way of doing away with any concern that does not treat them fairly. They just do not patronize that concern and it goes out of business.

So, briefly, the complete answer is that radio as a whole has been fair or there would not now be radio, as we know it, in the good old United States of America.

I say definitely that the listening public will regulate radio in an American way. They will regulate it by the simple mechanical movement of turning off the dial if they don't like what is offered to them.

We must recognize that radio is different than the newspapers, in that the broadcaster—by the tone of his voice—by his inflection—can make an ordinary remark sound very beautiful—or can even leave the impression, just by the tone of his voice, that he is talking about a scoundrel.

Freedom of speech is fundamental—made a part of our Constitution—because of a profound belief that the collective mind of the whole people is greater than that of any individual. We Americans have a strong conviction of our ability to govern ourselves. Our problem is to apply this freedom of speech—or shall I say, fairness of speech, basic in our law—to the radio. And right there I might remark that we must not become disturbed because we see some rabble-rouser gain temporary influence by the use of this new medium of communication.

So, let's talk about fairness in presenting controversial public questions and the broadcasting of news.

The broadcasters themselves first enunciated the principle that controversial public issues must be handled fairly. They decided this because of their recognition of their own responsibility to the public, plus intelligent self-interest. Their own well being and continuance in business impels broadcasters to see to it that the principle of fairness is advantageously followed in actual practice, and in my opinion, this is just what has happened in all but a few isolated instances.

The second phase of freedom or fairness on the radio is the handling of news. The American public wants their news by radio so that they will be informed as to what is going on as speedily as possible. I say they should be allowed to form their own conclusions. Here again, by far the greatest number of radio stations and networks, are now presenting the news with fairness and accuracy—determined that the news shall not be selected for the purpose of establishing an editorial position.

I hesitate to see laws passed that would put restriction on, or limit the broadcasting industry, whether by law or by managerial edict. You must remember that regulation by law takes away from the industry the sense of responsibility, and leaves in the hands of a few, that power which if placed in the hands of central government or its agency, could be used to gradually encroach upon freedom of speech via the radio.

We Americans should be concerned now about the ever-increasing encroachment upon the radio industry by the Federal regulating bureaucracy. What we need in this country is a new law which clearly and explicitly tells the Federal regulating body what it cannot do, rather than a law outlining a program of what it can do.

We Americans intend to keep our freedom of speech, be it in the newspaper, on the public platform, or what we may or may not hear over the radio.

Of course we have our day-to-day problems, but we should not quickly go to Congress and say "pass a law to prevent this" or "pass a law to prevent that". We must bear in mind that in the end, most of them will be solved by the broadcasters and the listening public through their own voluntary action, so necessary to assure themselves that they can and will stay in business. We must place squarely on the whole industry—the broadcast owners, the radio advertisers, the commentators, the full responsibility for its own conduct, and I say what we must give broadcasting is freedom from fear, for I hate to see regulations issued or laws enacted, aimed at a very small minority. A little regulation of this sort is a dangerous thing, because it only invites further regulation in the future, leading to complete control and the elimination of freedom of speech in radio.

We must be very careful in our decisions affecting this highly important industry, because a wrong decision now may mean that we will not long have American radio as we know it, which is, after all, the only fair and free radio now in existence in the world.

Nazi Persecution of Small Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio talk made over Wisconsin stations by me during the week of April 4.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On Easter Sunday, April 9, humanity receives again the answer to the question—If a man dies, shall he live again?

In Washington it will be a day of cherry blossoms, of magnolias, and forsythias in bloom—of sunrise services.

In the occupied nations like Norway and Denmark it will be a day of renewal and hope.

It has been 4 years since, on April 9, 1940, the peaceful nations of Norway and Denmark were visited by Nazi ruthlessness. The invading Nazis immediately began a planned campaign to exterminate civilization within these lands. The Nazi campaign has failed. It has never attained its fixed goals. In Norway and Denmark, the light of freedom still shines, undimmed, eternal.

We of America, especially those of us whose homes are located in the great Middle West, know and appreciate the sterling qualities of the Norwegian and Danish people. Their contributions to science, industry, finance, literature, and the arts have been recognized in this country. Innumerable Americans of Norwegian and Danish descent have become vital parts of the American community, State, and Nation. Americans of Norwegian and Danish origin have exerted powerful influence upon the progress of our schools, our free press, our churches, and our business and agricultural life.

It is the wide, general knowledge of Norwegian and Danish character which prepared Americans for the manner of Norwegian and Danish resistance to the Nazis. Generations of law-abiding citizens had passed on a heritage of staunch devotion to liberty; and, above all, a sense of humor. The Norwegians and Danes have utilized these qualities to the fullest possible extent.

When the Nazis considered themselves fully established in Denmark, they launched a concerted attack against Danes of Jewish ancestry. That attack, far from gaining them support, made every honorable Dane an implacable enemy of Hitler. The Nazis, following their usual procedure, threatened to make every Dane of Jewish descent wear the Star of David. In reply to this, King Christian said that the answer was simple: All Danes would, then, wear the Star of David. This expressed determination on the part of King Christian to make no distinction between Danish citizens extended to his most unimportant subjects. When the persecution of the Jews attained the proportions when wholesale deportations were involved, thousands of Danish citizens risked their lives to help their hapless fellow countrymen across to the haven of Sweden.

It is a paradox that sabotage should appear among a people famed for their close observance of law. Yet, sabotage has appeared; organized sabotage. The humorless Nazis have not only suffered from the efforts of these Danish patriots; more—they have been made ridiculous. Notices announcing that a bomb would explode in an industrial plant have been posted by the underground. Even the hour of the explosion is announced. Danes are warned not to come to work. Perhaps the explosion takes place; perhaps it does not. In either instance, work stoppage has occurred that will hamper the Nazi war effort.

I could continue to cite other numerous instances of Danish resistance. But one such instance tells the story of all the rest. Danish people are a sea people. They need their ships and, as a sea people, they love their ships. Still, officers of the Danish Navy have scuttled their ships rather than to have them fall into Nazi hands; and captains of Danish merchant vessels have sent their ships to the bottom in the same way.

In view of the steadily growing trend of Danish resistance, the United Nations look forward with confidence to the massed support of the people of Denmark.

Just as the Nazis tried to make an example of Denmark by attempting to develop that nation into a showcase of the advantages of Hitler's so-called new order, so did they try to make an example of Norway—an example of a nation under Nazi terror. They failed in Denmark. They failed in Norway.

When the Nazis—after 2 months of bitter fighting—temporarily subdued the heroic efforts of the Norwegian Army—resistance in Norway did not cease. It went underground. A large portion of the Norwegian Navy and the Norwegian merchant marine eluded the Nazis and made their way to neutral or Allied ports. Many Norwegian ships and thousands of Norwegian sailors are serving the cause of world liberation today. Scores of Norwegian pilots, trained in Canada, have taken their places beside their comrades of the U. S. A. A. F. and the R. A. F. in the stepping up of the air war against the heart of Nazi war industry and transportation. Units of Norwegian ground troops eagerly await the coming Allied invasion of western Europe.

Of equal importance to the military accomplishments of the Norwegians without the boundaries of Norway are the accomplishments of the Norwegian underground and the manner in which the Royal Norwegian Government has established and maintained the best of relations with the governments of the United Nations.

The Nazis sought through pressures applied over long periods of time to control every phase of Norwegian life. But they reckoned without the determination of Norwegians to retain their national characteristics, unaffected by the cruelty of barbarous enemies or by the kindness of trusted allies. No more striking instance of the independence of Norwegian thought exists than in the matter of the conscious successful attempt at preserving the purity of the Norwegian language. At home, the Norwegian underground has effectively prevented the Nazis from Germanicizing the Norwegian language by the planned popularization of certain Germanic terms and phrases. In Great Britan and in the United States, where the English language prevails, I have had occasion to observe the manner in which free Norwegians have carefully, courteously—yet firmly—preserved the lingual practices of their Nation. Americans admire and respect the Norwegians for their determination to retain every attribute of their nationality.

Within Norway, the Nazis have followed their old technique of using all possible measures to turn individual against individual, profession against profession, and class against class.

How miserably Hitler has failed.

The Nazis sought to turn the Norwegian people against their clergy. By promises of special privileges, and when that failed, by threats of concentration camp and death itself the Nazis vainly tried to identify the Norwegian clergy with their degraded standard. The Norwegian clergy was impervious to pleas and punishment alike. They not only retained their integrity as a group but they won the eternal loyalty of their parishioners by their unwavering stand for freedom.

Like assaults on the honor of Norwegian athletes, lawyers, doctors, legislators, labor, and businessmen met with the same results. Cold contempt. Studied lack of cooperation. Meanwhile, no Nazi or no Nazi military installation or factory or railroad was secure from the organized sabotage of the Norwegian underground. Norwegians received information on the true state of world affairs from Allied radio. Norwegian underground newspapers continue to publish facts. Norwegian sources keep an unabated flow of information in motion to Allied military leaders on the situation within Norway. The Allies often learn of Norwegian events before the Nazis and the Quislings know that they have taken place.

For 4 long years there has been no slackening of the hate of Norwegians for the Nazis. When Norway is liberated—and Norway will be liberated—each Quisling will be meted out just punishment. There are comparatively few Nazi collaborators among the Norwegians, but each and every one of them is known to the underground. Moreover, when Norway is free, every Nazi soldier on Norwegian soil will find himself a prisoner of the people.

Norway has endured much from the Nazis. Norway has contributed much toward the certain United Nations victory. Norway has earned—and Norway will receive—an honored place at the peace table.

April 9—the day when peaceful Denmark and peaceful Norway were ruthlessly invaded by the Nazis—will not always be a day of sorrow. When the militarists of Germany are brought down to defeat, April 9 will be an emblem of endurance, a symbol of the spiritual strength of the great and respected peoples of Denmark and Norway.

In America we must see to it that we are not tainted in this critical period by a weak faith, a skepticism as to America's ability to meet the issues of war and peace. A period of trial is up ahead, but America knows how to meet trials.

We are Americans, creatures of independence. We—sons and daughters of pioneers, shaped and made self-reliant by the atmosphere of America—hate regimentation. We face the future expectantly, willing to adventure, take a chance. We can smile at tough circumstances, crack a joke in danger.

We love freedom and want to live as individuals. We are practical, but have great dreams. We are a young Nation, full of ingenuity and strength, and rich in resources, and we are dedicated to make our dreams of peace come true.

This Easter we are looking hopefully toward the future—toward a resurrected world of peace and good will among the peoples of earth.

Flight Instructors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Those Flight Instructors" published in the Davenport (Iowa) Democrat and Leader, of March 28, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THOSE FLIGHT INSTRUCTORS

"Too many pilots in prospect for Army and Navy." So we read in recent news reports, and other unexpected items like: "Thirty-six thousand soldiers who had volunteered for flight training and been transferred to the air forces are now being transferred back to their old organizations," and "the civilian pilot training program is to be junked—authorizations and appropriations for it expiring June 30." Its discontinuation would be the highest compliment Congress could pay it, as it would mean that the 200,000 pilots it has trained have met the Nation's need in record time. A grand job finished with the war perhaps half over.

Elsewhere we read that airplane manufacturers need thousands of skilled workmen to meet the year's production quota. And on hundreds of flying fields the little army of flying instructors who have trained those 200,000 pilots are wondering if this need for skilled craftsmen may not open to them another field of worthwhile service as their job under C. P. T. is closed down.

It would seem to make sense—the suggestion that these pilot trainers be transferred from field to factory. Our information is that they stand ready to be commandeered. The manpower boss can place them where they are most needed. They volunteered for the job they have done so well. Back before Pearl Harbor they rallied to the C. A. A. program. "Use us," they said. No pay was in sight. They got orders like this: "Report on 13th at St. Louis" or Miami. They paid their own travel expense and lots more. Eventually, Congress found out what they were doing—training 200,000 pilots—and fixed their pay at $50 a month.

At that, they carried on. Out on the fighting fronts, their students were winning decorations and commissions. Now the instructors, skilled and experienced pilots, with thousands of hours of flying to their credit in most cases, are soon to be on their own, except as the draft board calls them, says "Take a lot more training and you can carry a gun, earn a stripe or two perhaps in the infantry, and live or die on the ground"—that, because we don't need more pilots.

But how about those aircraft factories? This is no plea for sympathy for this large group of loyal Americans soon to be cast loose from their jobs. It is simply a suggestion that here are thousands of skilled men, who know planes and engines from top to bottom and from inside to outside. Why not head some thousands of them—when their present job is done—for the airplane factories.

The aircraft companies ought to be eager to grab them. Congress, the War and Navy Departments, even the White House, ought to see in them an army of potential craftsmen much too valuable to the national effort for victory to be dispatched to camps for months of training which would make them good privates for the infantry.

Moreover, they may be needed again in the role in which they have been so valuable. The Government would not lose track of them if they were building or assembling planes or engines in Seattle or Los Angeles or Detroit.

What is about to happen to these men has figured in various news reports, but we have yet to read of any attempt to solve the problem presented by the termination of their jobs. Why not put them where their outstanding ability, experience, and training will yield the fullest results in supporting the national war effort?

Forgotten Man—The White-Collar Worker

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask consent of the Senate for a reprint in the Appendix of the RECORD of a brief talk entitled "Forgotten Man—The White-Collar Worker," which I delivered over Wisconsin radio stations December 4 last, and which appeared in the RECORD of December 8, 1943. I ask leave to have the address reprinted because of the numerous requests I have received for it. It comprised less than one page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, what has happened to that phantom figure, the forgotten man, society's specter of neglect for the past 11 years and some months? He is still with us, but as a new group, the white-collar worker. Forgotten? He is, indeed. Recalled to our attention some months ago, with great sympathy by the President in his veto message on the Commodity Credit Corporation subsidies bill, again he is in limbo.

To my mind, we no longer can call him the forgotten man. He has been disinherited, abandoned. Ye have cast him aside. This group constitutes one of the greatest sections of our consuming purchasing public. Fifteen million heads of families are involved, but to this moment none of them, or at least a very few, have found any, or but little, increase in the weekly pay envelope.

Since they are clerical, white-collar, and unorganized employees, they are unable to take advantage of the National War Labor Board's good offices. They are victims of prosperity, unable to compete as individuals for the better things of life or to voice their demands as a group. They are penalized for their own individuality, and we are allowing a growing problem to get beyond control.

This group is slowly being forced to write its living standard downward, and in the meantime they are being forced into debt to maintain even their present standard, while their laboring brother climbs higher and higher, day by day, into the brackets of high incomes and proportionately higher living.

What we do not realize is that it is not alone the white-collar classes which will suffer. We reduce their purchasing power and what happens? Obviously labor is affected; agriculture, industry, commerce are affected. Everyone, including Government, is eventually affected.

The farmer does not sell his products to another farmer, nor labor the result of his toil to a fellow worker. They may interchange it, but in the ultimate end it is this much-forgotten, unorganized group which furnishes the real profit margin.

But theirs is a lonely, divided cry for help, dimly heard against the united cry of agriculture and labor, industry and commerce, all those groups fortunately so constituted as to allow of organization.

There have been rapid and constant increases in the pay and compensation of organized labor. The average earnings in this group increased between August 1939 and August of this year by 41.8 percent, and their weekly earnings by 69.3 percent. Labor has fared well indeed under war conditions, with these increases. Compare them with the rise in cost of living which has been estimated at approximately 22 percent.

The forgotten, neglected, abandoned clerical or semiprofessional white-collar worker, largely unorganized, can cite no remotely comparable rise to offset his equally increased cost of living. Yet, he is paying the major portion of the tab on increased living costs, costs largely traceable to this 69.3 percent increase in the wages of his fellow employee, the worker in the industrial plant. He must pay not only his own additional costs but those of his fellows.

As it now stands, it might be said that the white-collar worker and other unorganized groups are virtually subsidizing the workers of the organized groups. They are paying a penalty for their specialized skilled knowledge and, in many instances, their higher educations. By our very Government, or rather let us say, by the administrations of the War Labor Board, we have adopted a procedure prejudicial to the unorganized forgotten man who, in the past, relied upon his individual efforts to gain for him an increased standard of living. We know the difficulties of obtaining rulings from this Board on matters pertaining to large organized groups. Imagine, then, the difficulties attendant upon obtaining the settlement of questions involving only the individual. The War Labor Board is chronically and notoriously behind in its docket.

What chance has Mary Jones, the school teacher; Pete Smith, the bookkeeper; Carl Brown, the clerk; or Susie Brown, his sister, in a city, county, or State office to receive prompt attention to her or his individual problem? The far-reaching effects of the neglect of this class will soon become apparent.

We have already pointed out that industry, labor, and agriculture will feel the backbite of these neglected millions whose only fault is lack of organization.

If there is a concrete incident of this situation required, look to your educational system. Many teachers throughout the country are leaving their schools for jobs in war plants. Normally, the turn-over is approximately 10 percent a year, but the turn-over in the past 12 months has been more than 20 percent. This is particularly true of the rural areas where Government figures show that of school staffs of 894,000 persons, from janitors to principals and supervisors, about 360,000 earned less than $1,200 a year in 1942–43.

During the period 1939–43, salaries of teachers increased less than 8 percent—based upon the fact that 66,000 teachers received less than $600 a year—while the wages of industrial workers increased during the same period 37 percent.

It might be pointed out, too, that Government is defeating its own purpose by not taking immediate steps to ameliorate the condition of the white-collar worker. We are urging higher and higher education, but in taking from this class, which includes the highest percentage and the highest average of education and intelligence, we are depriving them of the means to continue their children into higher brackets of learning—and of the incentive to do so.

What is the cure, the solution? From our seeming inability to face it, it must be an obscure one. But in reality, it is not.

Will subsidies for the stabilization of wages of the white-collared worker do the job? No. Not food nor wage subsidies will do it. Only one thing will do it—a fair and equitable additional increase in their weekly pay envelope. They are wage earners, just as labor, and they are entitled to a just, and adjusted, wage to give them their full share of the earth's bounty in return for their toil. That, after all, is the measure of a man's value—his equity in the world's bounty. Increasing the wage of an underpaid person to where he gets reasonable and fair compensation, does not make for inflation. The laborer is worthy of his hire. The white-collar worker is worthy of his hire.

My own State of Wisconsin does not look too happily on the fact that they must withhold their cheese and butter from a civilian market while their potential market is destroyed by substitutions which the public is being taught to accept as just as good.

Whatever our plan, our post-war economic security depends upon immediate action. The problem of the forgotten man cannot be solved by forgetting it. No one is to profit if this great important group in our economic fabric is to be ignored, resulting in a very low standard of living, or else a greatly increased individual debt. Billions of dollars in savings and war surpluses will be of no value if we are to destroy one of our greatest purchasing markets or destroy within them their self-respect as a class because they cannot hold their heads high with their fellow citizens—the laborer, the farmer, and the industrial worker.

The square thing, the fair thing, to do is to permit the white-collar worker to get reasonable compensation for his labor.

This is Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin, signing off and saying thank you.

Dewey and Internationalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Dewey and Internationalism," by Marquis Childs, which appeared in the Washington Post yesterday.

I call special attention to the foreign plank in the Republican State platform of New York in 1942, for the drafting of which Dewey was responsible.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON CALLING

(By Marquis Childs)

DEWEY AND INTERNATIONALISM

NEW YORK, April 10.—You sometimes learn more about a political candidate from his friends than from the man himself. One of Governor Dewey's intimates is a man whom the average American has never heard of—John Foster Dulles.

When Dewey speaks of his friend Dulles it is with affection and admiration. Dulles is his closest adviser on foreign policy and, if Dewey should be elected President, he would probably name Dulles as Secretary of State.

I went to see Dulles to get some idea of his views. He is senior partner of Sullivan & Cromwell, which is perhaps the richest and most powerful law firm in downtown New York. To see him, you go to the nineteenth floor in downtown New York. You step into a handsome foyer done in the dignified tradition of the eighteenth century. Dulles' private office is at the head of an Adam stairway going to the twentieth floor.

While he has played an important part in the direction of some of America's greatest corporations, Dulles' dominant interest is foreign relations. His grandfather was Secretary of State under Benjamin Harrison and he grew up in an international atmosphere. At the age of 19 he was secretary of one of the delegations at the 1907 Hague Peace Conference.

Apart from his friendship with the Governor, who is 14 years his junior, Dulles has an important influence on foreign policy. He heads a group with the imposing title of the committee of direction of the commission on a just and durable peace, which was established by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ.

In a recent statement, the commission urged not only a general world organization and the regulation of armament but a far-reaching program of financial and economic adjustment. The basic choice, said the statement, "must be made between international organization designed merely to perpetuate by repression the particular structure of the world which will emerge from the war" and an international order which, "in addition to such use of force under law as is a requisite of order, discharges tasks that are curative and creative."

When Dulles talks about these things, it is with reasonable common sense. He is skeptical of what can be done by arbitrary flat—by the stroke of a pen.

That, in his opinion was the error of the 1919 peacemakers—and he was one of them. They leaned too heavily on a formal treaty. Any world organization, Dulles believes, must begin with fundamental realities such as the friendship existing between English-speaking peoples around the world.

Above all, Dulles holds that we can show the way to a decent world order only if we continue to set a dynamic example of what democracy can do. Here, in his view, Roosevelt has failed.

His tone is one of scholarly seriousness, his few public speeches dull. But when he speaks of Dewey, his face kindles. The Governor, according to his friend, is a quick learner.

Whether as the result of this friendship or on his own, Dewey is on record for positive international collaboration. In three or four speeches in the first half of 1942 he went a long way. And he is especially proud of the foreign plank in the Republican State platform which he drafted. That plank said:

"The United States must be prepared to undertake new obligations and responsibilities in the community of nations. We must cooperate with other nations to promote the wider international exchange of goods and services, to broaden access to raw materials, to achieve monetary and economic stability, and thus discourage the growth of rampant nationalism and its spawn, economic, and military aggression. As a further safeguard, we must join with other nations to secure the peace of the world, by force if necessary, against any future outbreaks of international gangsterism."

The isolationists dancing around Willkie's political corpse will find that hard to swallow. Moreover, I believe Dewey will stand by it.

The Size of the Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "How Big an Army," published in the New York Daily News of March 5, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW BIG AN ARMY?

The size of the United States war effort is much clearer to all of us than its ultimate objectives are to most of us.

We are raising an armed force—Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Air Forces, etc., etc.—now planned to total 11,300,000, with some 10,700,000 now enrolled.

Our Air Forces total something over 2,000,000 men, our air fleets are record-breaking and are growing by leaps and bounds. Our Navy, long past the Pearl Harbor disaster—though not its disgrace—has a reported 23 battleships plus auxiliaries in proportion.

We have been carrying the heat and burden of the war against Japan since the fall of Singapore, and are pouring troops into England at an unprecedented rate. It is expected that when the Allies have mopped up in Europe the United States' contribution in men will have been about 75 percent to Great Britain's 25 percent. We have been committed by our ruler to recovery of the British, Dutch, and French imperial holdings in the Pacific and restoration of those territories to the British, Dutch, and French.

AID TO RUSSIA

Nor is that all. Foreign Economic Administrator Leo T. Crowley a few days ago released a detailed report on how much and what we sent to Soviet Russia via lend-lease between October 1941 and January 1, 1944. From any angle, we have not done too badly by our Russian semially.

Dollar value of these supplies was $4,243,804,000. Tonnage of shipments in 1943 was 5,400,000; in 1942, 2,800,000.

Up to January 1 of this year, we had sent Russia 7,800 planes—a neat little air fleet all by itself.

Other combat equipment included 4,700 tanks and tank destroyers, more than 170,000 trucks, 33,000 jeeps, and almost 25,000 other military motor vehicles. We also sent the Red Army 6,000,000 pairs of United States Army boots.

The Red Army, like other armies, fights on its stomach as much as in its pillboxes, tanks, and planes. Here again, Uncle Sam has not been niggardly. United States food shipments to Russia from October 1941 to January 1, 1944, aggregated 2,250,000 tons—mainly wheat, flour, dried peas, dried beans, sugar, meat, powdered milk, dehydrated vegetables, and fats. That fat category is especially interesting to butter-short Americans, inasmuch as we donated 50,000 tons of butter to Russia; also more than 580,000 tons of oleo, lard, pork fat, and vegetable oils.

Other war materials sent to Russia in the above-named period included 177,000 tons of explosives, 1,350,000 tons of steel, 384,000 tons of aluminum, copper, and other metals, 740,000 tons of aviation gasoline, and $400,000,000 worth of machinery to make weapons of war.

Not content with all this, we topped off our contributions to wartime and post-war Russia by blowing the Soviet Union to a set of machinery for a complete tire factory which, says Mr. Crowley, "can produce at least 1,000,000 military truck tires annually from the Soviet's own synthetic and natural rubber supplies."

In 1943, we about doubled the proportion of our 1942 food shipments to Russia, so that in that year Russia got 51 percent of our lend-lease food, the British Empire got 42 percent, north Africa got 5 percent, and Greece, west Africa, and the Dutch got 2 percent.

THE SILENT GREAT BRAIN

The American people, thus, are putting out a tremendous war effort of their own, and are feeding, clothing, and equipping large numbers of fighting men in other Allied Nations.

The American people, we believe, have a right to know what this is all leading to—this bleeding of themselves, of their sons, and their substance. Is it planned to conquer Germany and Japan, and then police large areas of the world for years afterward with several million American boys who would otherwise come home, have families, and strengthen the fabric of American life?

Are we to give everything we may win in this war to somebody else? Is it not even intended to ask for a suitable screen of island air bases for North American continental defense in the Pacific and the Atlantic? The British flag flies again in Guadalcanal and Tarawa, though American fighting men are still policing those British colonies.

To these questions, the great brain at Washington has yet to give a clear answer. The great brain merely demands that we keep fighting, keep working, keep our mouths shut; and assures us that "poppa" knows best.

The answers to these and related questions are of the gravest concern to the American people. It is the job of the American Congress to find out the answers to them.

Analysis of Republican Presidential Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix to the RECORD an analysis of the Republican presidential situation, written by Roy A. Roberts, managing editor of the Kansas City Star, and previously for many years the Washington correspondent of the Star. Mr. Roberts was one of the best newspaper reporters I ever have known; he is doing equally good work as managing editor of the Kansas City Star. He knows whereof he writes, and also knows how to write it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEWEY "GO" SIGNAL—WILLKIE WITHDRAWAL LEAVES REPUBLICAN PATH CLEAR FOR NEW YORKER—SEE QUICK NOMINATION—EMPIRE STATE GOVERNOR MAY BE PUT OVER ON FIRST BALLOT AT CHICAGO—SWING IS EXPECTED TO COME AFTER STATES COMPLIMENT FAVORITE SONS

(As a long-time observer of the American political sense, first as Washington correspondent of the Star and later as managing editor, Roy A. Roberts has prepared this analysis of the Republican Presidential situation as it emerges from the overwhelming victory of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey of New York, and the corresponding defeat of Wendell Willkie, in the Wisconsin Presidential primary.)

Wendell Willkie's withdrawal from the Republican Presidential race last night following his staggering defeat in the Wisconsin primaries will give momentum to a stampede—already on—to the candidacy of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York. It makes Dewey as certain of being the G. O. P. nominee as President Roosevelt is to be the Democratic candidate.

To those who have followed the rather unspectacular Republican nomination picture, it would not be surprising now if there were only one ballot at the Chicago convention in June.

Dewey has taken such a commanding lead over the country he will be within shooting distance of the goal if not way past it by the time the convention assembles, unless there would be some miraculous change in the picture. And miracles seldom happen in politics unless they are planned.

PLANNERS FAVOR DEWEY

This time most of the effective planners on the Republican side are openly or privately for Dewey—not all of them happy over it, but regarding his nomination as inevitable. If the tide should continue to run toward Dewey as it has been, strategy would call for a first-ballot nomination, if possible.

So the picture now looming is one of the States casting their usual complimentary favorite-son ballots on the first roll call. Then if Dewey is close to the nomination mark or over it, enough shifts likely will be made to put him over on the one call, with a bang. And the draft will have been made. That this is about what will happen when the Republicans gather to select their opponent to Mr. Roosevelt is at least a 3-to-1 money bet right now.

Seldom in political history has a candidacy been deflated as quickly and thoroughly by the balloting in one lone State as that of Wendell Willkie and his misadventure in Wisconsin. Willkie himself made this possible by more or less making Wisconsin the test. Since the first of the year all the national polls have indicated that Willkie was slipping fast. The standard bearer of 4 years ago just couldn't get going, although he has had the biggest press, especially the magazine press and most of the New York papers, of any candidate in years.

WILLKIE PLANNED A BLITZ

The strategy apparently behind the Willkie campaign was to blitz the party again by a barrage of publicity and the supposed hold he had on the voters. All along the claim had been made that only the politicians were against Willkie and that when he once got to the people there would quickly be another story told. In fact, it has been one of the mysteries of the Willkie campaign why he always seemed almost to invite the hostility of the State leaders rather than try to placate them.

Ordinarily Wisconsin would have been a tough State for Willkie. It is in the shadow of the powerful Chicago Tribune, which hates Willkie second only to Roosevelt. The Wisconsin delegation in Congress probably deserved being characterized as isolationists more than any other State delegation in Congress, voting against practically every move proposed by the President before Pearl Harbor. The State had been strongly for Dewey in 1940.

Against this picture, however, and destroying any alibi the Willkie supporters might advance was the fact the anti-Willkie vote was split three ways. None of the three opposing candidates for whom delegation slates were entered was in position to campaign the State.

STAYED ON FOR DEWEY

Dewey not only refused to enter the State but sent two telegrams demanding that the delegations entered in his name not be filed. Some even accepted the situation and withdrew. A majority did not. MacArthur and Stassen both were in the far Pacific fighting their Nation's battles and their backers could do little for them.

Seemingly, with the opposition vote split three ways, it was a situation made to order for Willkie. His backers thought it smart politics for him to go in and gain a moral victory and demonstrate to the country that the voters down at the crossroads were for him.

Willkie made the most intensive fight a Presidential candidate has ever undertaken for one single State, campaigning for 13 days and making more than 50 speeches. No candidate for State office could have tilled the political soil more thoroughly. Yet he ran a bad fourth.

Willkie's one hope, as party leaders generally in Congress and in the States refused to accept him, was to demonstrate there was popular demand for him down in the rank and file of the voters. He staked all on a throw of the dice, and they rolled him out. The Nebraska primary next Tuesday—he was campaigning the State when the knock-out came—offered him little chance for a comeback, because the test on the preference vote was only between himself and Stassen of Minnesota. The inside dope from Nebraska was that Dewey had a big majority of the delegates on both the slates in the field, regardless of the preference vote.

So Willkie made his surprise announcement last night abandoning his candidacy, probably with the thought that he would have more influence in the convention on the foreign affairs plank by not coming into the convention a badly beaten and scarred candidate with only a few delegates behind him.

Making little noise and refusing to go into primary tests, Gov. John W. Bricker, of Ohio, really has stood for weeks in second place in the Republican picture rather than Willkie, Willkie, even though the limelight shone on Willkie.

Bricker has been campaigning the country assiduously, making straightout anti-Roosevelt, anti-New Deal speeches and praising all Republicans. The result is he has made a lot of powerful friends and picked up considerable delegate strength here and there. He had more delegates in sight than Willkie.

Many of the eastern leaders like Joe Pew of Pennsylvania and some of the big industrialists really prefer Bricker to Dewey. But the point is most of the Bricker strength could and would go to Dewey easily if party strategy dictated an early nomination. And it now does.

With Willkie definitely out of the race, Bricker and all the others mentioned are apt to have tough going. Republican politicians generally have very acute hearing when a bandwagon begins to roll and with Wisconsin knocking Willkie out of the race, Governor Dewey is perched high on the bandwagon seat and it has started to rumble.

Willkie's chief strength was in New England where he was generally credited with having a majority of the delegates in sight. Also, he had some strength on the Pacific coast. But Dewey, not even an active candidate, was second choice if not first choice in all this territory. It unquestionably will swing to Dewey now and make the Chicago convention a ratification and platform convention rather than the customary candidatorial squabble.

Alaska and Hawaii Sometimes Lead the Nation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, newspapers are usually dependable as to all factual statements. But there are exceptions. One such nonfactual exception appeared in a Washington Star headline on March 5, 1944. Here it is: "Mississippi leads Nation in percentage of War bond quota." The article which followed the headline embraced a tabulated statement showing the amount of the Fourth War Loan quota assigned to each State and Territory and the percentage of subscriptions thereof. As indicated in that headline, Mississippi led the States by subscribing 154 percent of its quota. But way down at the bottom of the list Alaska and Hawaii are included, and it appears by this same article that Alaska subscribed 202 percent of its quota and Hawaii 175 percent.

As great and glorious as is the State of Mississippi in this as in many other things, that State did not lead the Nation in percentage of War bond quotas, because, upon the august authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, Alaska and Hawaii have been declared, and by indisputable fact are, a part of the Nation.

So, in the interest of accuracy, and not at all to bring any further glory to Alaska or Hawaii, I venture to rewrite the headline and to say therein, in capital letters, if I may, "Alaska and Hawaii lead the Nation in percentage of War bond quota." The article in its entirety follows:

MISSISSIPPI LEADS NATION IN PERCENTAGE OF WAR BOND QUOTA

Mississippi, with 154 percent of its quota, led the other States in the Fourth War Loan drive, the Treasury reported last night. North Dakota was close behind with 153 percent.

Bond sales in the District totaled $110,014,000, or 116 percent of the city's $95,000,000 quota. Included were $34,488,000 in Series E bonds—the so-called people's bond. This total was 15 percent above quota. However, total purchases by individuals amounted to $51,334,000, 3 percent short of quota.

In a separate report last night detailing results of the local phase of the drive, John A. Reilly, chairman of the District war finance committee, said the results "sustain Washington's performance of never having failed to meet its obligations to the Nation and to our valiant fighting men."

The Treasury released the following State table on the month-long campaign which ended February 15 with total sales of $16,730,000,000 as against a national quota of $14,000,000,000.

NOTE.—The figures are in round millions of dollars; Series E bonds are those purchasable only by individuals.

State	Series E	All sales	Quota	Percent of quota
Alabama	$42	$123	$93	132

Educational and Training Courses for Honorably Discharged Veterans of This War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed and the House will very shortly be asked to pass appropriate legislation designed to provide educational and training courses for honorably discharged veterans of this war. This subject will logically be taken up in connection with pending bills covering a broad demobilization program for returning servicemen.

There are three important considerations which should govern our thinking in the passage of any such legislation as is now contemplated in this direction, as follows:

First. Will such a program be so devised that the extra costs involved in adequately providing for these veterans be borne in an equitable fashion by all of us, or will we expect our colleges and universities to absorb large portions of this financial burden?

Second. Will we arbitrarily direct the footsteps of these servicemen to the nearest school or college, regardless of the type of training specialized in at that institution, or will we take pains to send these men and women only to those institutions which can provide the type of training to which their previous training and experience entitles them?

Third. Will we leave this vital matter of educational direction and advice up to some agency, heretofore unqualified by experience or training, or will we place this power of assignment in the hands of the agency or bureau best qualified to handle it?

In connection with the above vital considerations, I wish to direct our attention to a letter recently received by me from the Honorable E. E. Davis, dean of the North Texas Agricultural College at Arlington, Tex. Dr. Davis has not only had long experience in just such problems as are discussed in his letter, but has also sought and secured the advice of others equally competent to comment on this subject. You will note that the letter is a summary of the findings of a special committee appointed to study and report on the various bills now pending before the Congress on this vital question. The letter is as follows:

NORTH TEXAS AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, A BRANCH OF THE AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL COLLEGE OF TEXAS,
Arlington, Tex., March 22, 1944.

Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PATMAN: After receiving your letter of March 8 stating that it might be helpful to you if a careful examination were made of certain measures now pending in Congress with the aim of providing educational and other benefits for members of the armed forces upon their discharge from active service, I appointed a committee of three of the ablest members of the N. T. A. C. staff to make a study of the educational features of H. R. 3200, by PATMAN; H. R. 4057, by RANKIN, and S. 1509, by THOMAS of Utah. I now have the report and recommendations of the committee before me. May I add that two members of the committee are veterans of World War No. 1 and one of them, Dr. C. C. Mason, was a rehabilitated student at the Texas A. & M. College because of the loss of an eye and an arm in the battle at St. Mihiel. The high points in the committee's report, with which I am in thorough agreement, run as follows:

1. Instructional costs: For the first 2 or 3 years after the war the American colleges and universities are going to have demands far in excess of their normal physical and financial capacities. They will have to provide for the education of two generations of students at one time—the normal current generation for that period and the generation returning from the armed forces. To be specific, the A. & M. College of Texas, a noncoeducational institution with an outstanding military program at all times, will probably have 4,000 returning veterans the first year or so after hostilities cease. Take, for example, the little institution that I represent, the North Texas Agricultural College, a branch of the Texas A. & M. College, with a peak enrollment of 1,776 and a probable 1,000 of its former students now in the services planning to return as veterans and finish the courses they had under way when called to active duty.

According to Gen. Frank T. Hines of the Veterans' Administration, a requirement of the Comptroller General of the United States is that institutions of learning shall not be permitted to charge the Federal Government for veterans in attendance sums in excess of charges ordinarily assessed by them against other students taking the same or comparable courses.

This policy will make it very difficult for some institutions to operate when the veterans come rushing home to complete the college courses they had under way when interrupted by the war. In this State the available instructional revenues for veterans will be limited to the collectible tuition of $25 per semester. The actual cost of instruction is several times that amount. I am presuming that you understand that appropriations for the State-supported colleges and universities in Texas are made on the per capita norm basis, that is, each institution is given a sum for instructional purposes equivalent to $175 per year for each full-time freshman and sophomore, and $225 per year for each full-time junior, senior, and graduate student enrolled for the year immediately preceding the session of the legislature by which the appropriations are made. You can readily see why the forward-looking executives of the State-supported institutions of higher learning in Texas are viewing with much concern the budgetary and enrollment problems due for the ensuing biennium, 1945–47.

The total instructional cost for the returning war veterans should constitute a charge against the Federal Government and not against the individual States. As the matter now stands, according to the holding of the Comptroller General, it constitutes a charge against the general government only to the extent of the tuition fee collected, which in the case of this State, amounts to only $25 per semester. As I indicated to you in a previous letter, there is a strong likelihood that the Texas institutions will receive more than their proportional share of the returning veterans since so many of them sent to Texas for training have indicated that they are going to return to Texas after the war for permanent domicile. This makes it all the more imperative that the Federal Government contribute more than the tuition fee of $25.

2. Approved institutions: The matter of determining whether a trainee should attend a college, a secondary school, or a trades school is very important. Many veterans of World War No. 1, like the proverbial square peg in the round hole, got into institutions where they did not fit. I bore witness to some very tragic examples of that sort in the early 1920's. Veterans with delusions of grandeur were allowed to enroll in professional courses for which they had no adequate background of previous experience or scholastic rating. The outcome was failure and disappointment—the result of their Government's misdirected good intentions. We must not permit a recurrence of mistakes like that this time. Vocational and professional guidance should have a very definite place in the administrative plans.

3. Administration: Section 2 of the Thomas bill provides that the administration of servicemen's education be concentrated in the United States Office of Education, in an administrator appointed by the President, and that this administrator utilize the services of any legally designated State educational or vocational agency in the execution of this act.

It is the sense of the committee, and I concur with them, that this provision is administratively sound. It concentrates the responsibility for the war veterans' educational services in the department of government where it logically belongs and it provides, at the same time, for the full use of existing agencies maintained by joint Federal and State contributions for the educational rehabilitation of disabled persons. It creates no additional Government bureau or agency with divided or overlapping responsibilities of the sort that usually result in confusion and inefficiency.

Assuring you that we appreciate the interest you have always shown in the welfare of the war veterans, I am, with every good wish,

Yours very truly,

E. E. DAVIS, Dean.

The Arabian Oil Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Felix Morley entitled "Strong Imperialistic Tinge Seen in United States-Saudi Arabia Oil Project." The article was published in the Wall Street Journal of February 25, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STRONG IMPERIALISTIC TINGE SEEN IN UNITED STATES-SAUDI ARABIA OIL PROJECT

(By Felix Morley)

Indications that the post-war policy of the United States will be strongly imperialistic are accumulating. Plans revealed up to this month have not gone beyond acquisition of protective islands and strategic naval bases. Now the issue has been sharply posed by Secretary Ickes' announcement of long-range commitments in respect to Arabian oil.

This announcement was obscured in the daily press by more spectacular news of military operations. But the first paragraph of the release issued from the office of the Secretary of the Interior on February 5, indicates its significance:

"The United States Government will construct a pipe line for transportation of petroleum products from the Persian Gulf area to a point on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, and will obtain in that area reserves of 1,000,000,000 barrels of oil, Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes announced today on behalf of the Petroleum Reserves Corporation, of which he is president. The directors of Petroleum Reserves Corporation are the Secretaries of State, War, Navy, and Interior, and the Administrator of the Foreign Economic Administration."

Agreement in principle for these purposes has been concluded between P. R. C. and two American companies operating on the western shore of the Persian Gulf. These companies are the Arabian-American, owned by Standard of California and the Texas Co., and the Gulf Exploration, owned by Gulf Oil. The presidents of the three parent companies have signified their agreement, following strong and protracted governmental pressure. The undertaking now awaits approval of the boards of directors of the companies and its sanction by the shadow governments of the Arab States of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

This agreement in principle, whereby private business is coerced into becoming the active agent of the Government in imperialistic expansion, is something new in American diplomatic history. Certain points in the arrangement are worth close attention:

1. The Government "agrees to construct and to own and maintain" the pipe-line system, "including requisite facilities," which is to be built across the Arabian desert. (2) The companies will "maintain a crude-oil petroleum reserve" of 1,000,000,000 barrels "for the account of, and purchase by, the military forces of the United States." 3. "The commercial and other policies and practices of the companies" are to "conform to the foreign policy of the United States," whatever that may be. 4. Government purchase of the reserved oil shall be at a discount of 25 percent below the market price in the Persian Gulf region, or below that governing in the United States, whichever is the lower at the time of delivery.

II

The precise terms of the projected agreement, however, are of less concern to the average American than the implications arising from conditions in the area where it promises to become operative.

In this district, between the eastern Mediterranean coast and India, lie the seeds, which oil can readily help to germinate, of at least two potential conflicts. One is the always latent rivalry between Russia and Britain, which even today simmers around those waters of the Persian Gulf where the oil is to be extracted.

The second potential conflict is that which is shaping up as a result of the growth of Arab national consciousness. Present antagonisms are not far from the explosive stage in Palestine, where the port of Haifa is named as a possible terminal and refining point for the oil which is to be brought to the Mediterranean over the proposed pipe line.

It is not merely the American oil companies, but also the United States Government, which under the proposed agreement would be immediately involved if trouble should break out either between the British and the Russians in Iran, or between the Arabs and the Jews in Palestine. Any intermediate tribal vandalism against the suggested transportation system, stretching across some thousand miles of desert, would similarly become an attack on the American flag; an act of aggression against the United States.

There may be more than coincidence in the fact that, as this issue focuses, pressure intensifies for military conscription as a permanent policy. The project of the Petroleum Reserves Corporation is to be located in a political cockpit where future international and interracial clashes are all too probable. And the project is concerned with an indispensable commodity which has frequently proved itself inflammable in more than the chemical sense.

III

Propaganda in behalf of the P. R. C. project will center upon the alleged exhaustion of our oil reserves. Secretary Ickes has for some time been hammering on the theme: "We're running out of oil." In an article under that title in the January American magazine he placed the life expectancy of our known oil reserves at 14 years, adding "it is up to us to take out some form of mutual insurance."

In a report on petroleum matters, made public February 16, the Senate (Truman) Committee Investigating the National Defense Program substantiates Mr. Ickes to the extent of supporting his statement that the United States is no longer in a position where it can oil another war. This report points out that the United States is currently producing about 70 percent of all the petroleum used by the United Nations, and has contributed upward of 85 percent of the aviation gasoline, observing:

"It would seem fair to ask our allies, particularly Great Britain, to recompense the United States for this excessive depletion by transfer to us of a compensating volume of proven reserves outside this country."

Three distinct arguments can therefore be expected in behalf of the P. R. C. Arabian oil project:

1. Without some such development, drastic gas rationing may become a permanency with shocking results for a society which has taken the automobile as a matter of course.

2. Unless oil concessions overseas are protected by the Government, the United States will be dangerously handicapped in the event of a third world war.

3. Official development of the Arabian concessions, an area where British interests dominate, are particularly logical because from this area Great Britain, perhaps also Russia, could most readily repay in kind the tremendous quantities of oil lease-loaned to them during the present war.

IV

Substantial opposition to the provisional Arabian commitments is nevertheless apparent and is likely to increase as the alarming political implications become more clear.

The oil industry itself is strongly antagonistic, asserting the reports of exhaustion are grossly exaggerated and new reserves will be found as soon as the administration permits a rise in crude-oil prices to a level at which it will be possible to drill exploratory wells. The American Petroleum Institute announces that even in 1943 production scarcely exceeded the increase in the volume of our estimated reserves.

Leaving aside the extravagant use of public funds, it is asked why, if the Government needs to go into the oil business, it does not do so in the adjacent territory of Venezuela, Mexico, and Colombia. Here oil reserves, if not as fabulous as those of the Middle East, are still enormous. The answer is that these countries have prohibited just such exploitation by governmentally controlled corporations as the Roosevelt administration is now proposing to impose on the more distant Arab states.

It is further asked why, assuming the desirability of establishing military oil reserves on the Persian Gulf, it is necessary, in view of our huge and growing tanker fleet, to move this oil through Government-owned pipe lines across Arabia to the Mediterranean. The absence of any satisfactory answer to this question has given rise to speculation that an American naval base is projected in the eastern Mediterranean, balancing the one said to be contemplated for Borneo after the defeat of Japan.

In its current report, publication of which was expedited by the disclosure of the Arabian agreement, the Truman committee charges that irresponsible administration is our present means of approach to as delicate and complex a diplomatic and economic situation as can be found in the world.

Before the United States is permanently involved in the perils of this Middle East entanglement it would be well to heed the Truman committee's warning as to the imperative necessity of an early determination of a national policy on petroleum by the Congress.

Such determination should include inquiry as to why the Secretary of the Interior, rather than the Secretary of State, is taking leadership in a diplomatic undertaking about as remote from the interior of this country as terrestrial geography permits.

Price Control Has Worked

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting herewith the testimony of the Honorable Chester Bowles, which is self-explanatory:

STATEMENT OF PRICE ADMINISTRATOR CHESTER BOWLES BEFORE THE HOUSE BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12, 1944

Mr. Chairman, it is my earnest recommendation that the Emergency Price Control Act be renewed, substantially in its present form.

There is no questioning the fact that the law passed by Congress more than 2 years ago has served most effectively in stabilizing prices and rents. Under the present law the cost of living for the average American family has risen only 6½ percent since price control was first introduced at retail in May 1942.

For the past year, the average cost of living has been held in check with no over-all rise whatsoever. The level of wholesale prices, too, stands today almost exactly where it did a year ago.

These figures are not ours. They are the regular published figures of the United States Department of Labor, secured through techniques and methods which have been in use for the past 40 years.

Thus for 1 entire year, in the midst of the greatest war in our history, and in spite of the most powerful inflationary pressures, the average American family has been protected against any over-all increases in its cost of living. For 1 year, too, the average businessman has been protected against increases in his cost of raw materials and equipment.

Has this record of level prices been established at the expense of farm and industrial production? Certainly there is no such indication.

On the contrary, production under wartime price control has increased by leaps and bounds. Both farm and industrial production have increased during this war four or five times as much as they did during World War No. 1.

Profits during the present period of wartime price control are also at record levels. Corporation profits during 1943, even after all taxes, were twice what they were in 1939. Business failures were at the lowest point in 50 years. The net income of our farmers, after all expenses, were 45 percent over the most profitable previous year in all farm history—1919.

However, the administration of price control is a vast and complicated procedure involving the control of more than 8,000,000 individual prices. It is inevitable that there would be a certain degree of inequity and hardship.

During the next 2 or 3 weeks various individuals will come before you to recommend many different amendments to the present law in the hope that every economic hardship can be in some magical way eliminated.

Whenever individual hardships today can be relieved by price increases, without endangering the price line or raising the cost of living, we will, of course, grant them. During the last few months we in the O. P. A. have taken step after step to fit individual regulations to the complexities of different industries and even individual firms.

But an amendment to the present bill, legislating the relief of all economic hardship on a broad scale, regardless of the over-all consequences to our economy, would be a disastrous blow to the entire program of price control.

A second type of amendment which will be suggested to you, deals with the exclusive jurisdiction of the Emergency Court of Appeals. This court was established by Congress as an emergency wartime body to establish the legality or illegality of all O. P. A. regulations on a national basis. It has served its wartime purpose admirably.

However, there are certain groups which are recommending that this exclusive jurisdiction feature be scrapped, and that any individual or firm be allowed to challenge the legality of an O. P. A. regulation in any one of our 93 Federal district courts.

On a basis of ordinary peacetime legal procedure, this suggestion is most appealing. But it will not, in my opinion, bear analysis, when judged against the background of wartime conditions under which we are now forced to operate.

If each individual O. P. A. price regulation could be challenged in each individual Federal district court, it is not an exaggeration to say that instead of price control we would soon have price chaos. Court decisions would conflict with one another on the same regulation in various parts of the country. Months would go by while appeals were taken to the higher courts. As one court has recently pointed out "the Administrator would spend his time fighting litigation instead of fighting inflation."

In the meantime businessmen would be in a state of widespread confusion. Distribution would be thrown out of gear. Enforcement on the particular regulation in question would break down completely.

Such an amendment added to the present bill, regardless of the good intentions of its advocates, would be good news indeed for the black marketeers. It would spell higher prices on dozens of items and place a further strain on the pocketbooks of our citizens.

A third type of amendment which will be suggested to you is designed to split up the price-control functions of the O. P. A. among the various so-called production or supply agencies. Thus, the War Food Administration would assume control over food pricing. The War Production Board would establish all prices for industrial materials. The Petroleum Administrator for War would establish petroleum prices. The Rubber Director would decide the price of rubber. And so on.

It is difficult for me to see how anyone could propose such an amendment who actually believes in the control of prices and in the over-all anti-inflation program. This amendment has been advanced quite frankly on the theory that the agencies whose major responsibility is oversupply, would be more readily susceptible to pressure for higher prices than an independent agency such as the O. P. A., responsible to the Congress and the people solely for effective price control.

These three types of amendments will be recommended to you in various forms. Perhaps most of those who advocate them will sincerely feel that they, too, believe in the wartime control of prices. Others will present them for no other reason than their wish, for selfish reasons, to break down the O. P. A.'s efforts to protect all the people against a rise in the cost of living and to lessen, to the greatest possible extent, the cost of fighting the war.

But on this issue there must be no confusion. Regardless of the sincerity of many of the proponents, these amendments if accepted, can have only one end result. Prices in general will go up. The record of stable prices, established with such difficulty during the past year, will be blasted. Inflationary forces headed by the wartime profiteers, will again be on the march.

Mr. Chairman, the final all-important decision as to whether or not the present price line should be held, or whether the cost of living and the cost of the war are to be increased, is a question which Congress alone must decide.

But I know that you favor price control. I know that you would not intentionally cripple its effectiveness.

Knowing that, I would be remiss in my duty as Price Administrator, if I did not do my utmost to convince you that the major amendments proposed, whatever the intentions of their sponsors, would mean substantially higher prices.

I am sure, gentlemen, that you will see to it that this does not happen.

Mother an' Me

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Mother an' Me," written by Mark M. Shaw, and printed in the Greater Nebraskan.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOTHER AN' ME

(By Mark M. Shaw)

Lord, we've been comin' to You for a long time, that is mother an' me, tellin' You of our joys and our sorrows. We've grown so to depend on You. Lord, in all the years gone by, You've never disappointed us. We know You'll forgive us, we know You'll not be mad at us for comin' to You again.

Lord, You see all, You know of our weaknesses and our shortcomin's even before we tell You about them. Lord, we need You right now.

We've been walkin' around in a sort of a daze. We look at the trees bare and skeleton-like, at the grass brown and dead; even the good old earth seems cold and forlorn. If the sun shines, we don't see it, and if the birds sing our ears are deafened to their music.

Dear Lord, You had a Son, so You'll understand. We want to tell You about our son, our Johnny Boy. To other folks he's a man, to us, that is mother an' me, he's just a bright-eyed, hopeful, eager little boy—he's our baby. His mother has to lay his shirt out for him and tie his necktie, and as for me, I have to slip a dollar into his pocket now and then for spendin' money.

It brought tears and regrets when our older children left for homes of their own, but we knew that was the way of the world. We left home in the long ago, that same way, that is mother an' me did.

Last week, our John squared his shoulders proudly and marched away to war, to defend this Nation, our beloved homeland, from the attacks of despicable enemies. John's room is empty, the bed is neatly made up, his clothes are made ready and gently folded, ready for him if and when he comes marching home again.

Lord, You know our Johnny Boy, but we do want to tell You this: We, that is mother an' me, have been building air castles around our baby boy for a good many years. Our plans were all for him, but in every one of these plans—and we changed them a good many times—there was always a quiet place for mother an' me. Perhaps it would not have worked out that way, but we liked to think so, and that part of our plans were never changed. Lord, today all our air castles lay in ruin at our feet and we do so miss our John as we wander from room to room and place to place in a sort of an endless maze.

An' now, Lord, we, that is mother an' me, are not complainin'. We know other folks' sons are going along with our Johnny Boy. We know that their hearts are torn with anguish, too. So we are askin', pleadin', and trustin' that You will take care of all these brave boys. Guide them, bless them, take care of them through the long, bitter days ahead. And if in Your divine judgment, goodness, and mercy You can see fit to bring this conflict to an ending soon; if peace can be restored to a suffering world, with victory for justice and the right; we, that is mother an' me and all the other mothers and fathers all over the world, will be so happy.

Somehow or other, Lord, we just can't say "amen," we can't say "good-bye." We're just holdin' onto Your hand for strength, faith, and courage to meet the cares of the day and to help us drive away that dread of what might happen. Lord, You do everything right. We're coming back to talk this over again with You, right soon, and to ask You to give us the strength, the faith, and the courage to meet whatever in Your divine wisdom is best for us. We have that firm faith that You will bring our John home safely again soon to us; that is to mother an' me.

The Farmer and the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from the column of W. H. McWilliams published in the Times-Leader of Martins Ferry, Ohio, relating to the farmer and the war.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FARMER AND THE WAR

(Extracts from the column of W. H. McWilliams, Times-Leader, Martins Ferry, Ohio)

Are the country people as patriotic, as far as rationing goes, as the city slickers? Is the housewife from the sticks abiding by the law on rationing of supplies as good as her city cousin who merely goes to the phone and tells the grocer to bring her a batch of grub—or as big a batch as her ration book will stand?

You hear a lot these days and some time ago I stood in the conference room of the United States Department of Commerce in Washington and listened to a discussion of that same question. One half-baked guy with the mark of Cornell all over his face, contended that out in the sticks farmers and small-town citizens carried on trade more or less like the mountaineers of Kentucky do their stills—without regard for the "revenuers" from the banks of the Potomac.

He's nutty.

I have just got back from making a wide survey over the industrial-farming section of eastern Ohio including Jefferson, Harrison, Guernsey, Belmont, and Monroe Counties and I can say that if the rest of the United States was as conscientious in observing the rules and regulations of rationing as are the industrial worker and the farmer, there wouldn't be any need for rationing in America.

Four things impressed me. The farmer has the best chance of any class in the country of busting the rationing laws wide open but they are, instead, the most conscientious in obeying them.

Another point is that the workingman's family, especially the mine and mill folks, probably has as much right to squawk as any class and yet I found family after family that undoubtedly went without what they needed of some articles because it wasn't lawful to buy them without points and they didn't have points enough.

And the third point I observed was that rationing-board personnel in the rural counties couldn't be any more rigid or faithful to the letter of the rationing law, and it's my opinion that even Moses, the lawgiver of old, couldn't have found any fault with the spirit in which rural boards from one end of the district to another administered the rules and regulations—the extent of which, by the way, would sometimes baffle old Moses and cause him to cast, as he once did the tablet of stone, down in unutterable disgust.

I don't know yet how city people are living up to the rationing laws, but I know this—if they live up to them any more faithfully than do industrial-farm sections of eastern Ohio, you had better load 'em down with the nearest blacksmith anvil because they have already sprouted wings and will soar upward, very shortly, into the billowy clouds of celestial perfection.

I have found farmers by the score who have let meats and certain foods waste and lose the sale of them because they were conscientious enough to feel that it would be "agin the law and their country in wartime to sell without points."

And lastly, in my tour, I failed to find a single storekeeper who had deliberately put the price of his products higher than that allowed by law. I found scores who were complaining about not being able to make a profit, but none who did else than to post the regulations on the wall and point with stern finger to the notices when customers came to buy: "There's the law, neighbors; wartime, you know."

They ought to strike a medal for the rural sections of America. They are holding, even though they disagree sometimes, the ceiling price on commodities.

Alcohol as a Supplement to Gasoline

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a news release entitled "Farm Bloc Plans Determined Fight To Assure Alcohol Important Place as a Supplement to Gasoline." It relates, of course, to assuring adequate motor fuel in the post-war period.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM BLOC PLANS DETERMINED FIGHT TO ASSURE ALCOHOL IMPORTANT PLACE AS A SUPPLEMENT TO GASOLINE

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The Senate farm bloc plans a determined fight to assure alcohol an important place as a supplement to gasoline for powering post-war automobiles.

The Gillette subcommittee on utilization of farm products of the Senate Agriculture Committee will be the vehicle for the farm b' 's drive. It is the same group which triumphantly pushed alcohol into the synthetic-rubber program which originally was based on petroleum as a raw material.

Motivating force of the latest move is ostensibly to widen the market for farm products. Corn is the most adaptable grain for alcohol production. Other farm products which have been used with varying degrees of success—and cost—include blackstrap molasses from sugarcane—our cheapest domestic material but not available in quantity; grain, sorghum, wheat, potatoes, sweet-potatoes, sugar beets, and apples.

While a place for alcohol in the post-war motor-fuel market is the ultimate goal of the drive farm-bloc representatives want a start made now while the public is conscious of a gasoline shortage—less attention has been given so far to the fact that alcohol is in extremely short supply—even experimental quantities for a motor-fuel program would be difficult to obtain while it is needed for explosive manufacture and other war uses.

The subcommittee's recently opened hearings will be directed primarily toward convincing the War Production Board and the public that materials should be made available for such things as sawdust-alcohol plants and dehydrators for grain-alcohol plants. The prospects of a big post-war market for alcohol in the automobile fuel field will be one of the chief arguments.

Even committee members probably will not contend that the use of alcohol is economic at present or even feasible on a large scale. They will suggest that when a large and efficient alcohol industry is built up it will become practical.

In backing alcohol for the synthetic-rubber program the committee picked a winner. Originally expected to produce about a third of the butadiene used in Buna S, it actually has produced nearly two-thirds. The oil companies were slow to get under way in the butadiene field because the same materials were more urgently needed for high-octane gasoline. In addition the petroleum-alcohol process developed kinks.

Whether another winner is in the offing for the farm group, however, is a wide-open question. Alcohol for motor fuel is not a new thing. The Department of Agriculture has experimented with it since 1907 and has had a special laboratory for the purpose at Peoria, Ill., since 1936. Oil and motor companies have made experiments.

Out of this a few general conclusions can be drawn, but there still is a wide area of controversial thinking.

If alcohol ever comes into general use in this country, it probably will be as a blend for gasoline in the proportion of one part to nine or more of gasoline.

The resultant blend will cost more than gasoline alone under any processes so far tried. Alcohol enthusiasts claim, however, that under certain circumstances the operating results would offset greater cost per gallon since alcohol raises the octane anti-knock number of lower-grade gasolines.

A widespread use of alcohol for auto fuel will probably have to await the production of post-war models with certain engineering changes designed to take care of it.

Despite these hurdles, which most people familiar with the gasoline-alcohol problem agree are present, the committee is expected to arrive eventually at certain concrete recommendations.

War Production Board officials forecast that the committee will recommend changes in W. P. B. policy so as to grant materials to build plants producing alcohol from sawdust and wood-alcohol enthusiasts think too that by installing many more dehydrators in alcohol-from-grain plants the waste—wet slop—from alcohol output could be reclaimed for stock feed. Thus more grain could be diverted to alcohol.

It has been contended in some official quarters that no good could come from expanding alcohol facilities, because they would be of absolutely no use after the war, to counter this view the Gillette committee aims to explore publicly the post-war automotive prospects for the commodity.

This committee, members feel, is particularly timely because of repeated alarms about the Nation's vanishing petroleum reserves. But even if oil resources are deemed stable, as the Petroleum Industry War Council currently asserts, the committee will push the use of alcohol after the war as a logical cushion for farm surpluses.

It intends to show how alcohol is being used in motor fuel in Cuba, was used before the war in the Philippines, and can be used efficiently after the war in United States automobiles. As one witness follows another, it will become clear that the committee is trying to prove conclusively that alcohol can be produced from wastes and surpluses at low enough cost so it can get in the filling-station pump.

Alcohol can be used effectively with gasoline either in a prepared gasoline-alcohol blend or mixed in the carburetor.

When farm wastes and surpluses find an outlet as fuel, the alcohol advocates say there will never be any reason to pay farmers not to grow wheat.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter from Mrs. Jane Marianna, of San Juan, P. R., representing the Pro-Statehood Association of Puerto Rico:

Much controversy has been going on in the press and in governmental circles about Puerto Rico, particularly in relation to the government of Rex G. Tugwell, the Tydings bill for the independence of Puerto Rico, and the senatorial committee which visited the island some time ago. Among other things, the argument sustained by some members of the Chavez committee relative to the English language as being a major condition for the admission of Puerto Rico as a State of the Union startled many. It is beyond our comprehension how the Spanish language and the Spanish culture could be considered as a barrier to such a goal at this moment when the Government of the United States is taking such pains to develop permanent ties of friendship and understanding with the South American continent. At this time when schools throughout the United States are adding Spanish to their curricula, when even the far-seeing wife of the President of the United States is learning Spanish, the much coveted knowledge of this language is precisely thrown up against us as a capital obstacle to the solution of our colonial status.

Far from being a handicap, our Spanish language and our Spanish culture should be considered as a decisive factor for our admission to the Union, for where could the United States find a more complete stock of potential commercial or government employees and teachers with excellent command of three languages? (Portuguese being easily acquired by us.) Who could make, I ask you, a better ambassador of good will or otherwise to the South American republics, an American who speaks a more or less intelligible Spanish with no knowledge, or a superficial one, of the idiosyncracies of the Latin peoples or a bilingual American of Puerto Rico with both cultures equally at hand?

Many Puerto Ricans have already successfully contributed in establishing cordial and friendly relations between the United States and the Latin-American countries. Among them are:

Col. Serafín Montesinos, United States Army, Assistant Chief of Staff, Panama Canal Zone. Decorated by the following Latin-American countries: Colombia, Bolivia, Peru, Panama, Ecuador, and Nicaragua.

Col. Eduardo Andino, United States Army, former United States military attaché in Costa Rica.

Col. Francisco Parra, Assistant Chief of Staff, G-2, Antilles department.

Maj. Guillermo Moscoso, Jr., United States Army, former assistant military attaché in Guatemala, El Salvador, and British Honduras.

Capt. Alfredo Ramírez de Arellano, United States Army, Inter-American Defense Board, Washington, D. C.

I don't know of any time in the history of the United States when the admission of Puerto Rico to the Union would constitute not only a master diplomatic step of great repercussion in the hearts of our sister American republics but also a more timely addition to the United States Government's aiming at the transcendental fusion of the commercial and war interests of North and South America.

To those who think that the language might constitute a problem, let me remind them that there is a small, highly civilized country in Europe, composed of 22 cantons of which 16 speak German, 5 French, and 1 Italian. You have guessed that I am speaking of Switzerland whose heterogeneous population amounts to only 4,000,000 people; just 4,000,000 people with 3 national languages and 91 dialects. For many centures 3 different languages were accepted without prerogatives by the Swiss Government. Laws were promulgated in the 3 national languages. Lately the language of a small canton which persisted in preserving its own particular personality and its own particular language was accepted as the fourth national language. And what has been the result of this system of government? An extremely cultured and civilized small country with the most perfect national feeling of unity which has enabled them, among other remarkable achievements, to maintain peace twice, in the midst of the 2 greatest world conflagrations.

How could anyone think then that a language of the actual importance of Spanish could be an insurmountable obstacle to the recognition of 2,000,000 people to share, on equal terms, the rights and responsibilities of the 48 States of the Union?

Let Puerto Rico acquire full consciousness of its personality as a State of the Union and the so-called independence movement will fade away like a dream. What irks that particular group is the uncertain feeling of our status. What keeps the people of Puerto Rico constantly divided and fighting petty political fights is the uncertainty of our future. Naturally enough, different ideals spring up. Our humiliating colonial status is forever present in the minds of political parties. The problem is so deeply rooted in their subconscious mind that they go as far as antagonizing the intensive teaching of English from fear that our national feeling be dulled and finally absorbed with, as a result, a fatal weakening of our will to be acknowledged as a free people.

This psychological uneasiness is responsible for the partial failure of our educational system. But let us be delivered from that nightmare and the renaissance of Puerto Rico with a stabilized, normal government would be assured.

How could a ship ever reach its destination when half of the crew steers her in this direction and the other half steers her in the opposite direction? I would go as far as saying that it is remarkable that our ship has traveled so far in spite of such rough seas. But let that crew know that they are heading for a safe harbor and watch that ship gallantly and proudly sail next to 48 powerful senior ships.

I cannot lay enough stress on this point: the major problem of Puerto Rico is a psychological one.

Honorable Members of Congress, who represent the well-meaning democratic and liberty-loving people of the United States, you cannot continue to be the insensible onlookers of the moral disintegration of 2,000,000 people whom this Government of its own free will took under its care.

An overwhelming majority of Puerto Ricans favors statehood for the island, because for 45 years we have lived under the American flag, because we have been educated under the American educational system and we have learned to love and respect American institutions, because when we were given our first civil Governor President McKinley entrusted him with the mission of orientating our political future toward statehood; because in a speech made in New York on April 19, 1921, at the unveiling of a statue of Dante, President Harding declared that Puerto Rico was a part of the Nation and called it an American State; because President Franklin Delano Roosevelt was elected in 1932 on a platform which advocated independence for the Philippine Islands and statehood for Puerto Rico; because on the platform on which President Roosevelt was reelected it was emphasized that "we favor a larger measure of self-government leading to statehood for Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico," and on the platform of the Republican Party a similar declaration was made; because Puerto Rico is the natural link between the two Americas and Puerto Ricans are anxious to do their share in the momentous rapprochement of the two powerful continents, because the American Government has spent sums of staggering heights to make of Puerto Rico its outstanding stronghold of the Atlantic and it eliminates the possibilities of integral independence for the island, even if we had wanted it; because when the United States entered the First World War, the American Government deemed that the cooperation of Puerto Ricans was important enough to grant them American citizenship, and when this country declared war on the Axis, Puerto Rican patriots volunteered by the thousands to help America save democracy for the world.

For all those reasons we have focused our hopes on the ideal of becoming the forty-ninth State of the Union and expect reciprocity of feeling from the Americans of the continent. Thousands of Americans in Puerto Rico and on the continent, who have known us well in our long years of social and commercial relations, can vouch for our feelings of loyalty to the American Government and our friendship for continental Americans.

We realize fully that this is not the best time to bring up the matter of statehood before Congress. We are deeply conscious, as the whole world is, that our great and only aim now is and should be to concentrate all our efforts against totalitarianism until final victory is attained. But it was precisely a Member of this Congress, a United States Senator, who took this step much against our desire not to distract this administration, already overburdened with the superhuman task of defeating a demoniac invader.

The well-known magazine Life did us the harm of publishing a very partial and most unfair illustrated information about us. They criticize this administration for their failure to solve some of our gravest problems, in spite of the fact that the Government has spent $300,000,000. Let me tell this honorable Congress that even if it had lavished $300,000,000,000, still the results would have been more or less transitory. It is not monetary help that will solve any of our problems. What we need is protection from the colossal manufacturing power of these United States. We have struggled to develop many industries; they have been drowned by the fabulous output of American factories. What or who would not be? Even the invincible Hitler and his satellites will succumb to the gigantic power of American industries. God be thanked for that!

But, if, as the smallest child of this great family of grown-up States, we had been protected by this Government, we would have had a fair opportunity to develop our potentialities. But as things are, a small island, in the middle of the ocean, under a colonial regime, no matter how heroic her struggle, cannot but choke to death. I dare hope that Life will do us justice in publishing the other side of the story to prove how much credit we are entitled to because, in spite of such adverse conditions, we have attained remarkable progress and our buying power has placed us second on the list of the Latin customers of the United States.

Our island is poor in mineral wealth, but rich in population. Our men and women have deft fingers. Our beautiful drawn work and embroideries had found their way to the big stores on Fifth Avenue; our handmade blouses and dresses were among the favorites in American summer resorts; our beautiful rugs decorated the floors of your liner America, the Federal Building at the World's Fair boasted magnificent rugs from our factory in Puerto Rico. We could develop to a high degree the natural wealth born with our artisans, but to take only one example, our needle industries have been pitifully ruined because our fellow citizens of the continent flooded the market with cheaper handicrafts from Japan at cheaper prices. They helped Japan buy war materials to destroy American lives, while their fellow citizens of Puerto Rico watched helplessly their working classes starve to death. That certainly did not prevent heroic men and women of Puerto Rico from offering their lives to fight the Japanese aggressors. I could submit a long list of names which would mean nothing to you, but to mention a few: Brigadier General del Valle, hero of Bataan; Col. Virglio Cordero, a prisoner of the Japanese; and Commander Juan Pesante, graduate of the United States Naval Academy, killed in action at Guadalcanal. Among those on the occidental hemisphere, I cannot fail to mention Capt. Oscar O'Neill, who as commander of a Flying Fortress was cited by Mr. Winston Churchill for his heroic and valuable services. He is now a prisoner of the Nazis.

The law of minimum salary, on the other hand, has ruined many of our growing industries because local conditions made it impossible for us to meet the conditions established so suddenly by this Federal law. If we had had our representatives in this Congress, we would have prevented the harm done us. In many instances, as we say in Puerto Rico: "The cure was worse than the disease." Wisely amended to suit our particular problems, it would have done justice to a great many, without ruining many others.

What we need, allow me to insist, and what we ask of you, honorable Members of Congress, is protection for our growing industries, a fair chance to provide work for our great population, and the solution of our psychological uneasiness, which cannot be overcome until we know very definitely what our place in your pan-American program is going to be. We want to know that we can look forward to seeing our little star take its place in the American flag where President Wilson wanted it to be when he made us his equal in citizenship.

We know what Arizona, New Mexico (a bilingual State whose laws are published in both English and Spanish), Indian Territory, and Oklahoma went through to obtain statehood. We have our problems which are no greater than those of the Southern States. We can take our troubles and our growing pains and make use of them as the others. You've had your internal troubles, your guerrilla warfare, your bleeding Kansas; you have had great Presidents killed; you have your fanatics as much as we or any other country have had theirs. We are no better nor any worse than other peoples.

If representatives of our local political organizations to the Insular Committee tell one story and someone else tells another, let your imagination go beyond their inconsistencies and realize that back of it all the situation is economic and psychological.

We know that nothing but a definite promise of statehood will put an end to these controversies that inevitably weaken the faith of Puerto Ricans in their own government, as well as their confidence in the directing ability of this Government which holds their destinies in its hands. We have gone through great sacrifices and are ready to prove once more that we can bear hunger better than we can bear the lack of hope. You have much to give in the way of helping us trace our road to full maturity; we have much to offer in just reciprocity of feelings.

We do not expect to obtain the solution to our colonial status at this very moment, but we do expect a formal promise of this Government that in a definite period of years the recognition of Puerto Rico as the forty-ninth State is assured.

We are so conscious of the responsibility we are asking to assume that if you were to give your immediate and unconditional solution now we would say "no." We want a period of years in which to prepare ourselves fully to enter on the same footing as the continental citizens of the United States. We want to have time to get rid of our prejudices and allow Americans of the continent to free themselves of their own misjudgments. They do not know us as yet under normal conditions. Americans have made us feel oftentimes that they are the owners, we, their possession. Let us meet for some time on the same footing, as I have said before. We want to have time to establish a current of better understanding and good fellowship among us. We will open our homes to your students of Spanish and we will send you our students of English. They will constitute our best mouthpiece. They have already come by the hundreds to your colleges and universities, and they have proven to be second to none.

Right now hundreds of American enlisted men and officers of the Army and Navy are marrying Puerto Rican girls. Our men are fighting, shoulder to shoulder, with their brothers of the continent; we are defending the same ideals under the same flag. May the mingled blood of our best men and your choicest youth, running on the same battlefields, be the communion of the American citizens of the continent and the American citizens of Puerto Rico to a new feeling of thorough understanding and permanent brotherhood.

JANE NICOLE MARIANNA.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, if Virginia and Ohio can be called the mothers of Presidents, Wisconsin has long appeared to be the father of political trends. Bob La Follette, the elder, was not only a shrewd politician, but a statesman as well, and from his day to the present moment, the voters of that great State seem to be able to anticipate the course of national thought.

To many, Wisconsin's overwhelming repudiation of Wendell Willkie was not only an emphatic rejection of his international views, but a notice to all the world that Wisconsin at least wanted none of the New Deal, not even an imitation or carbon copy of it, as Willkie by some was considered to be.

The Wisconsin result is hailed by many as an unequivocal endorsement of Thomas Dewey. That conclusion may not be as accurate as it at first appears. The vote may have been more a protest than an endorsement of anyone.

In his 1940 campaign for the Presidential nomination, Dewey, throughout the country, made a series of speeches which have seldom been equaled in the clear, concise presentation of the issues then confronting us. Then he went into Wisconsin, made what was termed an isolationist speech, which lost him the support of the international bankers, cost him the Republican nomination at Philadelphia when they swung to the support of and put over Wendell Willkie.

Will Dewey's New York speech, made on the night of the Wisconsin primary, affect his strong midwestern support? In that speech he said that, after the war is over, there must be established a system of international cooperation in which free nations—can be secure in the liberties which shall have been won at such great sacrifice. * * * One of the great problems seeking solution will be the protection of minorities. The genius and culture of minority groups must be safeguarded to their nations and to the world as a whole. * * *

We have learned unmistakably out of this war that no nation can remain free when great slave populations exist under dictatorships elsewhere.

Already there is speculation as to whether Dewey intends, so far as foreign policy is involved, to follow in the footsteps of Willkie, who but followed some of the President's supporters in advocating the establishment of a super united states of the world, with an international police force.

It may be that Dewey was making general statements, not outlining specific action, as, for example, whether we should insist upon the independence of Poland or Finland, if Russia insists upon annexing the people and the land of those countries; free India from British or Jap control.

The result in Wisconsin shows that, while the people of that State are willing to be generous, charitable, to cooperate in aiding other nations and other peoples, they think first of all of the welfare of our own country, and they will not support either a policy or a candidate who desires to establish, at the expense of our own sovereignty, a super world government of any kind.

Willkie, in his 13-day campaign, lambasted the New Deal domestic policy, criticized the President's foreign policy, but clung to the idea that America must in some way, no matter what the cost in treasure or men, guarantee the political independence of minority groups and nations throughout the world.

Willkie is a skilled advocate, a polished orator, and no special pleader ever more adroitly, persuasively, and eloquently represented the internationalists and their theory of making this country not only the arsenal of democracy but the bread basket and the financial sponsor of all who might apply.

The people of Wisconsin would have none of it and not one delegate of the 24 did Willkie get. MacArthur, the hero of the Pacific, captured 3. Stassen the neighbor boy from Minnesota, got 3. Dewey will probably get the other 18. Dewey has glamor. His 1940 preprimary speeches have not been forgotten. He has shown himself to be a relentless racketeer-prosecutor, an efficient State Governor.

Not only was Willkie the spokesman for the advocates of the international world, he was the spearhead of the smirch campaign being carried on by the internationalists, the new dealers, and the Communists. Several Wisconsin Representatives have been attacked by these groups. Willkie's complete repudiation by the people of Wisconsin is notice to the Democratic Party leaders and to the Republican organization that the people of the Midwest feel confident of their ability to choose their own representatives for public service.

The great Midwest has been buying its full share of war bonds, contributing its full share of industrial production; its sons and fathers have been doing their duty on the fighting fronts, and those who remain here at home will accept no criticism of their loyalty or their patriotism. They will reject at every opportunity every attempt to destroy our constitutional government, the effort to remake America along either communistic, Fascist, or Nazi lines. They have no patience with would-be instructors or stooges of foreign or domestic internationalists who would make us the Santa Claus of all the world.

Those who make a profit out of this war, those who assume that they possess not only all the knowledge of what is good for us as a people, but that only they are patriotic and loyal, might just as well today as later accept and act upon the fact that the people of the Midwest will follow a policy which to them seems designed to best protect the interests of America and those in the service.

The people of the great Midwest will cooperate with the internationalists, with the people of other sections of this country, in carrying on the war, in the establishment of a permanent peace, in the preservation of a constitutional government here at home; but they will not accept dictation from any international group, no matter how well financed, how well represented by political orators.

Congress Defends Constitutional Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., before the Women's Republican Club of Massachusetts, at Boston, and broadcast over the stations of the Mutual Broadcasting Co. on Thursday evening, March 30, 1944:

This dinner of the Massachusetts Women's Republican Club revives tender memories of a greatly beloved woman, one of the early founders and inspired leaders of this organization, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird. Mrs. Bird was one of the really great women of New England. In this Republican club her fine American patriotism continues to point the way to preservation of our American way of life.

The women of this fine organization—indeed, all the women of America—have a great responsibility and a magnificent duty to fulfill in the government of their country. In a larger measure than ever before, they will be obliged to carry out the mechanics of this national election. Millions of the young men of this Nation will be busy putting the finishing touches on the destruction of Hitlerism and the ideologies of the dictator nations that might makes right. Upon the women of America will rest a major share of the responsibility of maintaining our institutions at home. For while we are fighting an all-out war to destroy ruthless aggression abroad, we must not permit our precious American heritage of freedom to slip away from us at home.

Our founding fathers, in their wisdom, contrived our American constitutional government of checks and balances because they knew that too much power corrupts. They knew that too long a tenure of office does something to even the best of men. Power feeds upon power.

The events we have witnessed and the currents which have been set in motion in government in the last 12 years have confirmed the wisdom of the founding fathers.

We have reached a point in our national history when the Congress is the last remaining guardian of the Constitution and the last remaining bulwark of the people's liberties. In recent years there has been a steady, consistent, and, I am convinced, a deliberate campaign conducted by the high councils of the New Deal to drive a wedge of distrust between the people and their Congress.

It has been part of a pattern to centralize control over the destinies of the American people in the executive branch of our Government. Some years ago the same effort was made to alienate the people's confidence in their Supreme Court and the lower Federal courts. The effort to pack the Supreme Court in order to obtain a bench which would be subservient to the Executive will was met and defeated by a thoroughly aroused public opinion. It was through no fault of the people or the Congress that the objective was later achieved owing to the flight of time and the frailties of human life.

Today with such an overwhelming control of the executive and judicial branches of the Government by one group, it is more imperative than ever that the American people have on guard a free, independent Congress to preserve their liberties under our Constitution.

It is a fortunate fact for our Republic that whenever a great crisis has threatened to change our form of government without the consent of the governed, the people of America have asserted themselves and have arisen to safeguard our free way of life.

Government by bureaucracy has grown apace in the last dozen years. The Chief Executive has set up a vast number of bureaus and commissions. There has been a steady and persistent demand for more and more power by the executive branch. It cannot be denied that the New Deal has sought to centralize and consolidate in a small group surrounding the President all of the essential powers of government. It has sought to substitute bureaucratic directives for statutory law.

To protect our precious liberties and our institutions is not an easy way; it is a hard way. Those who have taken up the fight against encroachment by the bureaucrats upon the liberties of the people often find it to be a thankless and disheartening task. There is no reward of patronage, no fat contracts, no favors and no junkets for those who tackle powerful bureaucracies. Then, too, such power has no difficulty enlisting in its support powerful individuals, powerful radio interests, and newspaper propagandists.

Truly, the sole compensation for those who are determined to stand up for the liberties of the people is usually their own sense of satisfaction of having contributed their bit to maintain our way of life—to keep America American.

There have been some who, to deceive the people, have tried to make it appear as though the Congress is obstructing the executive branch. The facts refute such false contentions. If Congress has erred, it has been in its readiness to give to the Executive the broad powers which he has continually demanded for the army of bureaucrats built up under his administration.

In the emergency of war, it has, of course, been necessary to confer upon the executive branch vast powers for the prosecution of the war. Refusal to have granted such powers would have been as unwise as failure to scrutinize closely the use of these powers, to correct abuses where abuses have appeared, to be ready to recall such powers as are misused and to restore them to the Congress and the people when the emergency has ended.

But before the advent of war, or even the threat of war, vast powers vested in the legislative branch by the founders of the Republic were transferred by rubber-stamp Congresses to the President and by him to the bureaucrats under the pretext of emergency. I am glad to be able to tell you tonight, my fellow Americans, those days are over.

The people became disturbed at the trend of events, and they have been speaking at the polls. The people are determined that state fascism isn't going to happen here.

Opposition to the drift toward permanent regimentation of America is by no means confined to those of us who profess the Republican political faith. If that were so, there would be no hope of success. But happily, the opposition includes legions of Americans who proudly boast of their loyalty to Jeffersonian ideals. Then there is also a multitude of independent voters, who hold the balance of power in elections in this country, and who have joined whole-heartedly in this fight to free America from the clutches of a selfish and power-ridden bureaucracy. This fight against bureaucracy is not merely a Republican fight. It is an American fight.

It is these people who helped to swell the vote of the Republican Presidential nominee in 1940 to 22,000,000 votes, and it is the support of this great mass of free men and women who enabled congressional candidates all over the country to poll a million more votes in 1942 than did those who sought election on the Democratic ticket. It is the support of these groups which has shown in the special elections since 1942 that the trend has been constant and progressive, and it is the support of these groups, which together with the new, militant and progressive Republican Party will elect a President this November and finally wrest control of your Congress from the last vestiges of New Deal domination.

A long series of acts by the executive branch in defiance of the expressed will of the Congress, and recriminations against the legislative branch because it would not submit, culminated in an accusation against the Congress that it was perpetrating a fraud upon the men and women of our armed forces while the Senate was considering an honest ballot for the use of absent soldiers, sailors, and marines.

The real significance of this battle has not been clearly impressed upon the people. Some day this contest will stand out as a critical period of our history, as important to the maintenance of constitutional government as the Supreme Court packing issue.

The founding fathers very wisely provided that the States would be supreme in the control of elections. This was to avert the danger of a powerful Executive from utilizing personal control over elections for the purpose of achieving perpetuity in office.

Fortunately there were enough Members of Congress with the courage to make certain that no Federal bureaucracy would dominate the election this November, as would have been done under the bill which was originally proposed.

There was never any difference of opinion as to the desirability of the service men and women being permitted to vote. Everyone believed they should be allowed to exercise this sacred right of citizenship. The bobtailed ballot bureaucrats would have given the service people a blank ballot, with no names printed thereon, and providing only for a vote for Federal offices.

Now perhaps some of us Federal officials are vain enough to suppose that the men and women in our armed services would care only about voting for us. But the fact remains that while it may not contribute anything to our own self-esteem, there may be many members of the armed forces who are more interested in voting for some friend who is a candidate for the State legislature or for a county sheriff than for his Federal officials. A majority of us believed the service people had that right, if they wished to exercise it. A majority of us believed, and still believe, that the boy or girl who is risking his life in Italy or in the South Pacific, is entitled to just as complete and just as valid a ballot as those of us who remain at home.

Evidently those who sponsored the so-called bobtailed ballot brushed aside as of no consequence the fact that under the laws of nearly all the States, such ballots could not have been legally counted and that under such conditions many service people would have been disfranchised. Such a course would have opened a wide field of litigation which might well have cast the Presidential election into Congress for settlement and have resulted in many contests for seats in Congress.

Such a situation would be a major calamity in a tense war year when there is need for the fullest possible unity and cooperation. Those who advocated the State ballot wanted to give the service people the right to vote a complete ballot and one which could legally be counted.

They did not want to fool the service men and women, and furthermore, they wanted to see that in the confusion of these war days, the Constitution, the anchor of all human freedom, should not be set aside.

The States have risen nobly to their obligation to give the men and women in the armed forces the chance to vote. They will provide a full and valid vote. They will have the ballots ready so they can be transported abroad and returned in ample time. The States will do their part. The Federal Government must not fail in its obligation of transporting the ballots, which rests squarely upon it.

The executive branch, for nearly 12 years, has had almost absolute control of our Government. With each succeeding year, this control has become more rigidly fixed. There was a time when there was some degree of independence among many of the various governmental agencies which, because of their quasi-judicial nature, were required to have membership from both political parties. It was a national conception that this arrangement would permit of one party acting as a check upon the other and that no single group would enjoy complete domination in carrying out the policies laid down by Congress.

This wise precaution no longer exists. If new Republicans are named to these agencies, they are appointed chiefly because of their support of the Executive and his policies. For the most part, the only way they could possibly be identified as Republicans is their own claims or through some old and nearly forgotten registration, honored more in the breach than in the observance.

The result has been the New Deal clique has had absolute control of all agencies, with only a lonely and feeble opposing voice here and there.

Through the device of regulations and directives cloaked with the force of law, the Executive boldly moved into the domain of the legislative branch.

Some idea of the New Deal invasion of legislative functions of Congress may be gained from the fact that in the last 10 years the New Deal bureaucrats have put into effect 3,703 Executive orders while Congress has passed 4,553 laws. The figures reveal how dangerously close we have approached rule by bureaucracy.

In an effort to destroy the people's confidence in their Representatives in Congress and thus strengthen their own hold upon all the functions of government, the New Dealers and their propagandists have made Congress the subject of ridicule and attack. The final culmination of such attacks upon Congress and encroachment by the executive branch on legislative functions forced even the Democratic leader of the Senate, Senator BARKLEY, to resign temporarily.

It is probable that nowhere in the history of our Nation can be found a situation to parallel that in which the legislative body found itself as a result of this hostility by the executive branch.

The situation is made more serious by the fact that our Nation is engaged in a great war. It is not a social experiment, but a battle for life and liberty. While our gallant American men are giving their lives on the battlefields of the world to destroy dictatorship and aggression and to keep their homes secure, we at home must make sure that a victory for law and order abroad is not perverted into a government by men and orders at home. We must make certain that regimentation will not be permanently fastened upon America.

Problems of tremendous magnitude are now pending. Whether we shall still have another world war may well be determined in the next few months. Relief of destitute peoples, the stabilization of world currencies, the distribution and control of the world's petroleum, the control of world shipping after the war, the allocation of the aviation routes of the world, adjustment of national boundaries, the making of a just and lasting peace—all these are problems of the near future.

Discussions concerning them have been in progress, but both Congress and the people have been left completely in the dark as to the decisions which are contemplated. A few bureaucrats alone have been participating in these conferences and making the crucial decisions which will affect the future of America for many years to come. Such practice is as wrong as it is dangerous. The men and women who are actually fighting this war, the people who are paying for the prosecution of the war through staggering taxes, and the Members of Congress who are the chosen representatives of the people, should have a real voice in these far-reaching decisions.

Agreements made as a result of these conferences should not be presented to the Congress with the blunt warning that they must be ratified or else we shall be brought into a rift with our allies.

Congress, as the direct representatives of the people, should be represented at these international conferences. And this representation should include delegates of both major parties.

This is not a one-party or a one-clique war. It is a war of all the American people. The future policy of our country must in the final analysis be a policy satisfactory to a majority of our people. If it is not, any international agreements will be as worthless, as far as being permanently effective is concerned, as a piece of scrap paper.

Foreign policy should be a national policy and not the judgment of one individual or small group of individuals.

Now we are winning this war. Our fighting men and women on land, on sea, and in the air are going to take care of that. After we win the war what must we do to win the peace?

If we maintain the free-enterprise system of America, if we keep our country free, who is there who cannot envision glorious new horizons of achievement for this greatest of all nations?

As Republicans and as Americans we in Congress have set our sights upon a definite chart of objectives, which we are in process of carrying out, which we must and will carry out if we are to fulfill our mission.

First of all, we shall give, as we have given in the past, our full cooperative effort to the winning of this war—to winning of this war as rapidly and with as little loss of life as possible. This is and must continue to be the paramount objective of every man, woman, and child in America.

2. We will continue to defend the Constitution of the United States, whether it is assailed by subversive organizations which would remake America, or by those who would scrap it to entrench themselves in power.

3. We will continue to fight to eliminate waste and extravagance in all Government spending. Any legitimate cost for winning the war will be cheerfully met by the American people, but they rightfully resent the frittering away of funds irresponsibly and wastefully.

4. We will continue to insist upon a simplification of tax returns in order that they may be understandable to the average citizen. Our entire tax system must be overhauled, made more practical, more efficient, and less complex. We must avoid any form of taxation and any burden of taxation which will strangle small business, suffocate community enterprise, or incapacitate the larger industries. There can be no security in America, social, economic, or political, without jobs for the people. In levying taxes we must have in mind the stimulation of production and the creation of new jobs for the millions who will need them.

5. We will plan for the return of our men and women from the battle fronts and peacetime employment of those on farms, in factories, and the shipyards. They will want and they must have real jobs at American wages and under American standards of living, not doles or Government hand-outs.

6. We will make complete provision for those who have been disabled as a result of wartime service to their country and for the rehabilitation of the maimed. We should provide also educational opportunities for those whose schooling has been interrupted by the call to arms. A comprehensive educational and rehabilitation program will be set up at an early date.

7. We must prepare a forward-looking postwar program which will maintain private enterprise and permit this country to go forward to a great era of genuine prosperity and progress. We must maintain the freedom of labor, freedom of the farmer, and freedom of management. We must see that each group in America is given a fair chance and equal opportunity to share in the fruits of prosperity and progress.

8. We must carefully watch the use of powers granted by Congress to the bureaucrats. We must have the courage to curb abuses and to recall powers that are no longer needed. We must stand ready to see they are returned to the people at the conclusion of the war.

9. We must make adequate provision for those who reach old age and are unable to continue to share in the building of their country as they have done in their earlier years.

10. We must discourage and we must attempt to destroy class prejudices and class preferences. We must eliminate special privilege and we must observe constitutional guaranties that under our form of government there shall be fair and honest treatment of every individual, regardless of race, creed, or color.

A square deal to every American is the real guaranty of real Americanism.

Our post-war economy cannot go back. It cannot stand still. The only way in which our free constitutional government and our free enterprise economy can continue is by going forward. By going forward, I mean that after the war we must gear our producing and distributing plant to a new and greater production, one which must be constantly expanding. The New Deal tried the economy of scarcity, of plowing under, and we know now what a miserable failure that was.

We have in our country demonstrated a genius for mass production. We must turn that genius to the making and distribution of more and better goods, at lower and lower prices. It is when goods are produced at reduced costs through increased efficiency without wage reductions, that all income is enhanced so that our people may have more of the good things of life for their dollars.

We have reached our high state of living and working in America because our citizens were free individually to think, to imagine, to experiment, to invent, and to put their intelligence and their energy into the production of new and better goods and services for the people. The reward of profit has been the mainspring of incentive. Our people still believe that if someone can invent a better mouse trap than his neighbor, the world will beat a path to his door.

The only sound, productive, and happy economy is a free economy operated under fair rules. Congress must see to it that the rules are fair.

We are confronted by these tremendous problems. Can we solve them? I say we can. The American people possess a great intuitive mass wisdom and high mass ideals.

American common sense, American courage, American love of liberty, American genius, American faith in God and good, will bring us through.

We will lead the world back to sanity, peace, and prosperity. We will keep faith with the men and women on the fighting fronts by protecting at home those sacred ideals they are so gallantly protecting on battle fronts all over the world. God give us strength.

What Do Congressmen Do?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith an editorial from the Daily Journal published at International Falls, Minn., under date of April 5, 1944:

CONGRESSMAN'S DAY

What do Congressmen do at the seat of government? Do they really work diligently, all the time, for their constituents or is their job a snap? These and some other questions that concern the duties of a public servant in Washington are answered by the Eighth District's Representative, WILLIAM A. PITTENGER, in his current letter to the folks back home.

Mr. PITTENGER tells about his work as follows:

"The work of a Member of the House of Representatives involves a great many duties aside from the rather important one of attending the sessions of the House, and voting on important measures that come up for consideration.

"One of my typical days last week, very briefly stated, was as follows: Answer correspondence, involving the question of furloughs for men in our armed forces overseas, letters from the wives of servicemen regarding dependency benefits, inquiries from parents of men in our armed forces who have not received their letters, and numerous other departmental matters.

"In addition there was a mass of communications from people in the district expressing their interest in connection with pending legislation involving veterans, O. P. A., and numerous other bills. At 10 a. m. there was a meeting of the Committee on Claims, of which I am second in rank on the minority side. This committee considered some 30 measures introduced for the relief of individuals who cannot bring suit against their government in the courts, and whose only redress is to go to Congress. I secured favorable action at that session on 5 different claims bills.

At 12 o'clock noon, the House went in session and adjourned at 4 p. m. The balance of the day was spent in consulting with people from the district and in answering further correspondence.

"I give this somewhat brief summary to show that work here requires constant attention."

Overalls and Work Shirts Are Essential

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, for two seasons, the farmers and workmen in Nebraska have in many instances been unable to buy overalls and work shirts. Merchants have informed me that for weeks at a time their stores would be entirely out of both articles; that they had been forced to sell dress shirts to men for working in the harvest fields and that boys' overalls were difficult to obtain.

Mr: Speaker, I wish to extend my remarks by including an article which may throw some light upon this situation. It is the resolution adopted at the mass meeting of overall and work-shirt manufacturers from all parts of the United States and representing well over 75 percent of the total production of these garments, held in New York City, Tuesday, April 4, last, submitted to me by the chairman, Mr. I. J. Walls. The resolution is as follows:

At a mass meeting of overall and work-shirt manufacturers from all sections of the country and representing well over 75 percent of the total production on these garments, held in New York City on Tuesday, April 4, 1944, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas in the discussion of costs, it was forcefully brought out that the majority of the industry has had increases in labor costs since March 1942 up to 32 percent which, together with recent cloth increases granted to the mills by O. P. A., will result in the continued manufacture of these products at a definite loss. This, together with other increased costs, has brought a stop to selling and distribution and has caused further serious distortion to production; and

"Whereas it is a matter of record that no industry has cooperated more with O. P. A. than the work-clothing industry. Before and since the March 1942 price freeze, its record is one of shining achievement in answering all calls made upon them by O. P. A. It first responded wholeheartedly to O. P. A.'s request in holding down prices in late 1941 and early 1942. Again, after the March freeze, they voluntarily and unitedly followed O. P. A.'s further request in rolling back their prices as an example to other industries. The outstanding result has been that overall and work-shirt prices at the manufacturing level are today lower than they were in March 1942 and this without any deterioration of make or quality. So far as is known, this cannot be said of any other industry. Faced with past and current labor and cloth increases, however, this fine cooperation is no longer possible; and

"Whereas as early as September 1943 when the mills were making application for price increases on denim, chambray, and covert cloth, the garment manufacturers were assured by O. P. A. that no increases would be granted on cloth without full compensating relief at the same time to the garment manufacturers. This, unfortunately, has not been done; and

"Whereas following recommendations of the Industry Committee in January 1944 that the manufacturers could not absorb increases, O. P. A. requested and received cost information from overall and work-shirt manufacturers proving that these increases could not be absorbed. O. P. A. then advised that they thoroughly understood and recognized the manufacturers' position; and

"Whereas the man on the farm, in the factory and mine knows that overalls and work shirts are his chief working garments and if selling is to be resumed and present production maintained on these critical and much-needed garments, it is imperative that O. P. A. grant quick and definite price relief. It is their responsibility in which they can depend on the complete cooperation of the industry. Prompt action is necessary today, not tomorrow. The industry cannot and should not be expected to carry the burdens of other industries. Unless relief is granted without delay, these much-needed low-cost garments will disappear and the worker will be driven to purchasing much higher priced garments, resulting in widespread hidden price increases: Now be it

"Resolved, That O. P. A. grant immediate price relief to manufacturers on overalls and work shirts; such relief to include all cloth increases and all labor increases granted since March 1942 and now pending."

Dear Mr. O. P. A. Bowles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to state that my constituents in Louisiana are disappointed, disgusted and angry, and demand some consideration in respect to the administration of the O. P. A. program, and are calling upon their Representatives in the Congress to give them some protection.

Mr. Speaker, my district is the largest rice producing district in the United States and notwithstanding my protests on behalf of my constituents, and the protests of the Senators and Representatives from the other rice producing States of Arkansas, Texas, and California. the O. P. A. has promulgated MPR 518, placing a ceiling price on rough rice, which order also includes certain regulations for the regimentation of the rice industry, and we are informed, the O. P. A. proposes to amend the order to further regiment and injure the rough rice producer. While it is true that the order MPR 518 has been issued, the same does not become effective until April 15, 1944, and notwithstanding 16 Senators and Representatives from the rice producing States under date of March 28, 1944 demanded of Mr. Chester Bowles, Administrator of the O. P. A. that this order be abrogated before effective date, and notwithstanding that we pointed out that this order was unnecessary, unfair, ruinous to the industry, and would reduce production, we have heard nothing from Mr. Bowles. Apparently, we shall have to take other means to end this "bureaucracy."

Mr. Speaker, at the request of one of my constituents, I wish to include in the RECORD a copy of an editorial from the Crowley Daily Signal, of Crowley, La., from an issue of recent date, which reflects the feeling of my constituents in regard to this proposed ceiling price on rough rice. The editorial follows:

SOME 15,000 RICE PRODUCERS IGNORED

A splendid example of how the bureaucrats in Washington ignore the average citizen, the common people, and in this particular instance the rice farmer is shown in the set-up concerning the O. P. A. rough rice ceiling prices.

Some 37 rice mills in the United States have not only a millers' advisory committee but they have a former rice miller and the son of an active rice miller now as head of this particular division, the rice section, of the O. P. A. program.

Bruce Hancock, of El Campo, Tex., held the hearing here when the protest was filed against the rough rice ceiling prices. He is the son of R. M. Hancock, El Campo Rice Milling Co., El Campo, Tex. And this same Mr. Hancock is a member of the millers' advisory committee.

Other members of this committee are Louis Miravalle, St. Louis Rice Milling Co.; E. V. Schafer, United Rice Milling Products Co., New Orleans; E. Harvey Steinhagen, Comet Mills, Beaumont, Tex.; C. R. Walton Rice Mill, Stuttgart, Ark.; J. T. White, Jonesboro Rice Milling Co., Jonesboro, Ark.; W. D. Smith, Government chairman Grains Products Branch of Federal Department of Agriculture; Mrs. Pitman, reporter; M. E. Maule, Pfeffer Rice Milling Co., Houston, Tex.; Guy Landry, Republic Mill, Gueydan, La.; Frank A. Godchaux, Jr., Louisiana State Rice Milling Co., Abbeville, La.; Mrs. F. M. Douglas, C. K. Grosgean Rice Milling Co., San Francisco, Calif.; and George W. Brewer, Rice Growers Association of California, Sacramento, Calif.

They represent the rice mills, the milling interest. There are only 37 mills in the United States. But the 15,000 rice growers and producers, those who actually produce the raw product, which makes the rice industry possible, are not represented.

Once, many months ago, a farmers' advisory committee was called into New Orleans. They have vigorously protested the setting of ceiling prices on rough rice. They are still protesting insofar as possible.

But the bureaucrats have now left them without a voice. They have ignored those dirt farmers; they have forgotten the man who produces the product which makes the industry to exist.

It becomes more apparent daily that something better be done about the situation; that the farmers better be given a voice; and that the bureaucrats with all their power better remember that this is a democratic form of government in theory even if not in reality.

Up to now one side of the argument has been heard. Surely no one, even the rice millers favoring the rough rice ceiling price, are not willing for the farmers to have a voice. And don't forget there are about as many rice millers opposed to a ceiling price on rough rice as there are favoring it.

But certainly it is high time that the American rice farmers speak out. It is time the 15,000 or more in Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas have their say. That is their American right and their American privilege. The unions of the Nation would call a strike. The American rice farmer is too loyal and patriotic to talk about not planting the rice, which is needed as food for the war program. But we will predict that unless something is done; unless the farmer is given some consideration; unless he is taken into consideration there will be a lot less rice planted in 1944 than there was planted in 1943.

Yes, the man who produces the raw product that makes the rice industry possible has been completely ignored by this so-called democratic government of ours.

I might add that since this editorial was published, and upon the insistence of the Senators and Representatives from the rice-producing States, an O. P. A. rice growers advisory committee has been appointed. It is very improbable, however, that this committee will be effective because it was appointed after the rough rice price ceiling regulation had been issued. Thus, the gesture is an empty one and comes too late to be of real assistance to the rice producers.

The Late Jared Young Sanders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, those who knew Jared Young Sanders best loved him best.

Upon previous occasions I have reviewed Governor Sander's outstanding political record in the State of Louisiana.

More recently I inserted in the RECORD editorials from the three daily newspapers of New Orleans.

Since the recess of the House an editorial from the Baton Rouge Times has come to my desk. Baton Rouge, La., besides being the State capital, is also the largest city in the congressional district which Governor Sanders represented in this House. The people of Baton Rouge were long associated with J. Y. Sanders, Sr., and the tribute paid his memory in the editorial which follows, is, I believe, one of the finest tributes paid to any public official, living or dead.

Here is what Governor Sanders' own people thought of him as expressed in this editorial from the Baton Rouge (La.) Times:

JARED YOUNG SANDERS

Doughty veteran of many a political battle, Jared Young Sanders, former Governor of Louisiana, has passed from the earthly scenes of strife and triumph, of joy and sorrow. His going was quiet. About him were the devoted members of his family. Near the end of a long and wearisome illness, his once powerful frame was weak, but his fine mind was unclouded. He was fully conscious until the final shadows gathered, in those last few moments when life hovers between the present and the eternal.

Governor Sanders was tired.

He was ever a soldier, ever a fighter for a cause. Courageously, he had fought many months against illness and waning strength. He had kept his banners flying when one less determined and less stout-hearted might have given up. Yet, he was tired, and to the good soldier rest is sweet relief.

Jared Sanders was a man of great strength and force and personality.

From his youth he had played an impressive part in Louisiana affairs. He had stood out among his contemporaries in the State and in the South. He had made his mark in Washington during his brief years of service there. Whether in the Congressional Halls or at some community assembly in his home State, Jared Sanders was a man to whom others listened. He had unusual capacity for leadership.

As most men of dominant personality and vigorous courage, Governor Sanders during the years of his active career had enemies as well as friends in the political arena. There were those who fought him bitterly, time and again. There were others who stood by his side and marched with him, in victory or in defeat—and he had experienced both. Though in later years his personal ambitions had been merged in the concern over public issues, and in the career of his only son who bears his name, he never lost interest in affairs, never quite retired from the background of political action.

Older Baton Rougeans have known Governor Sanders for a long, long time—as legislator, as lieutenant governor, as chief executive of Louisiana, residing in the dignified old mansion on the boulevard. He was the last Governor to use horse-drawn vehicle, and the yellow-wheeled family surrey was a familiar sight along Baton Rouge's unpaved streets. In many ways his administration bridged a transitory period in life and progress. He was, we believe, the first Governor of Louisiana to have an automobile, and he was one of the earliest crusaders for good roads in Louisiana.

There linger many vivid pictures of Governor Sanders in action. When Mississippi River floods occurred near the close of his administration, Governor Sanders, like the born leader and worker he was, got into his boots and khaki and was down on the river front with the local militia and citizenry to help strengthen and patrol the levees protecting Baton Rouge's lower areas.

His was the rare gift of eloquence. It was used not alone for political speech and purpose. One of the most beautiful addresses he ever made was on occasion of the visit here of a Massachusetts official party to dedicate a shaft in memory of sons from that State who had fallen in battle here during the War between the States. Himself the son of a Confederate soldier, he spoke his tribute in deep feeling, and it was of the type of that finer oratory for which the southland is noted.

Most of all, however, the public remembers Jared Sanders in action on the political platform. One can see him now, stalking back and forth, his massive head bent over his sturdy chest, his eyes looking straight into the faces of his audience, and his clear, deep voice reaching the outmost rings, as he drove home some point. He never failed to hold the closest attention of his audience. He was one of the most convincing of speakers. His brilliant intellect and legalistic training bore up his eloquence.

In his public life, Jared Sanders had been highly honored in this State, and he had served with distinction in every high post entrusted to him—in our old statehouse, and at Washington, and as a member of two constitutional conventions, that of 1898 and that of 1921. Also, he had experienced disappointments in his political career. One of the most signal of these occurred during his governorship, when, after the legislature had elected him to fill a Louisiana vacancy in the Senate at Washington, he declined to accept, because of a situation arising which he felt made it his duty to remain at Louisiana. Acceptance would have meant fulfillment of a cherished ambition, which, by reason of later political turns, was never realized.

He had other disappointments. Yet, however blew the political winds, Jared Sanders remained cheerful, and continued to carry on his affairs as usual, and to fight on for the causes he espoused. If many opposed him, few men in our public life have had more personal friends, or friends more loyal. Though he outlived many of them, others younger have been solicitous of him, and kept in touch with him, during the long months of his illness. He himself was friendly and cordial. He has never been too busy, or too concerned over his own affairs, to give the warm handclasp and the hearty greeting. Jared Sanders always had time for even the humblest acquaintance.

Also, however vigorously he might wage political fight, intimate friends knew the warm and tender side to his nature, as revealed in his home, and in his affectionate devotion to his aged mother to the end of her days, and in his thoughtful regard for his sisters. He was kind and generous, and naturally drew others to him. He was a delightful acquaintance and companion.

During these recent days, as his strength has ebbed, Governor Sanders continued to see all his callers. Even when he was too weak to speak, save with the loving members of his family at his bedside, his hand was outstretched on the coverlet to all who came, and one knew he sensed the firm pressure of affection and regard.

In passing, Governor Sanders, as Louisianians have continued to call him, has left his mark upon this State, as a leader of forceful personality who loved this State and its people, as a gifted Louisianian who has carried on bravely, and who has never feared to face the fight. He was beloved by many. In Baton Rouge, in his home community, and all over this State, there are many to mourn his passing.

Farley on Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WESLEY E. DISNEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Tulsa Daily World:

FARLEY ON FREEDOM

High-minded philosophy and genuine patriotism marked the St. Patrick's Day address of James A. Farley at St. Louis. He was not making a political speech, but many of his pungent remarks had poignant application to the present situation in the United States. For instance, he warned that liberty and good government are not lost suddenly but that "political cave-ins occur only when the ground is soft." He plainly saw the erosion in our national life.

Mr. Farley warned strongly against the spread of the habit of untruthfulness in public affairs, not so much a matter of direct falsehood but of suppression, guileful phrasing, and implication. He made an appeal for moral stamina as a necessary ingredient in national welfare and honor.

Thoughtful citizens cannot help applying Mr. Farley's remarks to present-day affairs and tendencies. Everybody knows he is of high caliber intellectually and morally and it is fairly well understood that he has been more shamefully treated than any other man in public life. He does not complain, but he does speak out on principle. In this case, particularly, he was talking straight from the heart and telling people things they should know. His counsels are sane and they should be accepted in a most serious way.

A Fine Tribute to the South

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, those of us who dwell in the deep South are always gratified at any expression of understanding or appreciation from our brothers in the North. The following article recently appeared in the New York Herald Tribune, which I gladly ask permission to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, having taken the same from the Ed-Clip Service which came from the Dillon Herald of March 23, 1944:

A FINE TRIBUTE TO THE SOUTH

The following fine tribute to the vision and loyalty of the South by the New York Herald Tribune, one of the Nation's most outstanding papers, is refreshing:

"The South's viewpoint of world affairs is possibly more enlightened than that of many equal areas in the North. Its population is largely native to the soil, its blood strains are few, and its reaction to the coming of World War No. 2 was instant and never in doubt. Resistance to tyrants came naturally to men of southern upbringing, and willingness to fight for liberty and against aggression has been part of their history since the landing in Jamestown. There are few isolationists among southern statesmen, and they, for the most part, are considered alien to their heritage and are held in considerable disesteem.

"The recent record of the South in world affairs is inspiring. Lend-lease would have been beaten in Congress but for southern votes. When the first year of the first draft expired, 4 months before Pearl Harbor, it was southern Members of Congress who insured its extension. When, by 1 vote, Congress decided not to send all the soldiers home, it was the South that turned the scale. Representatives of 12 Southern States cast 102 votes in favor of extending the draft and only 6 votes against it.

"The farsighted view of affairs across the oceans, illustrated by these statesmanlike steps in time of world crisis, is the more remarkable when it is remembered what might have been the South's natural preoccupation with its growing interest in foreign markets and particularly in export of cotton and tobacco. It is reassuring to find that older parts of the United States, undisturbed by economic changes and the terrific ordeal of civil wars, maintain their patriotism and that it responds instantly to challenge."

In every crisis the South has stood like a Gibraltar for what it conceived to be the soundest and wisest policies. This characteristic may be attributed to the strong strain of Anglo-American blood which has remained undiluted since the days the first pioneers set foot on southern soil.

A comforting thought one gathers from the Herald Tribune's complimentary remarks is that the outside world is beginning to "discover the South." The more outsiders know of it the better they will like it.

Herbert Hoover's Endorsement of Governor Dewey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Drew Pearson recently found in the Washington Merry-Go-Round, disclosing how closely the former President of the United States, Herbert Hoover, is working with Governor Dewey on plans by which Dewey will be drafted at the next Republican National Convention.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND

(By Drew Pearson)

Those who have talked to Herbert Hoover lately, in his skyscraper apartment near the top of the Waldorf-Astoria, New York City, say that he is absolutely confident of achieving his No. 2 life ambition.

His No. 1 life ambition obviously was to become President of the United States. With that behind him, his ambition ever since March 4, 1933, when he left office with the banks closing and the Nation in economic turmoil, has been to achieve a come-back. He has put out of his mind any thought that he personally might step back into the White House. But he is determined that his men and his policies shall get back into power, and that he shall be the elder statesman to help manipulate them behind the scenes.

The men whom he long ago chose to help achieve this No. 2 ambition are Gov. Tom Dewey of New York and Gov. Earl Warren of California.

Those who have talked with the former President say that as early as last September he had begun to work out plans by which Dewey would be drafted at the Republican National Convention, and by which Governor Warren of California would be his running mate.

To that end Hoover began sometime ago laying the ground work to keep the California delegation out of Willkie's hands—no easy job in a State where Willkie has a very large following. But Hoover seems to have done it.

Also, he has quietly corralled the leading backstage monetary figures of the Republican Party and lined them up solid for Dewey. One by one he has seen to it that leading Republicans who didn't know Dewey got a chance to know him, or were otherwise sold on him.

It has been a meticulous, painstaking process. But Hoover's friends say it is just about finished and that he is absolutely confident that shortly before the Chicago convention the stage will be absolutely set with Dewey and Warren as good as in.

Thus will come about the fulfillment of Herbert Hoover's 11-year-old ambition, an ambition he has nursed ever since the tumultuous days when he left the White House in March 1933, went to the Waldorf-Astoria and waited there for Roosevelt to call him in for consultation on how to revamp the country.

Hoover was never called. And he has been waiting, watching, planning in the New York hostelry almost ever since.

Our Allies and Us

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND E. WILLIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Our Allies and Us," from the Columbia City Commercial Mail, of Columbia City, Ind., for April 10, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR ALLIES AND US

Secretary of State Hull in his address to the American people on Sunday asserted that all possible unity of the American people was necessary to the best peace after the war, as well as to the winning of the conflict. To this we must all agree. The Secretary also advised the American people that a special group of members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was to be formed, composed of members of both major political parties and a similar group from the House, who would be kept advised as to the policies and plans of the State Department and the Government in its dealings with our allies, and in fact all foreign nations.

If that plan is sincerely carried out, it will certainly have a wholesome effect upon the formulation of a policy that can secure greatest possible unity of this Nation. American people do not like to be told that the policies and plans about our relations with other nations have been arranged for in secret, without knowledge of the representatives of the people in Congress.

We do realize that details of policy and detailed plans cannot always be publicly announced during the process of negotiation and at times not immediately after the plans have been agreed to by our allies. Military reasons may make public announcement ill-advised. However, the American people do believe that responsible Members of the Congress of both major parties should be informed of all that is going on—and we believe that such a policy will tend to formulate a foreign policy that can continue through the future years, no matter what may be the political complexion of the Congress and the executive department.

This newspaper believes that the American people are convinced that our present allies should assume an attitude of working together after the present war is over to the end that nations cannot again run roughshod over other nations whenever they feel that military strength makes such a course possible in their nefarious ambitions.

South America cannot safely and wisely be allowed to again become the field for Nazi or Fascist influence from Europe or Asia, if the Monroe Doctrine is to mean anything and if South America is to remain free from becoming a stepping stone for possible military attack upon this Nation. The United States cannot be considered a geographical or political island in world affairs. It is now apparent that our Government and people must form some open alliance to keep ambitious and unprincipled nations from aggrandizement toward our Nation or other peaceful nations. It is a realistic problem in the immediate future and a problem which cannot be solved by forcing on any people the way of life the Allies may hold best, nor even by attempting to force upon others the standards of living that appeal to us or to our allies as the most desirable. The only realistic way of looking at the problem is to unite enough strong nations to insure themselves against attack and to assure friendly weaker nations this same freedom.

Office of Price Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in the immediate future, the Congress will be called upon to take action extending the Office of Price Administration and make appropriations for its administrative expenses. This is a matter in which the people of the United States are vitally interested It vitally and directly affects our war effort. Recently, Mr. Chester Bowles, the O. P. A. Administrator, addressed a communication to local rationing boards, asking them to make suggestions about the program. A copy of that letter I attach later. I am sure many of the boards have replied to Mr. Bowles' letter. Some of them have appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The War Price and Rationing Board of Roanoke, Va., through its chairman, Mr. Morris Graff, has written to Mr. Bowles and made very pertinent and thought-provoking suggestions.

I wish to take this opportunity of commending Mr. Bowles very highly for his effort to get an expression from the local boards who, as stated by Mr. Graff, are on the front line in the rationing program. I share the opinion held by many Members of Congress that Mr. Chester Bowles is making a serious and a sincere effort to improve the administration of O. P. A. He has undoubtedly made much progress but there is also vast room for improvement. He will further demonstrate his wise leadership if he will pay heed to logical and sensible suggestions made by those in direct contact with the public in the administration of this program. I think the suggestion made by the Roanoke board that local boards be given much wider latitude and authority and some discretion is most timely and opportune. This would put common sense and sound judgment into operation in many cases that now greatly irritate the public because of a lack of ordinary human feeling and judgment.

I include herewith a letter from Mr. Morris Graff which sets out Mr. Bowles' communication and also the reply sent to Mr. Bowles by the Roanoke board:

WAR PRICE AND RATIONING BOARD,
Roanoke, Va., April 10, 1944.

Congressman CLIFTON A. WOODRUM,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE WOODRUM: On March 27, I received the following letter from Chester Bowles:

"As you probably know, the bill extending O. P. A. authority is coming up soon; also our appropriation bill.

"In preparing our requests to Congress I feel that we should consult the men most on the firing line in contact with the public, our local chairmen, as to what changes, if any, should be made in our plans and operations. I do not want a reply which just says we are doing a fine service to the people unless you sincerely think so. I want a real appraisal of our faults as well as our virtues.

"Is or is not O. P. A. rendering a worthwhile service to the people of your community?

"How could we do a better job?

"Particularly, are there any changes in our powers which you personally would recommend to Congress?

"A completely frank letter will be appreciated."

I thought, perhaps, you would be interested in my reply to Mr. Bowles, and I am, therefore, enclosing a copy of my letter of April 5.

With kindest personal regards.

Very sincerely yours,

MORRIS W. GRAFF,
General Chairman.

WAR PRICE AND RATIONING BOARD,
Roanoke, Va., April 5, 1944.

Mr. CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator, Office of Price Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOWLES: Replying to your letter of March 27.

As I indicated in my letter of March 29, this communication will represent the composite views of the 35 board and panel members of the Roanoke War Price and Rationing Board, 48-123-2.

GREATER AUTONOMY FOR LOCAL BOARDS

a. Boards and panels are composed of men and women who are thoroughly capable of analyzing and executing the rules that are issued from Washington without having to go through district and regional offices. In marginal cases, they should be allowed to use their own judgment instead of always adhering strictly to the cut and dried national regulations. Without hindering the war effort, board and panel members will be as fair as humanly possible. As an illustration, I mention our food panel. It is composed of three of the outstanding women of Roanoke, who, in addition to having years of experience in running their homes, have been active for a great many years in local and State civic affairs. This panel also consists of the sales manager of the largest chain store in Roanoke, who has a background of more than 30 years of experience in marketing foods; an independent retail grocer, who operates an outstanding establishment, and has been conducting this business for 25 years; a wholesale grocer who, for 30 years, has contacted retailers and institutions and is thoroughly familiar with all of their problems; a merchandise broker who, for 35 years, has distributed goods from all sections of America as well as to many foreign countries. I think you will agree that this panel is composed of very, very competent people. The same is true of our entire membership.

These panels should have the authority to handle discrepancies without having to go through the slow process of sending them to the Roanoke district office, then to the Atlanta regional office, and thence to Washington. The answer comes back through the same slow, tedious pattern. Rationing boards originally were conceived of as committees of neighbors and were highly respected as such by the general public. As a matter of fact, the general public still thinks that rationing boards have some authority instead of being more or less powerless in rendering decisions of their own. I urge, therefore, that rationing boards immediately be given wide latitude of authority in the interpretation of O. P. A. regulations.

b. Rationing regulations should be sent directly from Washington to all local war price and rationing boards in language that is understandable. I happen to have several college degrees to my credit and some of my colleagues are also college graduates, but we still believe that the wording of regulations could be simplified still more. Some progress has been made, but there's still room for greater improvement along this line.

c. Rationing boards should be consulted prior to the formulation of national O. P. A. policies. The rationing boards are largely responsible for the successful operation of the plan, and if they had been consulted in advance about policies many of the mistakes of the past could have been avoided.

MORE FUNDS FOR BOARD PERSONNEL

Inasmuch as the rationing boards are on the first line of the rationing program, they should have funds adequate enough to attract and to hold competent employees. This applies largely to the higher executives, as the chief clerks and heads of the various divisions. They are doing work equally as important, if not more so, than in other O. P. A. offices and yet are not receiving salaries commensurate with their talent and experience.

PRINTING OF COUPONS

(a) Gasoline: B coupons should be printed in single strips rather than rolls of 5 coupons wide. Since the B book is limited to 13 coupons in the eastern shortage area, 16 in area A, and 19 in area B, these can be much more easily and quickly handled by clerks using single strips.

Next issuance of A books should be printed in booklets with cardboard covers. If still printed on sheets, the paper so used should be of a more substantial type. The present A books may not last a whole year without coupons becoming detached from the identification portions.

(b) Fuel oil: To avoid a tremendous waste of paper and time, it is recommended that class 3 consumer coupons (forms Nos. 1107, 1108, 1109, and 1110) be printed in single strips instead of the present sheets of 100. Most of the applications for class 3 consumer coupons are only for 10 or 15 coupons which have to be detached from the present sheet of 100 coupons and the rest of the paper, being a serially numbered coupon, simply becomes waste.

PUBLICITY

1. Premature releases.

(a) Gasoline: Harmonization of information given to local boards and to the press. This will probably require the cooperation of other Government agencies. A case in point is a request from the gasoline division of the Roanoke District Office dated February 16, 1944:

"The gasoline and fuel-oil supply is at a dangerously low point, and we are threatened with a cut in value of coupons in the near future.

"Local boards have been instructed that they cannot restore this cut, if and when it comes, unless authorized by the district director."

And yet a few days after the issuance of the above letter from the Roanoke district office, the newspapers of the country came out with the story that the supply of gasoline may be increased throughout the Nation. This latter publicity came at the very time the transportation panel had received its instructions from the Roanoke district office. I need not tell you of the confusion that has existed there from the utter conflict of news releases.

b. Point charts. It is suggested that O. P. A. point charts be distributed to retail merchants at least by the time the information on the chart is released to the press. What has happened every month since rationing started is that the press publishes the point changes 3 to 4 days prior to the effective date of the change, and 3 to 4 days prior to the merchant's receiving a copy of the chart. In other words, the public knows more about the ration values than the food merchant who is supposed to be familiar with this problem. It is suggested that point charts be distributed directly from the regional offices to the grocers instead of being sent, as at present, from the printing center in New York.

PRICE CONTROL

(a) Check and control restyling and repackaging which attempts to circumvent price ceilings, also check and control new business enterprises and new manufacturing establishments not having any previous basis for price classifications.

(b) More items should be placed on a community dollar and cent basis. Prices so established are easier both for the merchant and the consumer to understand. If the public is able to know readily the specific ceiling price on the commodities, our consumers will become more price conscious. On the other hand, items priced by a markup have no meaning to customers who do not take into consideration varied costs and retail practices and think, "How can I know the ceilings of prices vary from store to store?" Overcharges are more easily detected when items are on a specific dollar and cent basis. Also, community dollar and cent prices are a great help and timesaver for the merchant who is burdened with added responsibilities and insufficient help. More and more fresh foods should be placed on community prices, as each locality has its particular markets which afford a large source of supply.

c. Retailers, especially grocers, would like possession of wholesale ceilings. Knowing wholesale ceilings, the retailers will not pay prices too high.

d. Concentration should be centered upon the prices of items most likely to be scarce, but which are important to consumers and merchants. So often such items are not available at ceiling prices, and therefore black markets arise, and largely because the public needs the commodities and illegal prices are paid in order to obtain them. Such has been the situation with onions in Roanoke.

ABOLITION OF CERTAIN ITEMS

(a) Small children's shoes. Inasmuch as there is no proof required each time need is established, small children's shoes should be removed from the rationing list, thereby effecting a considerable saving of time to the board, to the parents, and to shoe merchants.

(b) Removal of all food items from rationing list except meats, canned fruits, butter, and cheese.

NO RETURN OF THE BAN ON PLEASURE DRIVING

If necessary, cut the allowance to the bone, but if an A holder is given any gasoline at all, he should be permitted to use it as he sees fit.

ENFORCEMENT OF O. P. A. REGULATIONS

Here I would like to quote directly from the letter submitted by the chairman of our hearing panel: "The enforcement officers should use a little common sense in their prosecutions and other attempts to enforce the law. Some of the trouble results from the fact that a 2-by-4 clerk is given more authority than he ever had in his life and it goes to his head. I am confident that the enforcement officers fail to distinguish between an unintentional violation of a ceiling price, for example, and a deliberate failure to comply with the law. Apparently those in charge attempt to mete out the same punishment to the innocent violator and the one who willfully intends to violate the law. The enforcement officers have been entirely too quick to ask for an injunction and allege that the violation was willful and the defendant will not comply with the law unless an injunction is used. Newspaper publicity inevitably results to the detriment of the party who may have been guilty of an unintentional violation."

All of us are definitely of the opinion that O. P. A. is rendering worth-while service to the population. We are convinced that some form of rationing and price control is not only desirable but is also necessary in times such as these. We likewise believe that you, Mr. Bowles, are doing a far better job than either Mr. Henderson or Mr. Brown. We realize that yours is the task of putting into good order "a house built on a bad foundation and with a leaking roof."

In acknowledging this letter of mine, please do not merely reply, "Thanks for your nice, helpful letter." My file is cluttered with similar acknowledgements from your predecessors. I know you are extremely busy, and this also is a long letter, but my colleagues and I are also busy people and yet we took the time and patience to think out loud with you. There's no need of acknowledging this letter at your earliest convenience, but whenever you do come around to it, I would appreciate it if you would give me your reactions to the above ad seriatum.

Yours very sincerely,

MORRIS W. GRAFF,
General Chairman.

Mr. Ickes Urges Persian Gulf Oil Reserves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE F. LEA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 29, 1944

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to consent granted by the House, I place in the RECORD an article appearing in the Oil Weekly of March 11, 1944, entitled "Persian Gulf Oil Furnishes Good Backlog for United States Reserves," by Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior and Petroleum Administrator for War, and president of Petroleum Reserves Corporation.

This article is interesting as reflecting the viewpoint of Mr. Ickes and his purposes in connection with the activities of the Petroleum Reserves Corporation.

This subject is now under consideration by the Petroleum Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

When the Oil Weekly asked me for a brief statement on foreign oil, my ability to say "yes" gave me a sense of relief that can be understood only against the background of the necessary secrecy under which I have had to operate over the last months. During these months, many and varied rumors have budded and been frostbitten. "The Government was taking over the oil business." Or, "the Government was selling out to the oil industry." Or, maybe it was a mixture of the two. Speculation ran wilder than "scuttlebutt" in the Navy. And yet there was nothing that I could do but sit quietly and hold my peace. The negotiations that were in progress could never have been consummated otherwise.

Now that the negotiations have been concluded, I can speak. And, now that this is the case, I want to say at the beginning that I speak with the pride of one who feels that he has had a part in doing a praiseworthy job and not in any sense with the embarrassment of one who feels that he must defend a blunder or a sin. So, I am glad to discuss this foreign oil matter and specifically the Petroleum Reserves Corporation. In so doing, I propose to be factual and realistic, leaving emotionalism to others.

In considering Petroleum Reserves Corporation and its activities, one must first regard our domestic oil position, because if we knew that we had beneath the surface of our own soil, all the oil that we ever could possibly need, there would be no point whatever in concerning ourselves with oil across the seas. But we have no such comforting assurance. In a nutshell, our domestic oil position is this:

The most generally accepted estimate of our known domestic crude-oil reserves is about 20,000,000,000 barrels. At the present rate of consumption, that is something less than 14 years' supply—if we could get it all out of the ground within that time, which we could not. This situation would not be disturbing if we were discovering new oil in volumes sufficient to offset our present production, but we are not doing so. Since 1938, our discoveries of new oil—not including extensions and revisions of previously discovered fields—have been very substantially less than our production. Every oilman knows this. In other words, our crude-oil bank account is diminishing every year, and this is true whether our known reserves are 20,000,000,000 barrels, as most people say, or 30,000,000,000 barrels, as some people think, or 50,000,000,000, as few people hope.

Right today we know that we are able to fuel and lubricate our great and growing military and naval machine only by imposing upon the public a degree of rationing which causes not only inconvenience but actual hardship and economic distress. This is true with reserves of at least 20,000,000,000 barrels. Now, if we continue to produce oil faster than we discover it, it is perfectly obvious that our reserves are going to be a great deal smaller if another war comes, in 15, 20, or 25 years. Yet, isn't it perfectly obvious that the oil demands in this next war—if it comes—are going to dwarf those of World War No. 2, just as present demands have made insignificant those of World War No. 1? Of course, we hope that there will not be another war, but we have learned from sad experience that we just can't afford not to be ready if one should come.

To me, all this means that we had better start right now to give some heed to our crude-oil future. We must assure ourselves of an oil supply, not only be developing our domestic resources, which we hope may prove fruitful, but by assuring ourselves some rights in sources beyond the sea, which we know to be fruitful.

PERSIAN GULF SITUATION

These considerations constitute the background for Petroleum Reserve Corporation's activities. The specific situation which led to its creation was that in the Persian Gulf region, particularly in Saudi Arabia, where the oil fields are held jointly by Standard Oil Co. of California and the Texas Co.; and in Kuwait, where Gulf Oil Corporation and Anglo-Iranian each have 50 percent interest in a British corporation holding the concession.

The Kuwait fields, with proved and indicated reserves of about 9,000,000,000 barrels, are now shut in. The Saudi Arabian fields, with four to five billion barrels of proved and indicated reserves, are now producing about 35,000 barrels a day. By contrast, there is now a net daily withdrawal of about 275,000 barrels daily from the British-owned fields of Iran, and about 90,000 barrels daily from the fields of Iraq, 95 percent of which are owned, 23.75 percent each, by Anglo-Iranian, the Royal Dutch Shell group, a French group, and the Near East Development Corporation, which is owned by Jersey Standard and Socony-Vacuum.

Standard of California, Texas, and Gulf have experienced serious problems, including inadequacy of transportation and refining facilities, and have had to draw upon their resources in order to pay royalties and expenses. Their production has not been sufficient to offset their costs. On the other hand, the British-controlled companies or groups have had active support by the British Government. We in government discussed the situation early last year with the presidents of the California and the Texas companies and determined after a thorough study of the situation, that assistance should be given to the companies in the interest of the United States.

Petroleum Reserve Corporation has undertaken only one project so far, the construction of the 1,200-mile pipe line from Saudi Arabia and Kuwait to the eastern end of the Mediterranean, one consideration for which is that the companies will set aside 1,000,000,000 barrels of oil for the military services of the United States. I say without hesitation that I consider the agreement effected by Petroleum Reserve Corporation with California, Texas, and Gulf to be one which cannot be challenged from the point of view of financial soundness.

Building of the pipe line will cost between $130,000,000 and $165,000,000, all of which will be repaid to the Government by the companies within 25 years—with interest and a net profit—after which the Government will still own the pipe line. This repayment will be guaranteed by the companies. The companies agree to maintain the billion-barrel reserve for the military services of the United States, making the oil available whenever requested at 25 percent below the market price, either at the Persian Gulf or in the United States, whichever is the lower.

EMERGENCY RESERVES

The companies agree not to sell any crude or products to any government or person whom the State Department disapproves. In brief, the Government is assured of substantial oil reserves against a future emergency; the companies are given greater financial and operational security; and both sides will benefit financially.

During the negotiations, when secrecy was of prime importance, one of the favorite rumors was that the Government was sneaking into the oil business. I feel certain that, now that the agreement in principle has been made public, no fair-minded man will continue to make such a charge. I have no wish to put the Government into the oil business. The furnishing of a facility, without which the companies cannot get out their oil, is not putting the Government into the oil business. The building of another facility—the Panama Canal—did not put the United States into the transportation business, and no one has ever been so foolish as to assert that it did.

I do not know of any responsible Government official who does. I have the greatest admiration for the American private oil industry, and for the foresight and daring which has characterized its operations abroad. I say without mental reservation that, wherever private industry can retain and expand its holdings and business, I have no thought of suggesting that the Government offer its aid. But I know, and leaders of the oil industry know, that there are now and will hereafter be situations in which they will need both encouragement and assistance from their Government—at least until such time as there is some kind of a world agreement which will promote the security of peace-loving nations.

As for the possible competition of Persian Gulf oil with domestic crude, I see no reason to believe that oil from those foreign fields will be brought into the United States within the near future. But when the time comes that our domestic crude is no longer sufficient—whether that be in 15 years, or 25 years—I believe that it will be comforting to know that we have an available supply elsewhere. Then the oil industry itself will be the first to advocate a policy of supplying our own people with the oil that they must have, even if it comes from abroad.

Office of War Information

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Phelps Adams, from the New York Sun of April 10, 1944:

O. W. I. GOES ROUND AND ROUND, COMES OUT HERE

(By Phelps Adams)

This is a simple little story about an editor who was so innocent and so naive as to suppose that an American taxpayer has a perfect right to read the propaganda he is paying the O. W. I. to produce. This editor, while glancing casually through the pages of a British newspaper, noticed an advertisement which read:

"Produced by the United States Office of War Information.

"A handbook of the United States of America.

"This is a book written to promote a clear understanding of America. The Office of War Information has compiled this handbook in the hope that it will be of value to the British public."

The editor, remember, was very innocent, and it was one of those days when he thought that he really needed a clear understanding of America. So he wired down to his Washington bureau a simple and forthright request for a copy of the document.

That was last Thursday.

MR. PLUMMER IS AWAY

The Washington bureau called the O. W. I. news desk and asked for Mr. Plummer. Mr. Plummer, the news desk regretted, was away for the day, but an obliging young lady on duty there was sure that Mr. Pinkus would be the very man to talk to about it.

Mr. Pinkus' line was busy for the next 10 minutes. When he was free, he informed the W. B. (Washington bureau) that a Mr. Kenworthy would be happy to oblige the I. E. (innocent editor).

Mr. Kenworthy knew all about the book right away. It was, he said, nothing more nor less than a reprint of the United States Government Manual.

Now, the Government Manual, you should know, is an extremely dull and uninteresting reference document which merely lists the personnel of the myriad governmental agencies, describes briefly the functions and authority of each, and traces the alphabetical transmigrations of the soul which each has undergone since it was first created under some other authority to perform some other duty. It could not, by the wildest stretch of the imagination, give "a clear understanding of America" to anyone, and not even the O. W. I. could cherish "the hope that it will be of value to the British public."

BUREAU RIGHT AFTER ALL

So the W. B. insisted that Mr. Kenworthy must be thinking of the wrong book. Mr. Kenworthy, with growing vigor, insisted that he was not. Twenty minutes later, Mr. Kenworthy agreed to dig up a copy of the document in question to prove his point. He was sure he had a copy lying about somewhere, and would call the W. B. back again as soon as he found it.

Two hours later, in the absence of the promised call, the W. B. phoned Mr. Kenworthy. He was apologetic. The W. B. had been right. The book advertised in the British newspapers was not the Government manual after all. It was a volume entitled "A Handbook of the United States of America," which had been prepared by the O. W. I. Overseas Division, purely for the benefit and delectation of its own staff abroad. The British Government had been much impressed by it, and His Majesty's Stationer's Office had decided to reprint it at British expense and offer it for sale to all and sundry. The British version, Mr. Kenworthy declared, was an exact copy of the original American publication.

"Fine," said the W. B. "Now, can we buy a copy?"

No; unfortunately, only one copy of the British version had arrived in the United States and that had been forwarded to the O. W. I. offices in New York; and, even more unfortunately, the American version, presumably identical in text, was "restricted."

"Restricted?" echoed the W. B., a little groggy, but still in there swinging.

RESTRICTED CLIENTELE

Yes, restricted. Mr. Kenworthy explained that Congress had raised as much you-know-what about O. W. I. propaganda that everything put out for foreign consumption is restricted, so that it cannot contaminate prospective American voters. A restricted document cannot be distributed in the United States of America, or to American civilians, or servicemen abroad. Neither in mufti nor in uniform can the American taxpayer see this propaganda. He merely is privileged to pay for it.

When the W. B. patiently pointed out that the identical text was being sold in London to any one flush enough to pay ten and sixpence for it, irrespective of the nationality or present condition of servitude of the prospective purchaser, Mr. Kenworthy relented to the extent of agreeing to permit the I. E. to come to the O. W. I. library in Washington and read the document there.

The handbook, as he described it, is a volume of 177 pages. Each page is approximately 12 x 14 inches, and carries 2 columns of very fine type. This suggestion seemed impractical, even to Mr. Kenworthy, when he thought about it, and after trying to switch the W. B. over to someone else, who also proved to be away for the day, he suggested finally that the I. E. himself might contact the New York office of the O. W. I., where they would certainly arrange to let him see a copy, or might even lend him one. He thought Sam Williamson, in New York, would be the man to see.

REPORT OF PROGRESS

So a complete progress report was telegraphed back to New York by the W. B., and the I. E., realizing that the job ahead was no sinecure, assigned his most energetic and persistent reporter to the task of contacting Mr. Williamson.

Before the E. & P. R. could begin, however, a Mr. Bourne, of the Washington O. W. I., phoned the W. B. to find out for himself what was the matter. The story was told to him in detail. He was sincerely apologetic and obviously wished to be helpful. The I. E. was known to him personally, it appeared, and well and favorably, too. He would call Mr. Williamson on the long distance phone at once and he would have Mr. Williamson call the I. E. himself and arrange to send him a copy of the handbook on loan, but Mr. Williamson did not call. The E. & P. R., however, did, at 3:30 p. m.

Mr. Williamson was in conference but would be through in half an hour. At 4 o'clock he was still in conference. At 4:30 he was in a different conference. A secretary promised that he would call. Apparently he did, about 6 o'clock, after even the E. & P. R. had left the deserted office and gone home.

MAN OF MANY CONFERENCES

Friday morning at 9 o'clock Mr. Williamson had not arrived. At 9:30 he was at a meeting. His secretary said he would call. No call. At 11:30 he was reported in conference but would be through by noon. At noon, still in conference; be through at 12:30. At 12:30 he was not available.

That man, complained the E. & P. R. to the feminine voice at the other end of the wire, "has been in conference steadily now for 24 hours, as nearly as I can judge."

"Wait a minute," said the F. V. "Perhaps I can get him," and she did, miraculously, and immediately.

Mr. Williamson explained that he had turned the matter over to a Miss Helene Feller, in charge of the New York Overseas Branch, and that she doubtless had got in touch with the I. E. Miss Feller, sad to relate, had got in touch with nobody. Mr. Williamson, it appeared, moreover, was thinking of the wrong handbook. He had in mind a confidential document full of secret data on German-occupied countries, and when apprised of his error, he said:

"I wish you had called me before." Honest and true; so help us, and no foolin'—that's exactly what he said!

SECRETARY LIKES LUNCH

But he didn't make with the handbook. He just said to call Miss Feller.

Miss Feller, it developed, would not be in today. Her secretary had gone out to lunch but would be back. That was at 12:40. At 1:45 the E. & P. R. called again. The secretary was still out to lunch. At 2:15 the secretary called the E. & P. R. She knew all about it, except that she, too, was thinking of the wrong handbook. However, it would all be straightened out in half an hour, she said, with a reassuring smile in her voice.

At 2:55 o'clock a Miss Parker of the O. W. I. phoned to say that there was only one copy of the handbook in the United States, but the I. E. was welcome to read it if he cared to come up to the O. W. I. offices for a week or two. She referred, apparently, to the British edition, and had completely overlooked the American version, of which heaven only knows how many copies were printed.

On Friday evening, the W. B. found itself by accident at a small informal dinner, at which the guest of honor was a Mr. Barrett, of the Overseas Branch of the O. W. I. By making light conversation and putting the guest wholly at his ease, the W. B. gave him a play-by-play count of entire incident.

DEEPLY DISTRESSED

Mr. Barrett was shocked. He said he would personally see to it that a copy of the handbook reached the I. E. on Saturday or bust. On Monday morning, however, no handbook had been received, and a galloping poll of the charwomen at the O. W. I. offices revealed that none of them had seen Mr. Barrett hanging about the walls and ceilings of the marbled corridors.

Investigation revealed that Mr. Barrett had put the matter in the capable hands of Mr. Bourne, who, in turn, had called Mr. Williamson, who had told him that everything had been taken care of. Mr. Bourne then called the W. B. to pass this information along, but he selected an unfortunate hour on Saturday afternoon when W. B. was playing golf, which was certainly no fault of Mr. Bourne.

Faithful to the last, however, he called the W. B. at 10 o'clock this morning to report that Mr. Williamson had arranged everything. The W. B. then told him exactly what Mr. Williamson had arranged and how.

Mr. Bourne was deeply distressed. We mean he really was. He would do something about it. He even offered to lend the W. B. his own copy. At 11:09 he called back to report that Tom Carroll, of the New York office, would see that the innocent editor received a copy of the handbook (American version) immediately.

He said he honestly would.

Post-War Business Plans for Soldiers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, scarcely a day now passes during which I fail to receive one or more letters from soldiers or sailors overseas, and in this country, wherein these men ask what provisions are being contemplated by the Congress to enable them to enter business on their own individual accounts after the war. I assume that I am not alone in receiving letters of this type.

The thing which strikes me so favorably in the majority of these letters is the desire of the senders to stand on their own feet and be able to become businessmen themselves in a number of the fields for which their wartime or prior training has prepared them.

These are not, in many cases, letters from men who are humbly pleading for jobs. Instead they are from men who say, "We are competent and able to take our places in our home towns as citizens capable of running our own individual businesses."

I recently received a letter from Sicily from a private who said that he had enough money saved up to start his own business, but who feared that credit sources might not be readily available to him for installment purchases and at reasonable rates of interest in case he was able to find the type of business suited to his talents.

It would, indeed, be a tragedy if these men should return in high spirits, full of faith in their own abilities and confident that ther own communities would receive them with open arms, welcoming them as fellow businessmen, only to quickly find out that normal credit channels were not open to them for reasons beyond their ken. The House Small Business Committee is now giving serious consideration to the possibility that such a condition might exist and is preparing certain legislative recommendations designed to forestall such possibility. I am hopeful that I may be able to report to you more fully in this connection shortly.

The following is the letter from the private in Sicily, above referred to:

SOMEWHERE IN SICILY,
March 27, 1944.

Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN,
Chairman of the Small Business Committee,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Not long ago an article appeared in the Stars and Stripes written by Maj. Edward C. Madden, in which he stated possibilities of the returning soldier to step out of military life into the small-business enterprise which he had been planning during the years of service. Most of us here would welcome information relative to the post-war plans discussed by the Small Business Committee.

My post-war plans concern a small business which I hope to establish after the war. I am capable of raising enough capital to finance the start of the business, but would like a means of paying on the instalment basis so as to counteract expenses that will be a burden to my budget.

My unit approaches its twenty-third month of overseas duty, and it is only natural that we should start now to plan for the day when we will resume our civilian life. It is then my suggestion that some plan be formed to give the returning businessman a chance to get on his feet again. Rather than have the returning soldier borrow from profiteering finance companies, why not constitute some sort of a Government loan for these men? In this way we will not feel that the power of debt is hovering over us.

Sincerely yours,

Pvt. FRANK DEWITT MCLOUTH,
A. S. N. 13057778, Headquarters and Headquarters Sq., Three Hundred and Twenty-second Service Group, A. P. O. 650, in care of Postmaster, New York, N. Y.

New England Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Traveler of April 1, 1944:

NEW ENGLAND UNITY

That New England Senators and Representatives at Washington should stand together on matters affecting this region is one of the planks in the Boston Traveler's platform as set forth at the head of this column.

Without sacrificing party principles, we believe it is possible for our Members in Congress to work together in the interests of New England.

An example of commendable teamwork was in connection with the recent hearings before the Civil Aeronautics Board on the expansion of air-line service to Boston and New England.

All of New England's Senators and Representatives went on record before the Board favoring adequate air-line service for Boston and New England. They also pointed to this area's excellent position in regard to transoceanic routes. They recommended additional certificates for more air-line operations.

That's the kind of action the Traveler's platform advocates—New England unity at Washington.

The weight of a solid New England congressional representation behind regional requirements is bound to produce results.

New England's Members of Congress have demonstrated that they can be above party politics when this region's welfare needs a lift. We urge them to keep alive this spirit of unity, for which they are to be complimented.

Missouri's Soldier-Vote Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to say that the Missouri Legislature at a special session which ended Saturday appears to have passed laws that will indicate special efforts will be made to see that those in the armed forces from our State have a right to vote. While I have not seen the law, nevertheless, comments in the St. Louis newspapers clearly indicate the one thought in mind of members of our legislature was the same as I expressed upon the floor of the House many times—the elimination of red tape.

According to the papers, the law does not require any particular form to be used in applying for a ballot nor does it require that it be certified by a notary public or an Army or Navy officer. Applications can be made by postal card, letter, cable, radio, or wire, and beyond that, it also provides that relatives may apply in behalf of the absentees and 79 days are allowed to transmit the ballot and its return. This is certainly simplifying the procedure, and I want to publicly congratulate the members of the Missouri State Legislature for this outstanding public service. If the synopsis of the law that has been printed in the paper is correct, I cannot conceive that any State in the Union will be more liberal than has the State of Missouri.

Under the permission granted me, I include as part of my remarks excerpts from editorials published in St. Louis papers. They follow:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

A USEFUL SESSION

Legislation enacted by the Missouri Legislature at the special session which ended Saturday goes far toward making it easy for citizens of this State in the armed services, wherever they may be, to vote in this year's elections. The legislature deserves praise for the prompt and thorough job it has done in protecting the voting rights of those who are fighting for their country, as well as in passing a number of other measures of great public importance.

One of the good features of the soldier vote legislation is that red tape is minimized. It no longer is necessary that the absent voter's application for a ballot be made on a particular form, or that it be certified by a notary public or authorized Army or Navy officer. The application will be recognized however it may come—by postal card, letter, cablegram, radiogram or through a relative. This is as it should be, for the scrutiny of the election officials who do the counting is a sufficient safeguard against fraud, under the circumstances.

The new laws authorize the sending out of ballots long enough in advance of election dates to enable their return from almost any point in the world in time to be counted on the day after election day. For the primary, the ballots may be sent out 79 days before the last day for return, and in the case of the general election, the time will be 69 days.

One benefit of this excellent State legislation is that absent voters in the military services will be able to cast ballots for State and local candidates, as well as for President. This advantage was not possible in any form of Federal soldier voting law.

[From the St. Louis Star-Times]

PRODUCTIVE SESSION

The special legislative session overcame the temptation to play politics in an election year and enacted with commendable speed the program presented by Governor Donnell. * * *

The soldier vote law sweeps aside red tape in an effort to facilitate a maximum vote by Missouri's servicemen in this country and overseas. They may obtain State ballots by a simple postal card application. Affidavits and requests for official application blanks are not required. Moreover, relatives may apply in behalf of the absentees, and a liberal 79 days are allowed for transmittal and return.

If this machinery should be inadequate, soldiers and sailors can still avail themselves of the simplified ballot under the measure which recently became law without the President's signature. Missouri has set an example for other States in acting promptly and effectively to insure a maximum service vote.

Feed Will Remain Essential

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial, which appeared in the April 8 issue of Feedstuffs, national publication of the feed-supply industry, is well worth the attention of every Member of Congress:

FEED WILL REMAIN ESSENTIAL

A feed manufacturer beset (as who isn't) with labor shortages sends us his pungently expressed comments on the recently publicized proposals to draft men who have been classified IV-F and place them in war plants. He makes particular reference to legislation introduced in the House of Representatives by the Honorable CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, of Connecticut, which would authorize such a development, calling it "crackpot legislation" and "one of the damnedest bills ever introduced in Congress thus far." "Take the IV-F's off the farms and out of the food and feed plants, and we will have starvation next winter," he predicts.

INDUSTRY'S POSITION MUST BE PROTECTED IN DEEPENING LABOR CRISIS

We are practical or cynical enough to believe that it is highly improbable that any such legislation will be adopted or even considered seriously in an election year. The threat to the Nation's welfare would have to be more frightening than it has been so far before any action so drastic would be taken. At the same time, it is evident that the country's manpower situation is going to be increasingly difficult from the standpoint of industry at least. The conflicting information concerning future selective-service policies is extremely confusing to employers, and to employees within the draft age, but it simply reflects the confusion that exists even among those who must set the policies. When those who must decide the course apparently cannot see clearly how extensive the strictly military needs are going to be, industry certainly cannot make its plans very far ahead. The only thing that one can be sure of is that help is going to be scarce and maintenance of production difficult even in those industries called essential.

There will be few if any physically fit young men left in the feed industry, the outlook indicates, for the combat-fit youngsters are being taken by the armed services in a steady flow even from munitions factories, steel plants, coal mines, and other indisputably critical fields. In all lines of work, more and more dependence is going to have to be placed on men above the draft age, on 4-F's and on women. And, if 4-F's are taken to fill the manpower requirements of essential industry, then the definition of the word "essential" in this application will become of the highest importance.

So far in this war, the feed industry has been recognized as essential, and in general this classification has been extremely helpful in maintaining production and distribution of feeds. If any sort of national-service legislation ever should be adopted, it is unthinkable that the feed industry would lose its rating. Its labor requirements would have to be considered and filled from the national pool or the supply of food would suffer. Yet we know from experience that it is a mistake to become overconfident on such an assumption, or the other so-called essential industries will have their share of the labor supply and that of the feed industry, too. It is right that feed men should be disturbed and that they should anticipate and forestall any development in labor policies or legislation that would handicap them unduly in relation to other, and no more necessary, lines of business. Even at best, the manpower problem will approach a deepening crisis in the next year. The feed and food industries will have no choice but to make the best of the situation that will face everyone, and that situation is going to be difficult; but the thing that should be guarded against is any real or apparent effort to remove feed manufacture and distribution from the category of an essential industry, or to reduce its rating so far below other types of manufacturing that its output would be substantially affected. Food production must be maintained at the highest possible level, and this cannot be done unless feed supplies are ample and available where and when they are most needed.

The Mother of My Son

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, the current issue of the Saturday Evening Post carried a little poem written by one of my constituents, Brooks Wilson, of Spartanburg, S. C., expressing a very beautiful sentiment.

Under unanimous consent, I include the poem entitled "The Mother of My Son" in the RECORD:

THE MOTHER OF MY SON

(By Brooks Wilson)

Missing in action over Germany—
A tall and slender pilot, eyes as blue
As Carolina skies in spring, his hair
As golden as ripe wheat, fresh-washed in dew.

How can I bear this hurt, remembering
Last Easter, when his silver bars were new,
His youthful tenor soaring as he sang,
"Forgive them, for they know not what they do"?

Missing in action—my young son—yet I Must hold my tears. I dare not let them fall
Before his mother, sitting calm, strong-willed,
So lonely in our pew, no tears at all.

This Is the American Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Frank A. Hecht and an editorial from the April 1944 issue of Sea Power:

CHICAGO, ILL., April 10, 1944.

Hon. RALPH E. CHURCH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR RALPH: It gives me great pleasure to send you herewith a copy of a splendid editorial by Sheldon Clark, president of the Navy League of the United States.

Knowing your great and patriotic interest in our Navy, I thought you would particularly appreciate Sheldon's sentiments.

Cordially yours,

FRANK.

THIS IS THE AMERICAN WAY—TWICE THE UNITED STATES HAS PAID A FEARFUL PRICE FOR THE NEGLECT OF ITS NAVY. WHEN PEACE COMES AGAIN WILL WE REMEMBER THE BITTER LESSONS WE ARE NOW LEARNING?

Strangely enough, our present brilliant victories in the Pacific place us in awful danger. They open the possibility that we may forget that these great victories are built on 2 years of bitter humiliation.

Today we cheer for Admiral Nimitz's brave men. Two years ago we wept for the brave men of Bataan.

Today our superbattleships are shooting Japanese planes out of the skies like clay pigeons. Two years ago Japanese planes smashed our ships at Pearl Harbor and sank two of Britain's greatest battle craft as if they were sitting ducks.

Today our naval guns bombard Japanese islands. Two years ago Japan was wrestling those Pacific islands from us.

These facts are not recited here to show how well we have raised ourselves from under dog to top dog. They are recited to recall the dismal fact that once we were the under dog and to drive home the simple truth that it was not ever necessary for us to be so.

HARVEST OF DEATH

Those 2 years, their pain, their outpouring of blood and treasure, their humiliation, were the harvest that we reaped for our blind belief in the good faith of our inevitable foes. They were the price we paid for remaining unprepared in a world which still settles its problems, in the last analysis, by the sword.

Every American, every civilized man, now holds the devout hope that after the carnage of this war there will be no wars, that man has reached the level of civilization where nations, like individuals, can solve their problems, settle their differences, under a code of law and justice. But there is no sign in the skies, there is no guaranty upon earth that the close of hostilities will usher in such a millennium.

TWICE-TOLD TALE

For more than 40 years, since 1902, the Navy League of the United States has been a Cassandra, has cried its alarms in a wilderness of optimism, has warned that the United States must prepare for an evil day. Twice that evil day of war has come and twice America has been woefully unprepared, has paid for that unpreparedness with the waste of its resources and the unreplaceable blood of gallant young men.

At this moment we are paying in acute and Nation-wide dislocations. We are working long hours. We are paying staggering bills in money. We are stunting the personal careers of our sons as we call them into uniform and send them off to battle, and we are blasting progressive plans, long and hopefully nurtured.

These forms of payment are not always final, but the young lives with which we bought the time in which to make ready can never be replaced.

Americans pride themselves on being hardheaded and realistic. Are we?

PROFIT FROM THE PAST

If so, now is the t ne for those of us who are able to profit from past experience, for those of us who are truly realistic, to make our plans for the future. These plans are not the task of a few leaders. The Roosevelts, Churchills, Stalins, Chiang Kai-sheks, Edens, Molotoffs, and Hulls of this world are undoubtedly men of great courage, foresight, and ability, but it is not the American way to believe in leaders. The true American way, the way of our forefathers, of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, is the employment of the matured judgments of an enlightened people in making their own decisions—governing their own fate. Any other way can lead only to tyranny and destruction.

THERE IS A WAY

The Navy League of the United States, with no political or economic ax to grind, with no special interest to serve, offers one rallying point for enlightened citizens who wish to preserve this Nation. It is one instrument which those Americans who have learned the bitter lessons of recent history can employ to guarantee the Nation's safety in the future. The Navy League has a program that deserves support. The voice of that program is Sea Power magazine.

If you see in Sea Power merely an interesting and authoritative magazine of information about the United States Navy, you see the surface only; for the constant editorial purpose of this official publication of the Navy League is to proclaim the Navy as an essential protector of the Nation in peace no less than in war.

In time of war a powerful Navy is the shield of defense and the spearhead of our offensive strength. In peacetime it is the symbol of our might and power, the proof that our peace cannot be challenged with impunity. It is the guaranty to ourselves, and the warning to aggressors that we not only can defend ourselves but that we can strike back with massive blows wherever they may choose to attack us. And the Navy League has but one program, one goal, one plan—the maintenance of a strong Navy and its necessary support, an adequate merchant marine.

For this reason, you, as a free American, should support the Navy League by every means in your power—not for its past, not because of the dangers of the present, but because the future will surely come, and its safety can be assured only by plans made now.

With the grace of God and the unwavering courage of our fighting men, we will surely win this war, yet we cannot prevent another except by our own efforts. But individual effort, one man who stands alone, is not enough; men of good intention must band together. You can help to do your part by supporting the Navy League.

SHELDON CLARK,
President, Navy League of the United States.

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following radio address delivered by me over Station WNBF on April 8, 1944:

Dear friends of the Triple Cities and my congressional district, there are 18,000 patriotic men and women in our locality who depend upon their skill in making shoes for a living. They depend upon the Endicott Johnson Corporation to keep getting those big orders they've been turning out for half a century.

But the big orders won't be filled and the Endicott Johnson workers can't keep busy unless the administration suddenly wakes up. The whole shoe industry is crying for hides.

In order to see things first hand and get a better understanding of the Triple Cities' largest industry, I took it upon myself last summer to make a detailed inspection tour of the Endicott Johnson factories and tanneries. The complaint I heard most from everybody I talked with was the lack of hides.

"Why doesn't the Government wake up? They won't give us enough hides to turn out the most necessary military and civilian quotas of shoes we must meet."

In my opinion, Endicott Johnson workers ought to be making several times the shoes they are now turning out. The fault is not theirs. They are doing a magnificent job with the limited amount of leather they are receiving.

The blame is squarely on the shoulders of the crackpot bureaucrats who have been employed to regulate everything and everybody. If Endicott Johnson were allowed to go full steam ahead, not one American soldier, not one civilian will lack shoes next winter.

As the matter now stands, the shoe industry is stymied. There will be a shortage of shoes soon unless Washington finds some way to slaughter at least 4,000,000 cattle. If a solution is not found to get the hides, we are going barefoot.

There might be some excuse for not supplying Endicott Johnson with the hides if the country were not teeming with an all-time record cattle population of 83,000,000 on the hoof. That is the ridiculous part of it. If the shoe factories can get the leather, they will make the shoes.

Our fighting men wear out two pairs for every one we as civilians discard. And it takes heavier leather to build Army and Navy shoes. Only sheer stupidity or indifference among those in authority in Washington will allow this situation to continue. But if it continues and they don't get hides for Endicott Johnson, this whole valley will suffer and suffer plenty.

For the life of me, I don't know what would happen to this valley if the shoe factories weren't here. For years, the presence of Endicott Johnson in our midst has kept the rest of us on a sound economic standard. Industries have come to us and gone again. Yet we have never suffered appreciably even from depression because so many thousands of families have maintained a steady income from their honest labors in the shoe factories.

So it is important, so important to keep the big orders coming into Endicott Johnson but it is most important to keep them supplied with leather because without the leather, no shoes, and without the shoes, no work.

Realizing the seriousness of this lack of hides and the stupidity of Government agents in allowing such a situation to exist when there are more live cattle today than ever before in history, I have introduced a resolution demanding an investigation of both the War Production Board and the O. P. A. here in Washington.

For the sake of 18,000 Endicott Johnson workers, for the sake of our largest industry, for the sake of enough shoes for our fighting men, and for our people, I hope that Congress will adopt the following:

Whereas the tanning and shoe industries of the United States are facing a most serious situation due to a shortage of hides and are not currently able to obtain enough hides to make leather and shoes; and

Whereas the year 1944 is witnessing the presence of the greatest cattle population the country has ever known, there being over 83,000,000 cattle on the hoof at this time in the United States; and

Whereas the supply of hides coming into the market this year will be insufficient to meet the absolutely necessary requirements for military and civilian needs to the extent of about 4,000,000 hides; and

Whereas the consuming public will suffer immeasurably if hides are not made available at an early date: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be authorized to investigate the War Production Board and the Office of Price Administration for the purpose of finding out why the necessary hides have not been made available.

Ohio Demands Recognition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, the State of Ohio needs no encomium. She stands at the head of the list of States in many respects and near the head of the list in all respects.

Frequently a great State, like a great man, fails to get its proper recognition because of the failure of those whose responsibility it was to secure such recognition.

As we move about the city of Washington, the most beautiful city in the world and the Capital of the greatest Nation in the world, we are disappointed and almost chagrined because none of the many beautiful avenues or boulevards is named Ohio. There is a great avenue named New York; another bearing the name of Massachusetts; another named New Jersey; and there is the historical Pennsylvania Avenue, at one end of which is located the White House and at the other end of which is the great Capitol Building. Practically every State in the Union has been recognized and honored in this manner. Ohio has been omitted. There was once a short, insignificant little street of but a block or two in length that was designated Ohio Avenue. That was long since vacated to make room for one of the beautiful Government buildings which add to Washington's appearance.

That there is no Ohio Avenue in Washington does not in any way dim the luster of the fair name of Ohio. Rather it is evidence that those responsible for selecting appropriate names for the most important thoroughfares of the Capital City consider neither history nor aesthetics. Or could it be due to the inefficiency of the Senators and Congressmen from Ohio or one of the numerous Presidents that Ohio has furnished for the Nation? If so, I cannot shirk my part of this responsibility. I may be entitled to an alibi, however, for I did make an effort to have one of the new and attractive boulevards that now traverse the length of the beautiful Mall section named for our great State of Ohio. Although I failed, I take solace from the fact that the christening authorities advised me that these new boulevards would be named after our first Presidents, which has been done.

So in order to keep fresh in the minds of those who name the streets in Washington, the fact that we Ohioans feel keenly this unfortunate omission, I have prepared a letter which I am sending to Hon. James Russell Young, chairman of the District Commissioners, which letter I shall fortify with a copy of these remarks that I am now making. I shall hope that all other Ohio Congressmen and Senators may also support my efforts in this respect.

Important as I feel this movement is to have Ohio properly represented in the geography of our Capital City, there is another unfortunate situation existing with reference to our fair State that I cannot view as placidly. We are engaged in the most terrific war of all history. Our armies are carrying on with traditional courage and success on many fronts. Our Navy, the mightiest in all history, in her power and majesty rides the waves of the seven seas. She stalks the marauding remnants of the German Navy with a determination to eradicate the last vestige of that arrogant piracy. The boastful Japanese Navy, capable only of tactics such as were demonstrated at Pearl Harbor, shrinks out of sight and hides under camouflage and cowardice. MacArthur and Nimitz will search them out and I have no doubt that they will administer justice, stern and real.

Mr. Speaker, although Ohio has sailors and marines and WAVES and SPARS on practically every American battleship, every cruiser, every destroyer, every submarine, and every war craft afloat today, still neither they nor we at home can feel the pride that comes to residents of other States who can point with pride to the achievements of a battleship bearing the name of their native State. Can it be possible that not one of the many mighty battleships of the great American armada bears the name Ohio? Yes, that is the low nautical estate to which our great State has come in these historical days of naval prowess.

While Ohio does not border on the Atlantic nor the Pacific yet one of the truly great and decisive naval battles of our history was fought in Ohio waters. I refer to Perry's victory on Lake Erie in the fall of 1813. There at that time that intrepid young officer, Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry, with his small fleet gave battle to the death to a much larger British fleet. His motto "Don't give up the ship," theretofore having been spoken as the dying words of Capt. James Lawrence was the battle cry of Perry and his men. When the sun set on that memorable day, the War of 1812 was ended on the inland waters for which the United States and Great Britain contended. Then it was that Commodore Perry sent to his superior officer that immortal message "We have met the enemy and they are ours. Two ships, two brigs, one scooner and one sloop." This battle and this message are to Ohio what Bunker Hill is to Massachusetts and Valley Forge is to Pennsylvania.

Yet in spite of all this the name Ohio is an obsolete word in the lexicon of the present day Navy.

I hope this is not the fault of anyone. It probably is an inadvertence. It cannot be held to be the fault of the Navy nor any activities or customs of the Navy for we Ohioans are proud of the fact that at this very day an Ohioan is the highest ranking officer in this the greatest Navy ever assembled on the world's Seven Seas. Admiral Ernest J. King, an Ohio boy, who is as sensibly proud of it as we are of him, now holds the rank of Commander in Chief, United States Fleet, and Chief of Naval Operations. This is the highest rank that any naval officer has ever achieved.

Mr. Speaker, Ohio is a nautical term. It is an Indian name given by the Indians to that river in North America which was in their estimation the most beautiful of all rivers—the Ohio River. Ohio means Beautiful River. We Ohioans must do our part to have the name Ohio painted on the prow of one of the big, new, and modern battleships that our country will be building in the near future. To this end we must move promptly and vigorously yet with due respect to the rights of other States.

I will this day send to the Secretary of the Navy a letter setting forth our wishes. I shall fortify that letter with a copy of these remarks. I shall encourage all Ohio Congressmen and Senators to join with me. Our Governor and State officials will be encouraged to do the same as will all patriotic and civic organizations of the State.

Mr. Speaker, the Bureau of Personnel of the United States Navy has been kind enough to prepare a brief historical review of the different ships named Ohio that have been a part of the American Navy from its very earliest days. I hope that the American people will enjoy reading this review which I ask to be made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I know Ohioans will read it with pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, this is the review:

U. S. S. "OHIO" (NO. 1 OF THE NAME)

The first Ohio in the United States Navy was a schooner of 62 tons, purchased by the Government early in 1813 for operations on Lake Erie.

She was fitted out by Henry Eckford in the Niagara River, and armed with one long 32-pounder. She was blockaded in the river for a period, but in June 1813, Commodore O. H. Perry succeeded in getting her and four other vessels out and brought them to Erie, Pa.

Sailing Master Daniel Dobbins was ordered to take command of the Ohio on July 8, 1812, and on August 12 she sailed with the rest of the squadron from Erie to Sandusky. The Ohio was employed during the following months in carrying supplies, and on the day of the famous battle, September 10, 1813, she was at Erie taking on armament and stores.

After the ice broke in Lake Erie in 1814, the Ohio cruised between Long Point and Erie, and in April Mr. Dobbins was sent with the Ohio to Put in Bay to assist in fitting out the prizes Queen Charlotte and Detroit.

Early in the summer of 1814, Lt. A. H. M. Conclin was placed in command of the Ohio. On August 12, 1814, the Ohio and Somers were captured by the enemy by boarding within pistol shot of Fort Erie.

U. S. S. "OHIO" (NO. 2 OF THE NAME)

The ship-of-the-line Ohio was built at the New York Navy Yard under supervision of United States Naval Constructor Henry Eckford. She was commenced in 1817, launched on May 30, 1820, but not finally commissioned until 1830. Her tonnage was 2,757, and her dimensions were: length, 197 feet; beam, 55 feet; hold, 22 feet 2 inches.

The Ohio was originally planned to carry thirty-four long 32-pounders and thirty-four 44-pounder carronades, but on January 1, 1830, she is said to have carried twelve 8-inch guns and seventy-two 32-pounders. In 1863, when armed for the defense of the city of Boston, one 8-inch Parrott rifle, four 100-pounder Parrott rifles, and twelve 32-pounders were put on her.

From 1830 to 1838 the Ohio remained in ordinary at the New York Navy Yard. From 1838 to 1841 she was flagship of Commodore Isaac Hull in the Mediterranean. After undergoing repairs at Boston Navy Yard, she was again placed in commission on December 7, 1846, and the following February sailed for the coast of Mexico, where she took up station off Sacrificios Island and participated actively in operations against Mexico. The Ohio assisted in the bombardment of the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, and the surrender of Vera Cruz, aiding in the landing of troops and transportation of guns and carriages, and sent a party of 15 officers and 300 men to the U. S. S. Mississippi to take part in an expedition against Tuxpan.

On May 9, 1847, the Ohio left the station off Vera Cruz and returned to New York, from which port she again sailed on June 26, 1847, for the Pacific, where she served as part of the Pacific squadron until the spring of 1850, when she returned to the east coast.

The Ohio was used as receiving ship at Boston until 1875, when she was placed in ordinary at that place. On September 27, 1883, she was sold to Israel L. Snow, of Rockland, Maine, for $17,100.

U. S. S. "OHIO" (NO. 3 OF THE NAME)

The U. S. S. Ohio, battleship No. 12, was authorized by act of Congress, approved May 4, 1898, and built at the Union Iron Works, San Francisco, Calif. The keel was laid on April 22, 1899, and the vessel was launched on May 18, 1901.

The dimensions of the Ohio were: Length between perpendiculars, 388 feet; breadth, 72 feet 2½ inches; mean draft, 23 feet 7 inches; normal displacement, 12,500 tons. Her battery consisted of (main) four 12-inch, 40-caliber; (secondary) eight 6-inch, 50-caliber; two 3-inch, 50 caliber; two 6-prdr. guns and two 18-inch torpedo tubes (1920).

The Ohio was placed in commission October 4, 1904, and sent to the Asiatic station as flagship, received the Taft party on board at Manila, P. I. During 1906 she cruised in Japanese and Chinese waters; in 1907, attended the Jamestown Exposition; and in 1908–9 made the cruise around the world with the Atlantic Fleet, followed by duty on the Atlantic coast. In 1914, she was sent to Vera Cruz for protection of American interests during the Mexican intervention, after which she was placed in Reserve Fleet at Philadelphia.

The ship was placed in full commission April 24, 1917, and employed in training engineer personnel and in general maneuvers and target practice in the Chesapeake Bay area until June 3, 1918, after which she was employed for 3 months in training midshipmen from Annapolis.

On January 7, 1919, the Ohio was placed in reserve at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, and on May 31, 1922, was placed out of commission. In accordance with terms of the Washington Treaty for the limitation of naval armaments, the Ohio was rendered incapable of further warlike service and sold as scrap on March 23, 1923.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1944.

Hon. JAMES RUSSELL YOUNG,
Chairman, Board of District Commissioners, District Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. YOUNG: Many of the avenues and boulevards in Washington are named for the various States. I think every State in the Union is represented with the exception of the great State of Ohio. The people of Ohio are not willing to believe that this has been a studied discrimination against their great State.

On behalf of the people of Ohio, I am starting a movement which I hope will result in this matter being corrected. We are not so anxious for that correction that we will accept the designation of some small outlying street to bear the name of Ohio. Naturally we want Ohio's name placed on an avenue that ranks with New York Avenue or Massachusetts Avenue or even Rhode Island Avenue.

I wish, therefore, that you would consider this letter as an application on the part of the people of Ohio to have your Board consider naming one of the principal thoroughfares for this great State. Of course, we are not so prejudiced as to ask you to discriminate in our favor against any other State.

I made a speech in Congress today and I am enclosing a copy of it with this letter. I am going to ask the other Congressmen from Ohio and the Senators to write to you. Likewise, I shall ask some of the patriotic and civic organizations of the State and also the Governor and the State departments to write you.

If you have any suggestions as to how we might present this matter in the most effective way, we will be glad to have them.

While I address this letter to you as the Chairman of the Board, I mean to include the other two Commissioners.

With assurances of respect, I am,

Very truly yours,

THOMAS A. JENKINS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1944.

Hon. FRANK KNOX,
Secretary of the Navy,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLONEL KNOX: Believe it or not, there is no ship in the great American Navy named for the great State of Ohio. On behalf of the people of Ohio, I am making a request that you give consideration to this matter. I shall attempt to support this application with letters from all the Ohio Congressmen and Senators and also from the civic and patriotic organizations of the State as well as the Governor's office and the offices of the various State departments.

I am making a speech on this subject today in the House of Representatives and I am attaching a copy of that speech. I had some information from one of your departments with reference to some of the facts set forth in this speech and I am giving your Department due credit for the same.

We are taking this step not as an idle gesture because it is difficult for the people of Ohio to understand why the name Ohio is not attached to one of the large ships of the Navy.

If there are any special rules of procedure to which we should conform, I would be glad if someone in your Department would advise me because we want to present this matter fairly and in full compliance with the regulations of the Navy, if there are any.

With assurances of respect and best wishes, I am,

Very truly yours,

THOMAS A. JENKINS.

The Air Field at Lincoln, Nebr., Should Be Called the Pershing Field

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the people of Lincoln, Nebr., feel that Gen. John J. Pershing is one of their own. They look back with a pleasant memory upon the years spent there by the general. They would like to have their air field, which is now leased to the Army Air Force, named the Pershing Field.

I would like to extend my remarks by including a resolution, which has been passed on this subject. The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the city of Lincoln is now the owner of an airport located upon sections 6, 7, and 8, township 10, and a part of sections 4, 5, 9, and 17, township 10, and a part of sections 31 and 32 in township 11, all in Range 6 East of the 6th prime meridian, Lancaster County, Nebr., commonly known as the Municipal Airport; and

Whereas said airport is now under lease to the United States of America for an Army airfield and is being so used; and

Whereas it is the desire of the city of Lincoln that such airport, as well as the Army post now located thereon, be officially named and designated as "Pershing Field": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the City Council of the City of Lincoln, Nebr., That the said municipal airport be and the same hereby is officially named and designated as "Pershing Field"; be it further

Resolved, That this council respectfully suggests that the United States of America officially name and designate the Army post located upon said airport, "Pershing Field"; be it further

Resolved, That Resolution No. A–11755, adopted February 24, 1931, be and the same hereby is rescinded and repealed.

Adopted by city council March 20, 1944.

LLOYD J. MARTI,
Mayor.

City Clerk.

The Grip Tightens on the Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post of particular significance at this time.

It is to be hoped that the publication of this article indicates a change in the traditional policy of the Saturday Evening Post against fair prices for farm products. The Saturday Evening Post, perhaps to a greater extent than any other publication in America, acclaimed the influences which brought about the collapse of American agriculture in the early twenties, a collapse which was the forerunner of the depression which spread from a deflated agriculture to the entire Nation. It is a far cry from the fallacious sophistries of Garet Garet and the mendacious cartoons of Herbert Johnson to this straightforward factual discussion by Ed Will. Let us hope that the bitter lessons learned from the last depression will have a similar reaction in other influential quarters.

THE GRIP TIGHTENS ON THE FARMER

(By Ed Will)

Last October, the War Food Administration announced a program of subsidizing dairy feed to compensate dairymen for their increased feed costs. At the time of this writing, the program has been in operation less than 6 months, yet already the principle of Government subsidy has gripped the dairy industry so tightly that it seemingly must be regarded as a permanent fixture. It would seem to be timely if, perhaps, we stopped and looked down the road of subsidized farm prices before proceeding with more of the subsidy programs that seem inevitable since the President's veto of the antisubsidy bill.

The announced purpose of the payments was to compensate for the increased cost of feed to dairymen, but the payments were based not on the amount of feed used but the amount of milk produced. Moreover, the form in which the milk was sold decided the amount of the payment. The rate was an average of 50 cents a hundred for milk, and 5 cents a pound for butterfat. But a hundred pounds of milk contains an average of less than 4 pounds of butterfat, so that the producer who separated his milk, selling the cream for churning, received only 20 cents a hundred for the milk he produced, because his 100 pounds of milk was devoted to the production of 4 pounds of butterfat. This means that the butterfat producer gets only 40 percent as much as the whole-milk producer. Yet there is no evidence to show that a butterfat producer either uses less feed to produce a hundred pounds of milk or pays less for his feed.

The subsidy had a misleading name. It was not actually a feed subsidy but a milk subsidy, with a bonus to whole-milk producers, who already received a much greater return for their milk than butterfat producers. Perhaps, as a farmer, I would be speaking out of turn to point out that whole-milk producers are for the most part organized, and therefore in a position to exert political pressure, while butterfat producers are usually small-scale unorganized operators. But I am very curious to know whether or not this bonus to the organized whole-milk producers had as its motive the quieting of the resistance to subsidies by organized farm groups.

Despite these feed subsidies, milk production continued to drop. The War Food Administration came to the conclusion that the amount of the subsidy was insufficient to cover the increased feed costs—a conclusion in which they were wholly correct. So the amount of the payments has been raised to 80 cents a hundred pounds of milk produced, and 8 cents a pound of butterfat. The differential between the butterfat and whole-milk producer is retained. But now the dairyman is brought face to face with the accomplished fact that he is dependent for at least 20 percent of his milk income upon Government subsidy. The price which dairymen receive for milk varies, but the net income per 100 pounds, after deductions from trucking, and so on, will seldom exceed $3.20, plus the 80-cent subsidy, a total of $4 per 100. Not a bad price, considering everything, but the subsidy has grown from a source of pin money to a fifth of the dairyman's income.

And this brings up the big question, What will happen when subsidy payments stop? The avowed purpose of the payments is to prevent inflation, but if they are ever stopped it will probably be at a time when falling income and lowering prices ease the threat of inflation. In a time of falling prices can the dairymen of the Nation stand the sudden withdrawal of a fifth of their income, with no immediate compensating cuts in expenses? Would not such a cut cause financial chaos on farms? And would not chaos on farms spread into other industries, perhaps into a Nation-wide depression?

I must confess that I can see no way out of it. To me, it seems as if the dairy-feed subsidy must go on indefinitely, that in starting it the administration started a snowball rolling that has grown to such proportions that it has got out of control. And I am waiting to see several other expected snowballs start rolling, and gather momentum, until they, too, are out of control.

I am just one of the millions of small farmers in the Nation. I did my best to raise my voice against any general-subsidy program, along with the overwhelming majority of the Nation's farmers, but to no avail. But perhaps my betters in Washington, who claim to know what is best for me, since they insist that subsidies are to the farmer's best interest, will pardon my temerity if I inquire if there is any plan for the termination of the subsidy program? Or did the administration just consider how to start it, and let it go at that?

And I don't want to be told that it is no time to ask such questions while our boys are sacrificing themselves overseas. Some of those boys are farm boys, too, and all of those who come back will come back to live in the economy created by present practices. If that argument is to be used in Washington, as I have heard it used by various local minor administration officials, I want to see a signed statement by at least one of the boys overseas that he is fighting for a subsidy program which will postpone a portion of the Nation's food bill until he can come home and help pay it.

In this connection I also include a letter just received in this morning's mail, which is self-explanatory:

RHINELAND, MO., April 7, 1944.

DEAR MR. CANNON: I am an 18-year-old farm girl. I have had to quit high school to work on my father's farm. My only source of income is from the egg money. Eggs are now only 24 cents a dozen, and after I have paid for the feed I have hardly any money at all. We live in the river bottom where all the crops were flooded out after we had replanted three times, and we must buy all our feed. The egg money is divided between my brother and myself, and we must pay the grocery bills from the money. We get about two cases of eggs a week, which now bring about $8, and we can't make it. Everything else is higher. Can't you do something to get enough for our eggs to pay expenses and leave us just a little.

Sincerely yours,

IDELL MEYER.

Mr. Speaker, this letter is typical of many received in the last few days, not only in my own office but in the office of every Congressman in the House. Eggs, hogs, cattle, and all the major income products of the farm are selling at less than they sold last year. Notwithstanding the flamboyant reports of vastly increased farm income featured in the press and over the radio, there is not a farmer anywhere operating under normal conditions who is not making less this year than last year—the only group or profession or industry in the Nation which is receiving less this year than last. And this is merely a foretaste of what is in store. After the war will come the deluge. And unless steps are taken to put the same permanent floor under farm wages and prices already enjoyed by industrial wages and prices another depression will start with the farm and spread to the Nation as it did after the last war.

Foreign Affairs of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 13 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a timely and informative address on Foreign Affairs of the United States in Wartime and After, delivered by the Honorable Breckinridge Long, Assistant Secretary of State, before the American Federation of Labor Forum on Labor and the Post-war World, at the Hotel Commodore, New York City, on April 12, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOREIGN AFFAIRS OF THE UNITED STATES IN WARTIME AND AFTER

It is with a solemn understanding of the significance of this meeting and of the forward-looking undertaking of this post-war forum that I address this gathering tonight. I bring the best wishes of Secretary Hull and give expression to his hope that your deliberations will be highly productive not alone in the nature of the conclusions to which you may come but in the success they may promise for the realization of a stable peace and for a better world.

It is a matter of solid encouragement that an organization such as the American Federation of Labor, which has done so much to stimulate the conscience and actions of mankind in behalf of human welfare, and which has so consistently recognized that the human element is not a simple matter of local or national concern, is directing its energies toward seeking solutions for post-war problems.

The post-war world presents in prospect many vistas which have a present interest and which hold forth a promise of political stability and economic prosperity—but there will be no realization of those promises unless we win this war—and win it completely.

Victory in this war cannot be reckoned merely in terms of a successful repulse of the enemy. Our victory must mean complete destruction of fascism and nazi-ism and the obliteration of every vestige of the vicious movement which set out to destroy, all over the globe, the very foundations of freedom and democracy. All the power of this Nation is directed to that end. And this includes the Axis partner, Japan, and its brutal attempts at domination. That is the reason the full diplomatic power of the United States has been and must remain committed to support in every possible way the armed forces in attaining their military objectives to the end that the enemy may be completely overcome as quickly as possible. Our diplomatic activity is to be judged primarily by the standard as to whether it will be of maximum effectiveness in winning this war by promoting Allied cooperation to that end. Thereafter it will be judged by the measure of cooperation it has achieved among the peacefully inclined nations of the world and the success it may achieve in collaboration with them in laying the basis for a peace of political security and economic well-being.

Of fundamental importance in such an undertaking as the waging of this world-wide war is full cooperation among our allies; and that has been a primary objective of the wartime foreign policy of the United States. Through our diplomatic activity we have developed a very close and satisfying cooperation with our allies against the common enemy. That does not mean that we have each seen each detail with the same eye, but it does mean that we work and fight in unison, that we are united on all-important policy, and that we are all determined to fight it through to complete victory.

Occasional instances, in the kaleidoscopic changes of events, in which in some detail there may not have been full concert of action between great allies have been fully discussed in public while the continuing coordination and cordial cooperation in the common effort, which is the basic fact, is frequently overlooked even though it be essential to victory. No one supposes that by signing the Atlantic Charter, the Declaration of the United Nations, and the Moscow Declaration, that the signatories disposed of all the details of their multiple relationships. The important fact is, however, that they are in harmony as to their general objectives and agreed on as to how to achieve them. It is easy, particularly under the stress and worry of wartime conditions, to magnify some problems out of all proportion to their real merit in relation to the attainment of military success.

We are approaching the time when the Allied military operations against Nazi Germany will bring about the liberation of those nations which have been so long and so tragically under its brutal domination. We shall carry with us into those ravaged territories our deep and abiding interest in the restoration of individual liberty, of popular institutions of government, of freedom of worship, of speech, and of the press, of right of assembly, and of all the rights and privileges of free peoples. In keeping with the provisions of the Atlantic Charter and in line with our own devotion to democratic principles, we intend to take no action which will in any way interfere with the free and untrammeled choice by these nations of the officials and the governments under whose authority they wish to live. We will not permit the armed forces of this country to be used for the support of any group or any government contrary to the will of the people. We intend to do everything we can toward encouraging and assisting these liberated nations to shape their own destinies and to develop their own way of life. We intend to make our contribution toward aiding them to recover from the political, moral, and economic prostration into which they have been plunged by the ruthless enemy.

For effective prosecution of the war there is need that all peoples now submerged under Axis invasion use all their energies to resist the invaders and thus speed the day of their own liberation. Internal political controversies inevitably weaken the war effort. We have consistently urged that they not be permitted to impair the war effort.

Such a situation, for example, has existed in Yugoslavia. Even beneath the heel of Axis occupation, that country, formed of many races, has fallen into divided councils. These divisions have seemed to us tragic in themselves and calculated only to benefit the common Nazi enemy. Our policy has been to endeavor to bring these elements into sufficient harmony so that they can make a common front against a common enemy. We are, meanwhile, cooperating in furnishing arms and supplies to all Yugoslavs who are fighting the Germans.

A similar tragedy almost occurred in Greece. Happily it was averted by common effort of the Allies. The differences have, for the time being, been composed. Political questions have been set aside for orderly solution when time permits, and energies are pooled for the common struggle.

Sometimes the objective is not achieved. Finland is a case in point. Finland, an ally of Nazi Germany, seems unfortunately to be choosing a course of action very different from what we desire. We have made every effort to induce Finland to terminate her ill-chosen association with Germany. We have emphasized to her the consequences which must flow from a continued participation in the war on the side of the enemy. We have repeatedly made clear to her that responsibility for the consequences of continuing her association with Nazi Germany must rest solely on the Finnish Government, just as, in the case of Germany's other satellites, the responsibility for remaining in the war on the side of our principal enemy must rest solely on them.

The American people need have no fear that the American point of view is not being vigorously and effectively presented on every occasion where our immediate or long-range interests are involved. These problems are solved, in consultation with our allies, in accord with the controlling purpose of unity in the war effort, and in keeping with the fundamental principles of democratic philosophy.

The diplomatic power of the United States is the servant of American foreign policy. There is an inclination to confuse the two, but they should be distinguished. Diplomatic activity is particular action taken in the application of foreign policy to a specific situation, while foreign policy itself is general in character.

American foreign policy is a composite of many factors and influences. The principles of social justice, individual liberty, orderly democratic government, and fair play which compose our political philosophy are the spirit of that policy. These and other principles well known to every American are part of our foreign policy because they are a part of America. Whatever else it contains, it must always reflect the doctrines, philosophies, aspirations, and practices of the American people.

Our success in the working out of these principles will, of course, vary with time, place, and the exigencies of military necessity. However, this Government will give representation abroad to the ideals of America and, within the limits of the principle of self-determination, encourage democratic practices in liberated countries.

I have emphasized the dominant part that the war, and its winning, must play in the application of our current foreign policy. But essential as is the total defeat of the Axis, that is not and cannot be the sole great objective. There are two others with which American foreign policy must be concerned—the prevention of future wars and the promotion of conditions which will permit our people to attain the greatest possible measure of economic well-being.

I should like to speak briefly of our preparations for the future in these two broad fields; of the establishment of an effective system of international peace and security; and of the creation of conditions and agencies for the promotion of economic and social welfare.

For some time the Department of State, in cooperation with other agencies of the Government, in collaboration with individual Members of the Congress, and in consultation with individuals of experience in private life, has been engaged in studying these questions and in formulating the bases for constructive programs of action.

A thorough analysis of the mistakes of the unhappy past, a study of current developments, and an examination of future possibilities have led us to the following conclusions as regards some of the basic problems involved in the future prevention of aggression and war:

1. The major nations together with the other law-abiding states should create an international organization for the maintenance of peace and security.

2. The major nations and in due course all nations—should pledge themselves not to use force against each other or against any other nation, except on the basis of arrangements made in connection with such an international organization.

3. Each of the major nations, and any other nations to be agreed upon, should accept special responsibility for maintaining adequate forces and for using such forces, on the basis of arrangements made in connection with the international organization, to prevent or suppress all disturbances of the peace.

Our basic thought is that a general international organization of sovereign nations, having for its primary objective the maintenance of peace and security, should comprise effective agencies and arrangements for the pacific settlement of international controversies; for joint use of force to suppress disturbances of the peace; and for fostering cooperative effort among nations for the progressive improvement of the general welfare. The organization should at the outset provide the indispensable minimum of machinery of action and should be expected to develop and grow as time goes on and as circumstances may indicate to be wise. It is clear that there must be some general body on which all member states will be equally represented to serve as a world assembly of nations. There must be a court of international justice. And there must be a small body or council, representative of the large and small nations, endowed with adequate powers and means to arrange for maintaining the peace.

The step in the direction of creating an effective general international organization was taken at Moscow. The Four Nation Declaration signed there constitutes a solemn declaration of intention on the part of the four major countries to act in common for the preservation of peace and security, and to take the lead in the establishment of a permanent international organization for this basic purpose. The next step had to be a joint examination of the problems involved in setting up such an organization.

Our studies in preparation for discussion with other governments, which were well advanced before the Moscow Conference, have been intensively carried forward since. They have involved a careful examination of the various alternatives with respect to the structure, powers, and procedures of an international organization. They have involved also an examination of our constitutional processes as regards participation by this country in the creation and functioning of such an organization, including especially the providing of armed forces for international action.

The next step involves additional conferences with representatives of both parties in the Congress and thereafter a full exchange of views with other governments and in accordance with our constitutional provisions, discussions at home—all looking toward an agreed proposal for an effective international security organization.

At the same time our thoughts have been on the other related question, that of economic security.

International cooperation is as important in one field as in the other. This is not the occasion to undertake an extensive discussion of the broad question of economic collaboration, but I do wish to stress the need for collaboration in this field as well.

Events have lifted one fundamental aspect out of the realm of speculation and controversy. The economic interdependence of nations is no longer a theory but a well-substantiated fact. The economic and social policies of one nation exercise influence on the economic and social conditions of other countries. This phenomenon of international relations leads to one basic conclusion: National and international economic policies should be formulated with a recognition of the basic and permanent interests of all peoples. These policies should be designed to promote, as widely as possible, full and productive employment under conditions favorable to the physical and moral well-being of the worker.

Under present-day conditions, all nations are vitally dependent on each other as regards their economic and social well-being. The state of employment, distribution, and living conditions in our country and in every other country are mutually interdependent. Hence the welfare of every country requires the greatest practical measure of collaboration between nations on policies affecting the production, distribution, and use of the world's goods and resources. I need hardly underscore the fact that no group has a larger stake in both the economic and social-security aspects of post-war economic cooperation than has labor. The reduction of the barriers to an expansion of mutually profitable trade after the war will be needed in order to open opportunities for work for millions now employed in war production and millions now serving in our armed forces.

In the field of international cooperation directly affecting the interests and problems of labor, we are fortunate in already having an international organization with 25 years of experience—the International Labor Organization. In this field we do not have to wait for the establishment of a suitable vehicle.

A few of those present tonight working and planning with others assumed responsibility in the movement which led to its establishment. I refer to Mr. William Green. Mr. Matthew Woll, and to Prof. James T. Shotwell, who was not only collaborator in the movement but its historian as well. And yet another in that group also here tonight is the distinguished Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Harold Butler. Without the unremitting labors of these able and forward looking men—always remembering as one of the leaders of the whole group, the late Samuel Gompers—without them there might not be an I. L. O.

But there is. And it is fitting in this connection to recall that one of the most important steps—if not the most important—which this country took during the interwar period toward assuming its rightful place as an active member of organized international society was taken in 1934 when President Roosevelt, pursuant to a joint resolution of the Congress, accepted membership for us in the I. L. O. It is commonly acknowledged today that the establishment of that organization marked one of the truly significant milestones in the history of a social progress.

It has a value today of particular importance, when some persons are skeptical about the possibilities of world peace through international organization. I suggest that such persons study the history of the I. L. O. At the time of its inception there was hunger, misery, and serious disorder throughout Europe. President Roosevelt, referring to its origin, said of it later, "To many it was a wild dream." The dream carrying hope to those who could hope has justified the confidence of its founders and become an outstanding demonstration of the effectiveness of men of many nations when determined to do so to work together for the good of all. It is an inspiration to those who believe that the mind and heart of man can solve the problems of mankind.

The C. I. O.'s Political Fund

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAN R. McGEHEE

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. McGEHEE. Mr. Speaker, the old adage that you shall reap the fruits from the seeds you have sown is as true today as it was when first spoken. Many former Members of the Congress have reaped the fruits from the evil seeds sown by reason of their votes and actions while they were Members of this body. I am thinking many will reap it again this following November, and next January their seats will be filled by others.

I have reference to laws that have been passed by the Congress legalizing the racketeering of a certain labor-organization leadership—John L. Lewis, Phil Murray, and others of their ilk and clan. The Congress legalized by statute their high-handed methods of mulcting from the pockets of good and patriotic American citizenship who are compelled by law to join their union and to contribute to them without any accounting whatever of the funds. Those ill-gotten gains are now being used by this racketeering bunch—Sidney Hillman et al.—to further their own ends and defeat Members of the two legislative bodies who do not blindly follow them.

An exposition of their intentions and manner of doing so has been ably outlined by George Morris, staff correspondent of the Commercial Appeal of Memphis, Tenn., in an article written by him on April 6. I think each Member of Congress should be interested in reading this article; hence, I beg leave to extend my remarks and include it therein:

IN WASHINGTON WITH GEORGE MORRIS

THE C. I. O.'S POLITICAL FUND

WASHINGTON, April 6.—When the C. I. O., at its annual convention at Cleveland, established the political action committee, gave it $700,000 as a starter, and announced that $2,000,000 would be available for the purchase of votes to perpetuate the New Deal, the country was amazed that an organization would brazenly proclaim a program in plain violation of the law.

The explanation was simple. Any individual or organization may openly and flagrantly violate the law, provided violations are sanctioned by the law-enforcing officials. It is not suspected that there is a written agreement between the conspirators to the effect that the political and economic spoils of the country shall be divided, but enough evidence already exists to prove that plans for the future involve no more than the program that has been employed in the past, in which cooperation has been complete.

This program, as shown by convincing evidence, is that the New Deal, through the War Labor Board and other agencies, gives the C. I. O. racketeering privileges over labor, and in return the New Deal receives financial and political aid as its cut for the concessions.

Shortly after the C. I. O. announced its intention to spend millions in the fourth-term campaign, Representative SMITH of Virginia wrote a letter to Attorney General Biddle calling his attention to the announced violation of law and asked what he intended to do about it. Mr. Biddle has not shown Representative SMITH the courtesy of a reply, which means that the C. I. O. program has administration sanction and nothing is to be done about it.

The plan for purchasing the November election is not even clever. It simply implies that the law will be violated by one group on the one hand and sanctioned on the other hand by the group which will profit from the violation of law. At the time the announcement was made that the C. I. O. intended to spend millions for the purchase of the election, there was amazement in some quarters that the C. I. O. should have a campaign slush fund of such dimensions at its disposal.

As a matter of fact, the C. I. O. did not have the money in hand at the time. The plan was for governmental agencies to approve C. I. O. raids upon other unions, be recognized as the exclusive bargaining agent, and vastly increase its revenues. That was illegal and vicious, but the C. I. O. did not stop there. It has now levied a political assessment upon all members to raise funds for the campaign, and any member refusing to consent to the assessment will be expelled from the union, and under the closed-shop policy of the administration, will be dismissed from employment.

Workers dominated by the C. I. O. represent various political views. Some are Democrats, some Republicans, others New Dealers, or Socialists, or members of other political organizations, such as Progressives and Farmer-Labor. Regardless of the political opinions of the workers or what candidate they support, every member, without exception, will be compelled to make an involuntary contribution to the C. I. O.'s political action committee, and the C. I. O. will decide how the money is to be spent, where it is to be spent, and in what amounts.

Congress could pass over the conspiracy between the C. I. O. and the New Deal, by which the C. I. O. was permitted to raid other unions, because the War Labor Board has legal authority to make such decisions, and there is no recourse against such procedure so long as the present administration remains in power. However, it was something entirely different when the C. I. O. decided upon a policy of enforced political contributions through assessments, with workers the victims and no choice except to contribute to the fourth-term campaign or lose their jobs and means of livelihood.

The C. I. O. announcement that it will spend $2,000,000 in the fourth-term campaign is regarded as perhaps an understatement. There is no limit to what it can spend and scarcely any limit to the amount it can collect through its hijacking policy with administration endorsement. The only hope that the C. I. O. can be prevented from buying the election is the prospect that the money it spends will be more than offset by the amount of indignation it creates.

The immunity granted by the administration in consideration of profiting from the spoils will exist only so long as the New Deal is in power. Should the plan be repudiated by the voters and another administration be elected, the statute of limitations will not expire with repudiation of the New Deal. An administration in power with a decent regard for law would have an opportunity to proceed with criminal prosecution and New Deal exemption from law violation would be no defense.

As Representative SMITH pointed out in his letter to Attorney General Biddle, labor unions are in the same position as other corporations respecting campaign contributions, and, while the New Deal proceeds against violations of law by those opposing it and exempts from application of law those who violate it in behalf of the New Deal, the law itself makes no such distinction.

The workers themselves, unwilling and defenseless victims of the C. I. O. and New Deal conspiracy, likewise are deserving of protection. There should be some way by which a person who refuses to contribute to the campaign of a candidate he opposes should not be denied the right to earn a living.

The Dies committee charges that the political action committee of the C. I. O. is controlled by Communists, and, regardless of the ideological unity between the New Deal and the heads of the C. I. O., the workers of the country are not Communists, and Congress should find a way to relieve them of communistic domination, despite New Deal opposition.

Rationing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of April 11, 1944:

RATIONING WORKS HERE—AND WHY

It was gratifying to Milwaukeeans to learn that the Journal reporter who found it comparatively easy to get gasoline and meat without ration coupons in Chicago found it impossible in Milwaukee under exactly comparable conditions.

Of course, this does not necessarily mean that there is no black market at all in Milwaukee. The number of places visited was only a sampling. Besides, some of 30 or more dealers who refused to sell to him, an utter stranger, without points might not have been so exacting to a trusted customer.

But it does mean that ration and price-control violations here are neither as extensive nor as flagrant as in Chicago and some other cities. For that, a good deal of credit is due to the people of Milwaukee—because no black market exists except as its customers support it.

Milwaukee and its suburbs have established a fine reputation as a law-abiding community. They have enviable records in recruiting, bond sales, Red Cross drives, support of the U. S. O., and in many other activities that indicate a general willingness to sacrifice time, money, and convenience in behalf of the war effort. If the record of supporting O. P. A. regulations is good here, it is quite in keeping with both the peacetime and wartime reputation of the Milwaukee area.

Also, a good deal of credit is due to the local administration of the O. P. A., which has been aggressive in enforcement to the limits of its personnel and solicitous of public understanding and support. To the recalcitrant, the word has gone forth that there is no way to wheedle out or buy out of a penalty for deliberate infractions.

Only by such teamwork between a generally patriotic, law-abiding public and utterly fearless, impartial public officials can any system of wartime regulation for the benefit of all achieve substantial success. Without public support, the administrator becomes impotent and discouraged; without aggressive and firm administration, the control system loses public faith and cooperation.

Washington, D. C., and Chicago, please note.

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, if the O. P. A. would concentrate on putting floors in feed lots we might partly forget consumer subsidies.

The men and women who have never had anything are coming into their own in this era of irritation and computation.

Army waste and General Hershey's vacillation, along with taxes, are the chief sources of consternation at the crossroads.

CLYDE REED now becomes the target of the Navy deserter in time of war, the White House mouthpiece of the air.

To me there is as much thrill in a big locomotive engine doing her stuff as there is in a bomber plane roaring above.

Forty-six years ago I sat on a boxcar at Ottawa and watched the old man river go by. Last Tuesday the dear Marias des Cygnes did not look a day older or any less subdued.

Many banks hold War bonds equal to 10 times their capital stock. One of the smartest told me that banks would burst if bonds went down 10 percent. Is it true or false?

The less Mackinacs the Republican Party has the better, in agriculture and foreign policy. Let the majority party with responsibility hold or fall on their own record. They want something from us to shoot at to divert attention.

In the last 3 weeks I have been seated in lodge and at dinners with men from the Santa Fe shops at Topeka. My faith has been reconfirmed in the steadfastness, the dignity, and the patriotism of the rank and file of labor. Nobody questions whether or not this group is essential.

The late Dr. O. O. Wolf was a successful farmer and farm leader—they do not always go together. We congratulate the Kansas Farm Bureau on his long-sustained presidency. Wolf and I met in the State senate in 1913 and the fact that we had never quarreled in 30 years was a testimonial to his angelic qualities.

Agricultural Finance—Recommendations by the Southern Great Plains Agricultural Council

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks I am including a list of recommendations relative to agricultural finance, which were adopted at a meeting of the Southern Great Plains Agricultural Council, composed of State and Federal Agricultural Agency representatives from the States of Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Texas meeting at Wichita, Kans., January 5, 1944:

1. Agriculture and our returning soldiers: From the point of view of most sincere concern for the welfare of returning soldiers desiring to engage in farming, it is recommended that agricultural credit be made available under special terms to returning soldiers, first, only to those of proven ability and capacity; and second, under conditions as to size of unit, location, purchase price, and terms of contract and in such amounts that insure reasonable expectation of profitable operation.

The experience following World War No. 1 in the rehabilitation of soldiers on the land from the point of view of the effect upon the morale of the returning veteran and the financial results obtained indicate the need for the limitations indicated above. Widespread action upon the slogan "Fifty (or 5) acres and a jeep for every returning soldier," would be most unfortunate for the soldiers and for agriculture. There is not apparent room or need for a large expansion of agriculture in the post-war period. Wholesale subsidized purchase of farms for returning veterans would only aggravate an already inflated farm real estate market.

Fortunately there is a place for many thousands of returning soldiers on the farms of those desiring to retire from active farm operation because of age or other reasons. Credit can assist in this transfer. The transfer should be gradual and on a selective basis rather than indiscriminate and forced by public initiative. Agriculture should not be expected to absorb large numbers of the incapacitated veterans. Contrary to popular sentiment and expressed belief, success in farming is a difficult and demanding task for those mentally and physically well equipped.

Sharp differentiation should be made between those veterans placed on farms or in agricultural pursuits as a means of regaining physical and mental health and those assisted in undertaking farming on a business basis.

2. Agricultural training for returning soldiers: Expenditures for specialized training, in many instances, will be of more permanent value than expenditures of like amounts in credit subsidies for the purchase of farms. It is recommended that due consideration be given to the benefit to the veterans per dollar of Federal expenditure in subsidized education in agriculture as well as other vocations. Here again, however, the subsidized training should be made available to those selected individuals who have a reasonable chance of profiting by this expenditure of time and money.

3. Land price inflation: Taxation of capital gains on the resale of farms during the war and post-war period is recommended as the most feasible means of exercising control on farm-land prices. It is further recommended that education concerning normal values of farm lands and the methods of determining normal values be encouraged.

The period of most dangerous inflation of farm real estate prices is likely in the early post-war years when pent up savings and the desire for a job and the supposed security of farm ownership all operated to force land prices upward.

The need for control of land prices is not as urgent and is not as well recognized in the southern Great Plains as in other parts of the United States where the present period of high farm income has been of longer duration and where prices of land have advanced higher in proportion to prices sustained over long periods of time in the past.

A continuation of price control and price support for agricultural products will afford a measure of farm-land price control.

4. Crop insurance: It is recommended that consideration be given to the reestablishment of Federal crop insurance on a limited risk basis. Such insurance should not be subsidized except as to administrative expense over a long period of time. Federally sponsored crop insurance can be of major importance in giving stability to agriculture and in reducing credit costs. The need for such insurance is greatest in the high risk areas and among tenant farmers generally.

5. Soil and water conservation: Continued liberal Federal support and redoubled effort on the part of credit agencies and all others interested in the future welfare of agriculture to hasten the general adoption of recognized soil and water conservation practices is recommended.

Failure to act upon what is now recognized as economically sound soil and water conservation practices has been a major factor, among the several, contributing to widespread foreclosure of mortgaged farms in the southern Great Plains during the past decade. Erosion has been as important a factor as drought or depression in robbing farmers of their means of livelihood and their children of their rightful heritage.

With plenty of money, manpower, and equipment available, soil conservation should be a major project in the post-war rehabilitation of agriculture. It should be pushed vigorously as a measure of general welfare, not only with Federal but with private funds.

6. Agricultural prices and income: It is recommended that consideration be given to the maintenance and further refinement during the post-war period of much of the production control, price regulation, and price support legislation that has been found to be beneficial to American agriculture during the past 10 years. Since this is a surplus producing area of agricultural products, we are definitely concerned in efforts to revive and stimulate world-wide international trade.

7. Cooperative associations: It is recommended that support be given farmers' cooperative associations in their position that patronage dividends should continue to be exempt from corporation income tax.

Farmers' marketing and servicing cooperative associations will undoubtedly play an increasingly important part in furthering farmer welfare in the post-war period.

8. Landlord-tenant relationship: It is recommended that the various means, legislative and educational, for improving of landlord-tenant relationships be further supported and pressed forward. Sharecropping too often is extractive and exploitive one-crop farming. Livestock share leasing or partnership operation is on the other hand, in many instances, a necessary adjunct to mutually beneficial results with diversified modern farming where soil and water conservation is practiced. No one type of tenure can be recommended for all farmers at all times. With the increasing investment involved in the ownership and operation of a successful modern farm, increased attention should be given to improving in various ways the joint operation of farms.

Men and Women in the Armed Forces May Now Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, now that the calamity howlers and misinformed people have a chance to ascertain the facts, I think it well to call attention to Public Law No. 277, Seventy-eighth Congress, which was passed by the Senate and House of Representatives and became a law without the President's signature. This act was presented to the White House March 20, 1944, and provides in effect that men and women in the armed forces may apply to county auditors in their respective districts for ballots. This law grants them permission to vote for State and county officials as well as Federal officials. The original bill which was correctly named the bobtail ballot was just a piece of paper on which our armed forces could write in names of Federal candidates only and no one seriously thinks it was at all constitutional.

Already the War Department and other Government agencies are issuing instructions for voting by personnel in the armed forces of this country. I refer to circular No. 128 issued by the War Department on April 3, 1944, for distribution in every unit in our Army and Navy. In my opinion, Congress did a good job in the enactment of this legislation and I say without fear of contradiction that every man and woman in our armed forces can vote just the same as anyone who resides in the district, provided, of course, that conditions on the war front permit voting at all.

I would urge the fathers, mothers, and relatives of these people to contact the county auditor in their particular county who will give full information and arrange immediately to get in communication with the armed forces and with the soldier or sailor in question.

I know that some pressure groups have lied about the soldiers' legislation and have gone out of their way to misrepresent my attitude in connection with this important problem. "Politics is politics" and of course, these people including the one who had a member of the armed forces write a letter accusing me of helping mutilate the rights of our soldiers and sailors, have just been misled by a bunch of high-powered politicians.

The roll calls in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD show without any possibility of contradiction that I supported this important legislation, voted for it, and helped enact it into law.

Antifriction Bearings and World War No. 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. H. CARSON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. CARSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Antifriction Bearings and World War No. 2," written by Walter C. Sanders and published in the April 1944 issue of the magazine Railway Purchases and Stores.

In view of the Allied bombings of the antifriction-bearing plants in Germany and Italy, this article is very timely.

The article follows:

The vital importance of antifriction bearings in the present world-wide conflict is amply illustrated by the tremendous volume of their use in war planes, antiaircraft guns, tanks, ships, locomotives, railroad cars, and machine tools. The Allied air forces' successful raids on the antifriction bearing plants in Germany and Italy dramatically emphasized that importance.

The fact that antifriction bearings are hidden or out of sight in the machines and equipment in which they are used and are not visible to the eye causes little thought on the part of most people, much less their placing any great importance on them when thinking of the major pieces of war equipment. If the antifriction bearing could be seen as you see gun mechanisms, aircraft propellers, motor transport tires, as examples, their great importance would be obvious.

ANTIFRICTION BEARINGS THE BASE FOR STEEL PRODUCTION

Antifriction bearings should in reality take preference over almost every other piece of equipment because of the fact that they are needed even before the manufacture of steel can begin. For example, the mining of ore and other raw materials, such as coal and limestone, is the beginning of steel making. To mine ore and transport it to the mill, antifriction bearings are required in all this equipment—ore cars, power shovels, trains, ship propellers, and mechanical loaders.

After the ore reaches the melting furnaces, antifriction bearings are required in the handling of ingot and charging cars, cranes, chippers, and furnaces. When the steel is ready for rolling into various sizes and shapes and the piercing of tubes, roller bearings are required on the rolling mills, on the cranes, on the saws, the run-out tables, the cooling beds; in fact, practically every piece of modern handling equipment is on antifriction bearings.

Another example of where antifriction bearings are needed much in advance of fabrication of the steel is in the machine tools used for cutting the steel into the millions of parts required to make these major pieces of war equipment. No modern machine tools operate without anti-friction bearings, and some of these tools use as many as 500 antifriction bearings. Now bear in mind, that few machine tools for cutting the steel for these various pieces of equipment can be constructed without antifriction bearings, and the anti-friction bearings must be produced well in advance of the actual production of the machine tool.

PLANES HAVE THOUSANDS OF BEARINGS

With reference to the major pieces of equipment that will win the war, in aircraft, for example, every plane is equipped with many antifriction bearings. Some of the large bombers have as many as two and three thousand bearings. The radial engine is vital to airplanes and antifriction bearings are the heart of the radial engine—they make the radial engine possible. Antifriction bearings are also vital parts of bomb sights and gyro compasses which make possible successful high altitude and blind flying.

In case of the M–4 tank, the popular one, it uses more than 100 antifriction bearings and almost as many are used in a light tank.

In the case of guns for both the Army and Navy, antifriction bearings support the operating mechanisms of these guns. Some of them have as many as 50 antifriction bearings.

On seagoing craft one would not generally think of antifriction bearings in connection with this equipment, but there are thousands of antifriction bearings in the various pieces of equipment necessary to man these ships.

Motor transport and combat vehicles have assembled in them as many as 60 antifriction bearings. These vehicles, of course, are used in all branches of the service.

RAILROAD EQUIPMENT USING ANTIFRICTION BEARINGS

Roller bearings greatly increase the availability and utilization of steam, electric, Diesel-electric locomotives and passenger-train equipment. They help to make high-speed trains possible. The Pullman Co. uses roller bearings on all new cars. Hundreds of existing freight and steam locomotives have been converted to, or built new on roller bearings, and these locomotives are doing a vastly increased amount of work.

Records kept by the railroads themselves show that locomotives are doing a vastly increased amount of work.

Records kept by the railroads themselves show that locomotives with all axles on roller bearings will make from 33 to 100 percent more miles in the same period of time than similar locomotives on friction bearings * * * and the maintenance costs on roller-bearing locomotives is from 30 to 42 percent less. The general concept of nations at war is that costs do not mean much in winning a war, but when these savings in costs are translated into a saving in manpower and vital materials it means a great saving in time, which is the vital element in winning a war. The use of roller bearings on freight cars is now a very active subject, as roller bearings will eliminate hot boxes and remove all speed restrictions as far as the bearings are concerned, which will make possible an approach to one-speed railroading on many railroads.

EQUIPMENT OF SUPPORTING INDUSTRIES DEPENDS ON BEARINGS

Aside from these major pieces of war equipment in which antifriction bearings are such a definite part, we should think also in terms of the supporting industries and mechanisms which are necessary to round out our war machine. A few examples are the construction of airports which requires all types of equipment such as mixers, tractors, shovels, crushers, graders, scarifiers, paving machinery, conveyors, cranes, compressors, screens, locomotives, and bulldozers.

The mining of such important ores as nickel, copper, molybdenum and many others requires many different types of machinery similar to that used in the steel industry and all of them require antifriction bearings.

This same thing holds true in the grain-milling industry, the ceramic industry, the electrical industry, the rubber industry, the refrigerator industry, the paper industry, the automotive industry, the construction industry, the lumbering industry, farm-equipment industry, coal-mining industry, textile industry, petroleum industry, fuel industry, cement industry, and many others. All these industries have been antifrictionized in the past 25 years, and they, and their specialized machinery are of vital importance in supporting the primary war industries engaged in the actual production of fighting equipment.

For this reason, such pieces of modern equipment that are essential to supporting the war program carry high priority ratings, and that equipment could not and cannot be bilt without antifriction bearings.

Dewey's Naval Victory and the American Pioneers in the Philippines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD J. WELCH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 12, 1944

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the following address delivered by the Honorable Sergio Osmeña, Vice President of the Philippines, entitled "Dewey's Naval Victory and the American Pioneers in the Philippines," which was delivered on April 3, 1944, before the Naval Academy Woman's Club at Annapolis, Md.:

Madam President, distinguished members of the club, and friends: I am deeply thankful to you for the opportunity afforded me to address you today. I have chosen for my subject "Dewey's Naval Victory and the American Pioneers in the Philippines." I have done this for two reasons: First, because it is in Annapolis where your famous Naval Academy is located and I wish to honor one of the academy's most distinguished graduates—Dewey; second, because Admiral Dewey's gallant fight at Manila Bay almost 45 years ago cannot be considered any longer as an isolated exploit of a great commander. It is, in fact, the starting point of a political association between the United States and the Philippines—a partnership of mutuality and helpfulness that has been carried out successfully during all these years and has contributed greatly to the happiness and welfare of our two peoples.

The event that brought the United States to the Philippines in 1898 was the outbreak of the Spanish-American War. Commodore Dewey, who was in command of the American Pacific squadron then in Hong Kong, was ordered to Manila Bay to engage the Spanish Fleet there. "You must capture vessels or destroy," instructed the cable of the Secretary of the Navy. After waiting 2 days for information from the Philippines, Dewey left for Manila, entering its bay on the night of April 30 in disregard of the mines and fortifications therein. He then circled past the water front, ignoring shots fired by Manila batteries, and proceeded to Cavite where the Spanish Fleet under Admiral Montojo was formed in battle line.

The engagement did not take long. In the morning of May 1, at 5:41, with Dewey's command, "You may fire when you are ready, Gridley," the American squadron commenced the attack, keeping it up until 7:45 a. m., when Dewey, confident of victory, retired. At 11:16 a. m. he reengaged the enemy, but by this time most of the Spanish ships were aflame and sinking, while others had fled, seeking protection behind Cavite Point. At 12:30 p. m. a white flag was hoisted on the Government Building at Cavite and the firing ceased. Thus, Admiral Dewey, with his little squadron, composed of the Olympia, his flagship, and the Baltimore, Raleigh, Petrel, Concord, and Boston, in less than a day, destroyed the sea power of Spain in the Philippines. Having accomplished this, Dewey then proceeded to effect a blockade of the city of Manila, isolating it from the outside world.

Important as was the Battle of Manila Bay, it was only incidental to the big military operations conducted by the United States in the Caribbean. In that area she waged war on Spain with a definite purpose—that of liberating Cuba. In the Philippines she had no avowed objective except to destroy Spanish power in the islands. When this was accomplished the United States could have withdrawn from the islands after the signing of the armistice between the American and Spanish forces. But Dewey's great victory in Manila Bay had created an international situation from which the United States could not escape. Moreover, it brought the Filipino people within the domain of American solicitude and responsibility. The American people who had gone to war for the emancipation of Cuba could not, after Dewey's victory at Manila Bay, be reconciled with the idea of leaving another oppressed people any longer under Spain.

Thus, on October 28, 1898, the Secretary of State cabled this message to the American Commissioners who were negotiating the peace treaty with Spain at Paris:

"The sentiment in the United States is almost universal that the people of the Philippines, whatever is done, must be liberated from Spanish domination. * * *

"Consequently, grave as the responsibilities and unforeseen as the difficulties which are before us, the President can see but one plain path of duty—the acceptance of the Philippine archipelago."

With the assumption of this new responsibility, the question arose as to what to do with the Philippine Islands. Should they be colonized in the manner and style of the old colonizing powers, embarking the United States on the road to imperialism? Or should they be admitted as a State or Territory into the American Union? Or should they be granted outright independence?

To help solve the Philippine problem, President McKinley sent the first Philippine Commission—headed by Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, president of Cornell University, a great liberal and an outstanding scholar.

The Schurman commission arrived in Manila in February 1899, some time after the outbreak of hostilities between the American and Filipino forces. The only Philippine territory occupied by the Americans was the naval station at Cavite and the city of Manila. Manila was forced to surrender under a combined Filipino-American pressure. All the other provinces and islands of the Philippines were under the control of an independent government of the Philippines which was set up by the Filipinos a month before at Malolos. This situation naturally increased the responsibilities and difficulties of the commission. It not only had to make a study of the conditions of the islands among a hostile population but also had to help the United States Army in the task of acquainting the people with America's altruistic purposes.

To understand the situation that faced the Schurman commission at this time, it is necessary to consider the existing political temper in the islands. The Filipino people, repeatedly subjected to injustices and abuses, had tired of airing their grievances and of petitioning without avail for redress. Their clamors for urgent and essential reforms in the government remained unheeded. Having exhausted all peaceful means, they turned to the last recourse—revolution.

When the revolt was of a local character it was easy for the Spanish Government to quell it. But in 1896 the revolution acquired national proportions. It spread not only to the provinces surrounding Manila but to other islands in the south as well. Indeed, it became so menacing that the Spanish Government had to compromise with its leaders in the famous Pact of Biak-na-bato—by the terms of which Spain agreed to initiate reforms in the government and to give indemnity to the Filipinos in exchange for the surrender of arms and the exile of the Filipino leaders. Neither of the parties—Spaniard or Filipino—intended to live up to his bargain. The Spaniard had hoped that with the exile of the Filipino leaders the people would calm down, while the Filipinos, with the indemnity money paid them, intended to purchase arms. It was at this time that the Spanish-American War broke out.

It is interesting to note that Dewey was instrumental in bringing Aguinaldo, the exiled leader of the revolution, back to the islands. In him, Dewey and the other military commanders found a ready ally in the war against Spain. On the other hand, Aguinaldo, in lending his support to the American forces, had hoped that the Philippines would be eventually independent. Given the signal to resume the struggle against Spain, the forces of the revolution swept from Province to Province, forcing the capitulation of Spanish garrisons and finally reaching the gates of the city of Manila.

When the Treaty of Paris, of December 10, 1898, was signed, by the terms of which the Philippines was ceded by Spain to the United States, the Filipinos became bitterly disappointed. They questioned the legitimacy of the transfer, since the ceding power no longer had any possession of the islands. In addition, they entertained doubts as to the real intention of the United States in the Philippines. To enlighten them and to win their confidence became, therefore, the immediate task of the Commission. They exhausted every method of conciliation to win popular support for the cause of peace and the acceptance of American sovereignty.

In a proclamation the Commission declared that the aim and object of the American Government "* * * is the well-being, the prosperity, and the happiness of the Philippine people and their elevation and advancement to a position among the most civilized peoples of the world."

Although no immediate results could be achieved by the Commission in its peace efforts, Dr. Schurman and his colleagues rendered signal service to the United States by helping the military authorities in the islands expound to the people the liberal policy and beneficent aims of the United States in the Philippines. Upon the completion of its studies and investigations, the Commission returned to the United States and submitted its report. This report is one of the most important documents in the history of Philippine-American relations. It served as a basis for Executive pronouncements and congressional actions. Although the Commission did not recommend the granting of immediate independence or the admission of the Philippines into the American Union, it clearly stated in its report that ultimate independence is the aspiration and goal of the Filipinos, including the conservative elements that at that time were opposed to immediate independence. To reconcile the political rights and privileges of the Filipinos with the democratic traditions and sovereign rights of the United States, the Commission recommended from the very outset "to extend to the Filipinos larger liberties of self-government than Jefferson approved of for the inhabitants of Louisiana." In such a scheme of government the people were to be allowed to elect the members of the lower house of the legislature.

Filipino resistance, in the face of America's superior arms and of her liberal pronouncements, could not last long. Foreseeing the termination of hostilities, President McKinley sent to the Philippines a second Commission, headed by an outstanding jurist, William H. Taft, to exercise the powers of a quasi civil government in the islands.

For the guidance of the Commission, the President signed a letter of instructions drawn by a great statesman, Secretary Root. In those instructions, the President enjoined the Commission that the welfare of the islands should be a paramount consideration and, among other things, said:

"In all the fields of government and administrative provisions which they are authorized to prescribe, the Commission should bear in mind that the government which they are establishing is designed not for our satisfaction or for the expression of our theoretical views, but for the happiness, peace, and prosperity of the people of the Philippine Islands, and the measures adopted should be made to conform to their customs, their habits, and even their prejudices to the fullest extent consistent with the accomplishment of the indispensable requisites of just and effective government."

In compliance with the instructions, the Commission proceeded to prepare a municipal code and a provincial law which invested the people with the power of exercising wide autonomy in their municipal governments and a considerable autonomy in their provincial governments. The Commission also passed a civil-service act which specifically provided that other things being equal Filipinos should be preferred for governmental positions.

Subsequently, three Filipinos were appointed to the Commission and when Congress had under consideration a bill providing a more definite organization for the government of the Philippines, Governor Taft, siding with Mr. Cooper, the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, and with other liberals in the House, fought vigorously for the inclusion in the bill of the provision, giving to the Filipino people an elective assembly. In his whole administration, Mr. Taft, as President of the Commission, and as Civil Governor, emphasized that the motto of the government was "the Philippines for the Filipinos."

It is to the credit of the United States that for the purpose of the pioneering work in the islands, men of the highest qualifications were chosen. Mr. Taft and his colleagues of the Commission ably tackled the difficult initial problems of government. Through their patience and tact, limitless energy and enthusiasm, consideration, and sympathetic understanding, they won for the United States the good will of the Filipino people.

In the successful execution of America's high purposes in the Philippines, such competent and firm direction as that lent by Taft and his colleagues was, of course, indispensable. But this alone could not have been sufficient. It was necessary to enlist the full cooperation of all the other elements. I wish to speak of the magnificent contribution rendered by each of them.

In the first place, the American soldiers are to be commended for their exemplary conduct during the military campaign in the islands. Led and inspired by such outstanding military commanders as Generals Otis and Arthur MacArthur, they generally respected the rights and liberties of the civilian population as far as military necessity permitted. They treated their prisoners-of-war in accordance with the rules of international law.

In the administration of civil affairs during the military regime, their work was most constructive. They facilitated the resumption of the normal functioning of courts of justice and issued general orders governing marriage and criminal procedure which are in force up to the present. They supervised with fairness and impartiality the first municipal elections held in the Philippines under the American flag. Many of them accepted commissions in the Philippine Constabulary, a national police organization, which became a very important factor in the maintenance of peace in the islands. Others became teachers. Nothing was more inspiring than to see American soldiers, in the towns and barrios they had occupied, putting aside their rifles, and with book in hand, repairing to the public schools to teach the children of those whom they had only recently faced in the field of battle. But that was what actually took place—and that was the spirit that was to win over the Filipinos in those crucial days.

In its first proclamation in 1899, the Schurman commission declared the establishment of elementary schools and the provision for appropriate facilities for higher education to be of cardinal importance in the American program for the islands. And one of the first acts of the Taft commission provided for the appointment of more than 1,000 American teachers. These teachers and the others who followed them became missionaries of good will and the exponents of American democracy among the masses. They did a marvelous work because of their zeal and solicitude and considering the conditions they had to work under. Often, they had to stay in far and remote places, devoid of conveniences they had been used to. The zeal of these teachers was repaid fully, however, by the enthusiasm shown by the people for education. No people ever accepted the blessings of education more readily than the Filipinos. This is the reason why we never had to pass a law making public education compulsory.

In the report of the Schurman commission, there was recognized as a basic need for a sound organization of the executive branch of the Government, the existence of a body of honest and efficient government officials and employees. When the Taft commission was organized, the fifth act approved by them was that providing for a civil-service system in which merit and fitness alone should govern, and these qualifications were to be determined by competitive examination. Many Americans from the United States Civil Service went to the Philippines to take part in the work started by the Taft commission. They were diligent and honest, courteous, and efficient.

One of the early problems that faced the new government was that of public health and sanitation. The incidents and mortality due to certain diseases were high all over the islands. Every now and then epidemics of smallpox or cholera would break out. Under American leadership, vigorous health measures were taken, such as compulsory vaccination and the building of artesian wells, and steps were taken to prevent the transmission of disease by the rat, fly, and mosquito. Infant mortality, too, was reduced. In the organization of the bureau of health and its branches in the provinces, in the establishment of hospitals and dispensaries and maternity clinics, and in the quarantine service, American technical assistance was invaluable and doctors and nurses made a splendid record.

The lawyers who were appointed to the bench were men of honor, learning, and ability and they helped in establishing in the islands an independent judiciary. Those who entered into the law practice were fair-minded and able men, and they helped in setting up a high standard for the legal profession. Both judges and law practitioners, solicitous of the people's welfare, poor and rich alike, cooperated together in winning from the masses faith and confidence in the administration of justice.

In the building up of a strong national structure, roads and other transportation facilities to develop trade and promote understanding are essential. When the civil government was established, with Governor Taft at the head, the old Spanish road system of less than a thousand miles throughout the islands was almost destroyed. Most of those roads were impassable during the rainy season, and the facilities for travel in the dry season were very limited. The problem facing the Commission was not only to repair and widen the old roads but to build new ones. A constructive policy for the building, repair, and maintenance of roads was adopted by the Commission, and experienced engineers were brought from the United States. These engineers, through their technical ability, industry, and endurance, carried out the program with marked success. These engineers were also helpful in the construction of waterworks, artesian wells, and public buildings.

The American missionaries of all denominations and sects who came to the islands were among those who rendered valuable service to the Filipino people. As soon as the flames of war died down, they established schools and missionary centers, to work among the native inhabitants, often in remote places, helping them to improve their lot and do away with diseases and prejudices. While these missionaries did their religious and missionary work with zeal, they did nothing to prevent other existing religious organizations from carrying on their religious activities and professions. Religious freedom, in place of religious intolerance, became the rule in the new regime in which the church became separated from the state. This was one of the blessings of democracy which America brought to the Philippines.

When the main body of the Army was withdrawn from Philippine service, many enterprising Americans who came with the Army established themselves in the islands as independent businessmen, farmers, and manufacturers. Many of them, after a few years of toil became prosperous. With the increase of Philippine trade with the United States and other countries, greater impetus was given to the economic development of the islands, and outside capital was especially needed. In a large measure, however, it may be said that the greater portion of American capital invested in the Philippines before the war did not come from the United States but was made right there and multiplied by these enterprising men.

In addition to these groups, there were individual Americans, scientists, researchers and economists, journalists and writers, educators, industrialists, and others, who came to the Philippines to add their contribution to the islands' political, social, educational, and economic development. Each, working in his own way, helped to lay the foundations of a new nation.

All these people were the pioneers of America in the islands. They worked closely together to make the American adventure in the Philippines a success. They were the ones who blazed the trails of good and humane government in the islands, and set the pattern which has been consistently followed in the succeeding years. They were the ones who, for a time, suffered the natural coldness and indifference of a people newly conquered and who waded through their prejudices and indifference to win for America in the end the everlasting and fervent affection, gratitude, and loyalty of the Filipino people.

Nothing, of course, could have been accomplished without the support and cooperation of the Filipino people themselves. The environmental factors were indeed conducive to progress and development, but the principal reason why so much success was made within a relatively short period of time was that America found in the Philippines a people possessing a basic culture, politically conscious, ready for the exercise of the prerogatives and duties of self-government, and responsive to the continuing demands of progress.

It is said that shortly after his victory over the Spanish Fleet, Dewey, professing to ignore the possibility that Spain might be succeeded by the United States in the Philippines, prophesied that in 40 or 50 years a Japanese naval squadron might enter Manila Bay, as he had done, demanding surrender of Manila and the Philippines. As Dewey predicted, so the Japanese came. But one essential fact is to be noted and it is this: When America came, we Filipinos sided with America and fought against the existing sovereign. When 45 years later, Japan came, we Filipinos not only sided with America, the sovereign power, but ourselves voluntarily and spontaneously bore the brunt of the battle in defending the American flag.

The explanation for this is simple. Disregarding old colonial methods, America followed in the islands a policy that was humane, altruistic, and progressive. Her dealings with the people have been characterized not only by sincerity and good faith, but also by a spirit of liberalism, equality, and justice. She has complied with every promise made to them. She has administered the affairs of the islands as a true trustee not for her own benefit but for the benefit and welfare of the Filipino people. "The Philippines for the Filipinos" had been her guiding principle throughout all these years. She, therefore, has won not only the cooperation and support of the Filipino people but also their steadfast loyalty, gratitude, and faith.

In the building up of this faith we owe much not only to the pioneers of America in the Philippines but also to the multitude of men and women of good will and stout hearts who have since gone to our remote islands in the Pacific to join in the task of nation building, keeping in mind the welfare of our people and maintaining always the good name of America. Many of these have returned to the United States and are living here. Others like Dewey, Schurman, and Taft have passed away, but to all of them—living and dead—and, indeed, to those now suffering in enemy prison and concentration camps and to those still maintaining the spirit of resistance in the mountains of the Philippines, I wish to render a tribute of affection, admiration, and gratitude in behalf of my people.

Extending alongside Manila Bay, where 45 years ago Dewey won his laurels, there is the most beautiful boulevard in the Orient, which the Filipino people, in token of their affection and respect, named after Dewey. At one end of this boulevard is the monument to Jose Rizal, our national hero, and from this monument begins the Bonifacio Drive, named after our great revolutionary leader of 1896. Not far from this, running parallel, is Taft Avenue which itself meets the Father Burgos Drive, named after our priest-martyr, and ends with the plaza named after General Lawton. To the left of this plaza is the most important bridge, crossing the Pasig River, and named after William A. Jones, author of the organic act which promised independence to the Philippines. Inside the walled city is the Plaza McKinley, which was the old Spanish Government center, with the supreme court building on one side and the cathedral on the other. In that plaza Mr. Taft took his oath of office as the first civil governor of the Philippines.

In addition, there are three public parks and a parkway named after four Governors General—Luke E. Wright, W. Cameron Forbes, Francis Burton Harrison, and Leonard Wood—while the main Philippine army post and training camp was named after the last Governor General and first United States High Commissioner to the Philippines—Frank Murphy.

As time goes on, other landmarks and monuments will doubtless be erected in honor of individual Americans and Filipinos who distinguished themselves in the service of the Filipino people, both in war and in peace. Among these, I envision a simple one—a great square block of native stone—dedicated to the imperishable memory of those who fell in the Battle of the Philippines, sealing with their sacrifices the enduring friendship and solidarity of our two peoples. I propose to have it lettered thus: "To all those, known and unknown, whose mingled blood was shed for the defense of America and the Philippines and for the glory of God."

Are We Heading for Fascism?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over Station WSOO, Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., and WMAM, Marinette, Wis., April 9, 1944:

We are today engaged in our most serious war. Today we are facing probably the most critical time in the history of our Nation. After all, we never really got into World War No. 1, although we rejoice in the fact that it was undoubtedly our entry at a critical period which swayed the balance in favor of our allies and brought the war to a speedy conclusion before we had an opportunity to get into it with both feet.

So, I say to you that the last previous real crisis in our national history was during the days of the Civil War. In Abraham Lincoln's time our problem was to keep America a united nation. Today our problem is equally serious. It is to keep a united nation American.

What are the principles of our republican form of government as guaranteed to us by our Constitution? That Constitution branded us as a Republic of 48 sovereign States banded together to establish a society founded on the rights of the individual. Our Constitution limits the powers of the Federal Government. It declares that the rights of the people are inviolable. It declares that those people are to be free from government control. Our forefathers fought for our independence because of their desire to establish these principles of government. They fought against taxation without representation, but we have it today in many of the regulations promulgated by some of our bureaus here in Washington. Our Constitution provided that the individual violations of the rights of others was to be protected by regulation, by laws, and by policing. Throughout all the days of history we have fought for a classless system in this Nation until recent years. Remember, back in the Civil War days, the admonition of President Lincoln that no nation can long exist half slave and half free; yet today some of our bureaucrats in Washington are deliberately fostering a society by classes, crosscut by religious, educational, and economic groups.

Now, why? Why do these economic planners in Washington, operating under a cloak of war secrecy, try to impose a foreign political ideology upon this Nation? Is it to keep themselves secure in a governmental position for all time? Or is it because they seek to prepare the American people and the American Government, and the American economy for participation in some ideological world state? It is a problem with which we must all be very seriously concerned at this precise moment.

Last week I discussed with you the perfectly obvious program, adopted in Washington by certain of those within the high councils of our Government or certainly within the high bureaucracy in our Government, who seek to impose upon us some form of National Socialism. I promised to discuss with you today the other philosophies, and particularly the Fascist philosophy of government adopted by another school of thought among these long-haired post-war planners here in Washington, who work steadfastly, and very effectively, I assure you, while our patriotic loyal constitutionalist Americans have their eyes on our immediate goal of winning this war.

First of all, we have at large in this country a group of American Marxian Communists, very effectively operating to conceal or becloud the ultimate aims of those who actually are in the drivers' seat. Recently, they have concentrated their efforts under the left-wing branch of American labor leaders and now have come out in the forefront openly as the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O., supposedly headed by Sidney Hillman. According to the Dies committee, as reported in two recent lengthy speeches on the floor of the House, by the chairman, MARTIN DIES (Democrat, of Texas), into this C. I. O. political action group has been corralled practically all of the communistic, or pink, radical labor leaders and their spokesmen in this Nation.

According to Mr. DIES, the announced policy of this organization has been to raise a political campaign fund of around $2,000,000 to besmirch and besmear and to bring about the defeat of any and all Members of Congress, who refuse to be dictated to by this group. According to the laws of our country, it is illegal for an employer of labor to contribute more than $5,000 to a political campaign fund. It is illegal to contribute anything to any campaign fund in exchange for a promise of political support after election. It would be regarded as an unfair labor practice and the employer subject to prosecution under the National Labor Relations Act, were he to solicit campaign contributions among the personnel of his organization. Yet, according to the newspapers, it has recently become the open policy of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee to have its henchmen circulate through various war plants in this Nation in which they have a closed-shop contract, on company time and, therefore, actually because their time is chargeable to a Government contract, they are, in effect, on Government time, demanding from each and every worker a stipulated assessment of $1—or in some cases $2—as a contribution to their political campaign fund. Should this supposedly free American citizen refuse to contribute thereto, he is subject to dismissal from the union and having been thus dismissed, because of the closed-shop contract, he not only loses his job in that plant but loses the right to work in any other plant in which the C. I. O. has a closed contract. Is this Americanism? Is this what free, liberty-loving Americans shall freely permit having imposed upon them in a Presidential election year?

The fact remains that it is being done and the further fact remains that the Attorney General of the United States, upon being challenged on this matter, has decreed that whereas—as I have previously stated is the case—an employer is precluded from contributing over $5,000 to a political campaign, the unions are perfectly within their rights in carrying out their program, which includes their announced intention of collecting over $2,000,000 for their participation in the coming campaign.

What these unions do not realize is this: Actually, we are not heading for communism in this country—Marxian communism which means that "everything is for the state and everything shall be owned by the state and equally distributed by the state." Instead what they do not realize is this: That for many years our starry-eyed dreamers in Washington really have been heading us for a Fascist or a Nazi state. Yet there is no more slurring epithet that the so-called liberals, or pinks, or radicals of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee love to level at all those who do not agree with them than to charge us with being a Fascist or a reactionary, or a Tory. Oh, how proud they are in their egotism, when they can level those epithets at us.

What these union leaders fail to realize in their egotistical enthusiasm is this, that the very Administration which they are so benignly following, and for which they are so enthusiastic, has taken from them—as is the basic program in the establishment of any Nazi or Fascist state—their principal bill of rights, namely, their right of collective bargaining. They have forgotten that while theoretically management and labor can still sit across the table and bargain collectively, nevertheless, they can only do so when Government also is represented at the same table. They have forgotten further that whatever decision has been arrived at by both management and labor, and even with the ever-present governmental agency acquiescing, still those agreements are subject to review by a further governmental agency, namely, a direct agency of the White House, which in the last analysis tells both management and labor what the ultimate decision will be. And if they don't like it, if they disagree with that decision, what recourse is left to them? Management can have its property seized under the War Powers Act by the Office of the Presidency. Thereupon, labor theoretically becomes an employee of the Government; labor's greatest weapon then becomes nullified, because should labor express its dissatisfaction with the Government decree by calling a strike, labor then is in the disreputable position of striking against the Government in war time. And so, I say to you listeners, that when any group presuming to speak for labor—and I know the C. I. O. Political Action Committee does not begin to speak for labor—seeks to unfairly and illegally influence an election at this time, they know not whereof they speak and the rank and file of American labor is not going to be misled by any such group, which has assumed wholeheartedly, and welcomed, according to MARTIN DIES, the support of Earl Browder and the lately disbanded American Communist Party, now exemplified by the American Labor Party in the State of New York.

What is the immediate program of attack of this C. I. O. political action group? It is principally that they intend to put on an intensive "educational campaign" all over the United States, and according to Mr. DIES, over 400 of their educational speakers, as presently advertised, are, or have recently been, members of the Communist Party of the United States. And that reminds me that very recently an outstanding American citizen, who talked off the record to a group of Congressmen here in Washington, and I was a member of that group, stated that he was told in Russia by Mr. Stalin himself that "some time you people in America are going to wake up. We tried Marxian communism over here for many years and we found that it simply would not work. Eventually you people in America will wake up to the fact that it will not work over in America either." And he went on further to say that American Communists would be denied entry into what we like to call Communist Russia. They don't want them over there either.

Now, I have previously said that we are heading for a Fascist state in this country, or, perhaps, a Nazi state; and there is very little difference. I define Fascism in this manner, and I ask you whether or not in your opinion, after your careful consideration, it does not fit exactly to our present economy in this Nation?

"Fascism is the government control of the means of production and distribution and of the flow of capital, effected through government controls operated under a single political party system."

I repeat that because I want you to think that over carefully.

"Fascism is the government control of the means of production and distribution and of the flow of capital, effected through government controls operated under a single political party system."

In other words, under Fascism, as under Nazism, you have the sham or the delusion of private ownership, but every move you make is controlled by the government; in your production, in the distribution of your products, and in the flow of capital needed to keep you operating.

Every manufacturer, patriotically and courageously participating in the war production program is alarmed over his post-war future. Taxation is taking most of his profits and renegotiation is taking away from him not only any excess profits, but also is taking away from him any reserve which he may be setting aside to cover the cost of his reconversion to peacetime production. This is entirely in accord with the program of these Fascist-minded planners. At the conclusion of his war production effort, finding himself without any cash reserve, in order to reconvert and at the same time in order to meet his pay rolls, the manufacturer will be forced to go to the Government to borrow funds and this will effectively give the Government the ultimate control over his operation.

Let me give you one simple example illustrative of this program. I have a letter in my files from a relatively small but very capable manufacturer in my district, who last year did a half million dollars' worth of Government business. He showed a paper profit of roughly $145,000 of which taxes ate up $115,000. He set aside as a reserve for post-war adjustments $11,000, leaving him a net profit of $29,000. Now, this is not unreasonable bookkeeping, but along comes Mr. Renegotiation, and he takes $10,000 in addition to the taxes of $115,000, leaving the manufacturer a net profit for distribution among his stockholders of $20,000, and a reserve for post-war adjustments of but $4,000.

And remember this: No provision remains for the absorption of any losses. Government takes away the profits, but Government is never renegotiated to make good on any losses. That is simply the manufacturer's tough luck.

Now, surely the manufacturer's stockholders are entitled to their pittance, but how is that manufacturer going to be able to reconvert his plant to peacetime effort, meet his pay rolls to keep his employees working steadily without being forced to borrow money from the Government? When he does so, the Government will have a lien on that property and will dictate his means of production and his means of distribution, because the Government has control of his flow of capital—the money needed to operate that plant. I repeat, you have the sham of private ownership, but you also have complete Fascist control of that plant, and that is what is going on all over this country under our present program. It is up to us to put an end to it. Wake up, America, before it is too late.

Polish Agent Tells Mission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Raymond Daniell, from the Milwaukee Journal of April 7, 1944:

POLISH AGENT TELLS MISSION—BRAVED EYE OF GESTAPO

(By Raymond Daniell)

LONDON, ENGLAND.—In a room just off Piccadilly this correspondent talked with a blue-eyed earnest young Pole who had just returned from his own country, to which he had been sent in February 1943, by the late Premier Sikorski to serve as liaison officer between the exiled Polish Government in London and the Polish underground. For 11 months this 27-year-old officer, who prefers to be called George Jur because that is not the name he used on his dangerous mission, lived and worked under the unknowing eyes of the Gestapo.

He had some amazing adventures, but it was not of these he spoke so much as of the observations he made in the course of his travels around Poland. He had gained several pounds more weight and explained that this was because he and those underground friends who hid him from the Gestapo always felt that each meal might be his last. In Poland, he explained, it is patriotic to upset German economy by supporting the black market.

The Germans have practiced two kinds of terror in Poland, the agent said. In the territory west of the Curzon line, he said, it has taken administrative form. There, he said, it is unlawful to speak Polish on the streets, there are no schools for Polish children, and Poles are forbidden to move from one town to another without special permits. In the eastern territory which Russia claims, he said, extermination has been the apparent German aim, and since last October, when it became clear that a German withdrawal was inevitable, terror has increased.

SAW MASS EXECUTION

Jur said that there had been almost weekly mass executions in all large communities. In Warsaw he saw 100 of his countrymen lined up against a wall and shot by German policemen with tommy guns, while SS men saw to it that the populace kept 100 yards away and did not interfere. The victims, he said, had been forced to submit to blood transfusions for wounded German soldiers before they were executed, and stood like ghosts in their hospital shirts, hands bound behind them, eyes blindfolded and lips gagged so that they could not shout defiance.

Despite the terror, Jur said he found his countrymen more united than in times of peace and more determined than when they chose to fight rather than surrender to Hitler. Germany has not yet found a Quisling among them, he declared.

One of the charges the Soviets have made against the Mikolajczyk government in London is that it has no roots in its own country. Jur said that on the contrary probably not more than 5 percent of his people, or a little more than the total Communist Party membership before the war, opposed the policies of the Mikolajczyk government.

DENIES DISTINCTION IS MADE

"What the people outside Poland do not understand," he said, "is that the people there are not drawing any distinction between those who left and those who stayed home, as long as they are fighting for Poland."

Jur described what happened when the Russians penetrated early in January what before the war was Polish territory. Wherever the Russians appeared, he said, underground officials approached the Russian commanders, identified themselves by showing the colors of Poland, together with a certificate bearing the seal of the Deputy Prime Minister resident in Poland, and offered to help.

When he left Poland, he said, there was considerable uncertainty about how the offer was being received, for in some places it was reported the Russians had welcomed the proffered aid and in others, according to unconfirmed reports, they had either shot or arrested those who offered it.

EXPECTED BALKAN INVASION

Morale in Poland is still good, Jur said, although there was a wave of disappointment when, after the Italian collapse, the expected Anglo-American invasion of the Balkans did not materialize. By this time, he said, it had been hoped in Poland that Anglo-American forces would be "closer to central Europe." Now, said Jur, Polish underground leaders are hoping that Russia will allow them to administer civil affairs at least west of the Curzon line and that Soviet administration to the east at least will be carried on under the eyes of American and British observers.

While the present government now has the support of the bulk of the people, it may lose that support if it agrees to cede eastern territories to Russia in exchange for east Prussia, because that would be regarded as treason, Jur declared. "The people are beginning to ask, "What are we fighting for?" He said, "A country cannot keep moving from west to east and east to west."

Speedy Ending of Global War Desired by All People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, bringing the world war to a successful and speedy conclusion is desired by all American citizens. Today the House begins consideration of the naval appropriations bill for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1944, and ending July 1, 1945. This bill calls for an enormous appropriation of $32,000,000,000, and the Navy Department officials have asked for this amount so as to have increased airplanes, ships, and men for the activities against Japan in the Pacific. This legislation concerns the Navy, the Marine Corps, and United States Coast Guard. The best way to bring a speedy victory, is to carry out the program of the Navy and the Army.

When the United States found itself forced into a global war by the attack on the part of Japan against Pearl Harbor there was no alternative, and during my service in the House of Representatives, I have supported every effort made to build an army and to build a navy, and to create an air force second to none in the world. A remarkable job has been done by the men in charge of this program. Figures submitted by the committee, and according to testimony before the Appropriations Committee, indicate the strength and power of this Republic of ours. They plan by July 1, 1945, to have a personnel of 3,657,437 officers and men, including the women's units, under Navy jurisdiction. Under this pending legislation, the Navy by July 1, 1945, will have over 10,000 self-propelled ships and over 74,000 vessels of other descriptions. They will have over 37,000 aircraft.

The expenditures called for are large, but they are necessary. At the same time emphasis should be placed upon efficiency and economy on our domestic front. Government bureaus, not having to do directly with the war effort, should be reminded by Congress that bungling and waste and extravagance in connection with the money of the taxpayers of this Nation is not to be tolerated.

There has been too much of that type of effort. There is now pending in Congress legislation which will bring the different department heads before Congress, require them to answer questions, and give reasons for the request for increased appropriations on the part of bureaus and bureaucrats. Such legislation ought to be enacted. It will have a wholesome effect upon different department heads, whose chief aim in life is to see how much money they can spend. Such a practice is not calculated to help in the war effort.

Preparations for Peace on the Home Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith the very timely, sound, and appropriate speech delivered by the Honorable James F. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization, in New York before the Academy of Political Science last evening. While we all agree that the winning of this war is the most important objective before us today, it is well that these post-war problems be considered now. I repeat that it is as essential to prepare for peace in time of war as it is to prepare for war in time of peace.

Justice Byrnes has ably presented some of these post-war problems and wisely suggested some of the answers in the following speech:

We have reason to be proud of the success of our armed forces. But we must not be blind to the task ahead of us. American and British Armies are approximately 500 miles from Berlin. The Russian forces are about the same distance on the other side from Hitler's capital. In the Pacific we are 1,800 miles from Tokyo and the British in Burma are approximately the same distance.

The roads to Berlin and Tokyo are not only long but bloody. Already our casualties, including killed, wounded, missing, and prisoners, number 173,239; United Kingdom, 667,157; and the Soviet Republic, 4,500,000.

The casualties of the enemy are almost double those of ourselves and our allies, and we expect to keep them in that ratio.

Some are impatient at our lack of progress in Italy. No other major European battlefield on which we might choose to fight or on which we might be forced to fight, can give the enemy the natural defense advantages that the Nazis have at Cassino. But on the whole the Italian campaign is a success. Our major victory is the defeat of Italy, the opening of the Mediterranean, the control of the Adriatic, the control of Italian air bases, the transfer of the Italian Fleet, and the tying up of 19 German divisions during the period of crucial Russian operations.

Ahead of us is the greatest military adventure in the history of the world. Of the part our forces will play in that great drama we can say nothing, and those of us at home can do little. We must wait—and we must pray.

While the armed forces are winning the war we must prepare to win the peace. That is a necessary part of our war effort. The knowledge that the Government is planning for the transition of war to peace should relieve industry, agriculture, and labor of the fear of post-war depression and unemployment. It should help those on the home front and on the fighting front to concentrate on winning the war.

Because we have changed from the defensive to the offensive, it has already been possible for us to cut back some programs. These cut-backs are not primarily for the purpose of producing civilian goods. They are cut-backs in war programs no longer urgent, in order to expedite war programs that are urgent. The cut-backs in the Army programs approved for 1944 and 1945 amount to $16,750,000,000. That does not include the air service.

A review of the spare-parts programs of the Army and Navy just completed indicates that by December 31, 1944, there will be reductions in these programs for the Army aggregating $1,000,000,000 and for the Navy aggregating $402,000,000.

The Goverment must take a firm stand and close plants no longer needed in the war effort. From civic groups and from men in public office, there will come the cry, "Woodman, spare that plant." But we must realize that Santa Claus has gone; that there are no more plants to distribute, but there are many more bills to pay. It will be far better for communities to have plants closed now when the employees can find other jobs, than to continue operating and later close the plants when employees may not be able to find jobs.

The constructive report of B. M. Baruch and John Hancock on the problems of post-war readjustments has gone far to dispel the fog of controversy which had hung over the discussions of the termination of war contracts and the disposition of surplus property.

Legislation is necessary to effectively solve these problems. However, from my long experience in the Congress, I realize that delays in legislation are unavoidable. I believe it essential for the Executive to take no chances but to proceed to the fullest extent possible under existing law.

While waiting for legislation we have established an interdepartmental board to unify and simplify the procedures of our procurement agencies in handling contract terminations. The Government will promptly pay contractors and promptly remove war materials no longer required, in order to make room for the installation by manufacturers of equipment and materials for civilian production.

The more difficult problems center about the freezing of capital which industry has tied up in terminated war contracts. Procurement agencies must have the power to settle and pay promptly items on which they and the contractors agree.

Where claims cannot be settled by agreements, we must make adequate provision for interim financing of war contractors, particularly of small business which has only limited working capital of its own.

We must give adequate authority to the procurement agencies to take over and settle in appropriate cases the claims of subcontractors.

We must authorize the procurement agencies to make advance or partial payments on account and we must give a contractor the right to require a procurement agency to make, within a reasonable stated period of time, its determination of the value of the contractor's claim and to pay, on account, a substantial portion of such determination.

A Surplus War Property Administrator has been appointed. He has called upon the procurement agencies for an inventory. If we wait to get a complete inventory from all war theaters, the inventory will be only of historical value. But we will secure an inventory in sufficient detail to enable us to know what surpluses we have and where they are located. This list of surplus materials will be furnished to each procurement agency and no agency will purchase additional supplies without first consulting that list in order to ascertain if Government supplies are already available.

Our surplus supplies must be disposed of at a fair price, and as rapidly as possible without demoralizing trade and industry. There must be no scrapping or destruction of useful property. Private monopolies must not be created or strengthened. Small independent local businesses must be given preference and industrial loans made available to them on appropriate terms.

The Government's wartime investment in new plants and new machinery amounts to approximately fifteen and and a half billions. But about one-third of this amount is invested in plants specially designed for the manufacture of munitions which could have little or no peacetime use.

The problem of disposition, however, is enormously aggravated because 70 percent of the Government's total plant investment is in projects costing more than $10,000,000 each. The Surplus Property Administrator must be authorized to lease as well as sell these plants if independent and local enterprises are to be given an opportunity to take over any of the larger plants. And where possible, we must subdivide the larger units.

We cannot consider the problems of transition from war to peace without considering the problems of the farmer, the worker, and the returning soldier.

Agriculture, no less than industry, has established unprecedented production records in this war. The farmers must not be penalized for their war effort as they were after the last war, with widespread foreclosures and bankruptcies.

Steps have already been taken to protect the farmers from a repetition of such a disaster. In the Stabilization Act of October 2, 1942, the Congress, acting on the President's recommendation, authorized the Commodity Credit Corporation to make loans on basic crops at the rate of 90 percent of parity for 2 full crop years after the formal termination of hostilities.

The full significance of this provision may not be realized. Within 2 years after the last war the net income of our farmers was cut in half. The Government now guarantees that it will not happen after this war. It is a wise policy not only for the farmers, but for the Nation as a whole. It gives assurance that after this war we will have a policy not of scarcity but of food abundance.

Full crops will mean employment for those engaged in transporting, financing, and selling them. The purchasing power of the farmers will turn the wheels of industry. Full crops will give our people health and strength. The mass of our people under conditions of full employment brought about by the war has been eating more food than ever before. We should see to it that they have the means to continue to do so.

Such surpluses as we can produce will be necessary to help replenish our reserves and to help the war-devastated countries during the period of rehabilitation. Such help is not misguided philanthropy. It is intelligent self-interest and plain common sense.

In the national interest the Government also has a duty to help labor tide over the period of transition from war to peace. The workers want work—productive work. But workers cannot create jobs that do not exist. The war has caused great movements of labor from State to State, from industry to industry, from farm and home to industry, and from farm, home, and industry into the armed forces. Not only have we taken 11,000,000 able-bodied men and women into the services, but the net increase in industrial employment between 1937 and 1944 is estimated to be more than seven and one-half million.

Even if industry is helped to reconvert with unprecedented speed, even if agriculture is helped to continue a policy of abundance, there is bound to be considerable unavoidable unemployment during the adjustment period, and the problem wil' be much more aggravated for some types of work than for others.

We cannot say to our service men and women, or to the men and women who supplied them with food and munitions, "You must shift for yourself until you find a job." That sort of attitude can only bring discredit upon, and sap the strength of, our system of free, private enterprise.

A retraining and reemployment administration has been established and is coordinating the activities of the various agencies having anything to do with veterans' a fairs. There will be established in every urban center an information office where the veteran can learn what assistance he can secure from the Government, and talk with an individual handling the particular kind of assistance in which he is interested.

Congress has already provided mustering-out pay for our service men and women. The broadest possible facilities have been provided for their retraining and opportunities will be accorded to those who wish to continue their education. Not only must we do everything possible to find or create jobs for our service men and women, but we must provide unemployment benefits for them until they do find jobs.

Some persons have urged that a dismissal wage be paid to workers on their discharge and that the cost of dismissal wages be recognized by the Government as part of the cost of contract termination. However, the dismissal wage would bear no exact relation to the needs of the workers, and some who might quickly find new jobs would get more than they needed while others would get much less. If the dismissal wages were limited to employees of war contractors, it would unfairly discriminate against workers in essential civilian industries. And it is difficult to draw a line between war workers and nonwar workers.

The dismissal wage would be exceedingly difficult of fair and equitable application, but we should realize that neither industry nor government will be able to resist the demand for dismissal pay unless a better alternative is offered to them.

The existing State unemployment-insurance laws were framed to meet local conditions of temporary unemployment and are not adequate to deal with the Nation-wide problem of reemployment. Demobilization must be regarded as a national problem and its costs as part of the costs of the war.

I think the most constructive approach to this problem is to supplement existing State unemployment benefits to the extent necessary to give workers, during the transition from war to peace, suitable unemployment benefits to be prescribed in a Federal demobilization law.

The Federal law could fix a maximum and minimum benefit. Within the range prescribed by the law the benefits payable should be a stated portion of the worker's previous earnings with allowances for the worker's dependents. In view of its purposes, the Federal law should cover practically all workers. If there is a waiting period it should be very limited. The number of weeks in any year that the benefits are payable should not be as restricted as they are under existing State laws. Those receiving benefits should report to the employment services and should lose their benefits if they refuse suitable employment. Such a plan might be put into effect after the collapse of the Nazis and be continued for a period after the war.

Of course no one would suggest that unemployment benefits should be considered as an adequate substitute for a real job. But in an interdependent society the worker cannot make his own job and the burden of unemployment must not be allowed to rest solely on the worker.

The proposal gives to private enterprise the assurance that its efforts to expand after the war will not be frustrated and stalled at the outset by unemployment and falling purchasing power. It gives private enterprise assurance that unavoidable unemployment shall not breed avoidable unemployment. It gives to all of us the assurance that our hopes for the future will not be blasted by growing social discontent during the period of transition from war to peace.

But all of our plans for the reconversion of industry and for the progressive improvement of agriculture and labor, however carefully and cautiously they may be worked out, are likely to come to naught if we have not the courage and self-restraint to withstand the threat of inflation.

The greatest danger to post-war reconstruction at home is the danger of inflation. If prices are to skyrocket and then fall, as they did after the last war, industry, agriculture, and labor are going to be hurt and our efforts to help all or any of them will be a failure.

So far, I think the American people can be proud of the fight that they have made against inflation. We have had to draw much more drastically upon our manpower and resources than during the last war. Yet in this war the cost of living has risen only 25.9 percent as against a rise of 64.6 percent during the comparable period of the last war. During the last year, with the help of the hold-the-line order and the judicious use of subsidies, the cost of living has not risen at all.

While we are now taxing our people more heavily, more money is left in the hands of our people after they have paid their taxes than they had during the last war. A large measure of credit for the success of our stabilization program must go to the mass of our people who have been patriotic and intelligent enough to save their money and buy war bonds.

If the people will preserve their purchasing power until after the war, not only will reconverted industry have a better market for its products, but the people will get better products for their money.

Our present stabilization program may not be perfect, but it has worked. So far as inflation is concerned, we are on a dangerous sea, and any group that rocks the boat now is taking on itself a grave responsibility.

The Price Control Act and the Stabilization Act expire on June 30, and legislation to extend them is now pending before the Congress. It seems clear to me that this is no time to tinker with those control measures. Any concession to any group will only invite demands for other concessions from other groups. As we value the future and the peace for which our boys are fighting and dying, we should stand firm against any relaxation in the fight against inflation.

If we do hold the line against inflation, when the war is over we can proceed with confidence to build for the future. We have the energies, the food and resources, the productive plants, the technical skills, the scientific knowledge, to supply in greater abundance than ever before the needs of our people.

Taxation which is best suited to the needs of a war economy is not at all suited for an expanding peace economy. With the end of the war there should be an end of the wartime system of taxation.

The history of tax legislation shows that the drafting and passage by Congress of a general tax bill frequently requires 6 months. We must avoid this delay. An interdepartmental committee is now working under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury upon proposals which he will submit to the Congress at the proper time. Congress is also studying the problem and I am sure that with the coming of peace, the Government will quickly provide a system of taxation that will enable us confidently to build for the future.

Nothing is more essential to peace and well-being of the world than a prosperous and fully employed America.

Out of this war we will come with great natural resources and greater productive capacity. We will have most of the gold of the earth and most of the ships on the seas and in the air. We will have a powerful Army and the most powerful Navy. Our economic and military strength will be greater than that of any nation on earth. The use we make of that power will be the test of our statesmanship.

More than our material prosperity is at stake. Of what value is our wealth and military strength compared with the lives of the boys, and girls too, who today are dying for us? My prayer is that God will inspire us to rise above selfishness and love of luxury, and demand that the power and wealth He has given us shall, at the peace table, be used to make certain that never again will the mothers of the world suffer the anguish and pain they now endure.

Are We Heading for Nazism?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, which I delivered over Station WSOO, Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., and WMAM, Marinette, Wis., April 2, 1944:

While most of us have our minds almost completely occupied with the most important immediate problem before us, namely, that of winning this war, nevertheless, we must realize there are others among us whose thoughts are concentrated on post-war planning. Some of those minds are very logically concentrated on post-war international problems in the hope that having won the war, we shall not lose the peace.

At the same time, there are among us here in Washington, as well as elsewhere in the Nation, many minds active in studying the post-war problems of internal economy and, unfortunately, for us many of those minds are engaged in working out ways and means by which they may utilize our present preoccupation with the all-important war effort—to remake America—to remake our constitutional and our traditional America into an entirely different America fashioned after the very European ideologies of National Socialism, Nazism, or Fascism, which our sons and daughters are being told they are being shipped overseas to eradicate from the world for all time.

This program is not a new one. These social planners for a new era have been given pretty much of a free reign for a number of years and they have made great headway. Various smoke screens have been thrown up from time to time to becloud the issues and afford an umbrella under which they could work very much unmolested. With this tremendous responsibility of global warfare occupying the minds of most of us, it affords a splendid field of action for them to sew, fertilize, and harvest their seeds of social revolution. If the American people do not realize the seriousness of this situation and wake up very shortly, it may be entirely too late and our returning sons and daughters will find that they are returning to a national socialistic economy—a Nazi form of goverment—that has been securely fastened upon their backs in their absence. The severity of their wrath will unquestionably be unheard of. The responsibility rests squarely upon us who have remained behind to preserve for them their constitutional form of government, a constitutional republic of America, which they left and which they were told they were being sent abroad to defend so they will be able to recognize it as such on their return. If we do not preserve that for them, well may we expect to have visited upon our heads either a bloodless or—God forbid—even a bloody revolution may come about—as recently predicted by none other than the Vice President of this Nation.

These new-era social planners—these long-haired boys and short-haired girls—justify their nocturnal schemings for a better America by consoling themselves with the fact that they feel they received a mandate from the people in the last three Presidential elections. They claim that their majority of votes for their New Deal is the essence of this new democracy, that they have been given a mandate to provide greater "liberalism" in our Government.

On the other hand, how frequently in discussions with shallow thinkers do we hear the statement made that, "The Republicans may have a chance next November if they will be but a little more liberal and a little less reactionary." The Republican Party now, as always, believes in liberalism—liberty for the individual as opposed to liberty of bureaucracy to impose all manner of restrictions on the life and liberty of the individual.

Well, now, if a majority of the votes be a symbol of democracy, can we not justly and by the same logic classify Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy as super-democracies? For in the last two elections held in Germany, Hitler was elected by receiving over 90 percent of the votes, and Mussolini had the backing of over 80 percent of his people. No, in my opinion if 54 to 60 percent of the popular vote received by one party in this country makes this a democracy, then I say we must bow to Europe's two high-powered dictatorships as the arch-democracies of all time.

No, my friends, do not let these ideologists becloud the issue. We are very definitely on the road to the establishment of a national socialistic or Nazi form of government in this country, or we are headed for a fascistic form of government. This week I shall discuss our trends toward a Nazi form of government. Next week I shall discuss our trends toward a Fascist form of government; and I am perfectly frank in telling you that there is little, if any, difference between the two, although the approach is slightly different.

National Socialism, or the German-Nazi form of government, stripped of all fanfare, simply means a system of government that readily enables those who gain control to exploit the entire nation for their particular selfish purposes.

Now what was the program employed in Germany to build up the Hitler regime, and how does it coincide step by step with the program which these long-haired men and short-haired women have skillfully put into effect in our country during the past decade?

First of all, the people must be made to feel that they are utterly incapable of solving their own problems. There must be inculcated a sort of a helpless feeling which can be solved only by some all-wise leader to whom they must look for the cure for all of their ills. We must in other words establish some super godfather who knows the answers to all questions. Times of economic distress, or through the creation of an emergency, furnishes the most fertile field in which such a seed can be sown and fertilized.

Secondly, the people must be told that the principle of local government, government by their local communities and their States is no longer capable of maintaining their economy. Therefore, the rights and duties of the local governments and of the State governments must be subordinated to a Federal Government operating under directives from the man-created god.

Third. Constitutional guaranties, under which we have become the richest and most powerful nation on earth, must be swept aside; which, perhaps, is most easily accomplished by ridiculing these guaranties as outmoded and as obstructions to progress. We must be reminded that the Constitution is a relic of the horse-and-buggy days or again, when a psuedo-patriotic smoke screen can be developed, we are told that the provisions of the Constitution guaranteeing to the States complete control over the powers of election must be suspended, in order that we may conduct a straw-vote type of Presidential and congressional election for our boys in uniform. Oh, how cleverly that scheme was worked out to help foist upon these very brave youngsters of ours the complete establishment of a Nazi government in America.

Fourth, public faith in laws—faith in the sanctity of our courts and our faith in the entire legal profession, those who defend us or seek redress for us before those courts of justice—must be completely destroyed. Remember that one of the basic doctrines in the philosophy of a totalitarian state is that there is no place for the lawyer; there is no place for the champion of the peoples' rights in such a state.

Fifth, the Congress—the duly elected lawmaking body of the people—must be intimidated by smear and slander, and mud throwing, through the activities of pressure groups, and time after time must be rebuked by the Executive in such a manner as to completely prevent the development of public confidence in the law-making body of the Nation, the only body duly elected by the voters of the Nation.

Sixth, economically, the people must be kept well under heel by the medium of high taxes. Thus, through the use of taxation, as a means of the confiscation of wealth, is a program unfolded to bring all classes of people down to a common level of income. Thus is initiative—thus is the spirit of free enterprise which made America great—effectively stifled by these economic planners. Economic independence is kept at a minimum and a citizen is forced to rely more and more upon the Government that controls him. Consequently, the control of capital and credit are thus completely held within the Federal Government itself.

Now, the next—or seventh—step is to build up a great public debt so the citizen can never escape his burdens of taxation and the result of this policy is that the Federal Government in effect becomes a virtual receiver for an entire nation in bankruptcy.

To put across their program, of course, these schemers must create a great distrust in all private enterprise. Private business, private industry, private initiative, private "know how"—without which the good Lord only knows where we would be in this war effort right today, and without the products of which our allies all over the world would be in a demoralizing route—all must be smeared and slandered and criticized by these planners, in order that the people may be intimidated against any attempt to rely on their own resources. Everything must be made subservient to the Federal Government and to the master who sits in the exalted driver's seat.

Instead of private business and initiative, governmental bureaus take over—governmental bureaus by the dozen, by the hundreds, are set up to control practically every phase of each citizen's life. These bureaus issue directives without number. They are their own lawmaking body; they are their own police force; they are their own prosecutors; they sit in judgment in rendering a decision against violators of their own directives. They constitute a government not of laws, but a government of men. A great number of them have no authority in law or even by the intent of an act of Congress, but instead are set up by, and responsible only to, the all-high Executive of the Federal Government.

And, lastly, in this program to create a Nazi America, must of necessity come a program to control the education of the youth of the Nation; to teach the youth as they grow up to become all subservient to the all-high power seated as the Executive head of this gigantic Federal governmental octopus. This program is now in the making down here in Washington, under a proposal to have the Federal Government appropriate around $300,000,000 a year to assist the States in their educational program. It has been approached in various ways, such as through the medium of a teacher subsidy, and again as through the method of direct subsidies to the schools themselves, working through a central State organization. It has been perfectly easy to build up logical arguments for its adoption. In the first place, due to the Federal Government's having taken over millions of acres of State- and county-owned property and lands, which are thus automatically removed from the tax rolls, the local school systems have become so impoverished as to be unable to meet their running expenses. Then, again, with the competition from high wages in war-production plants and with the effectiveness of the soldier draft, it has been indeed difficult to keep our schools supplied with an adequate teaching staff; hence develops a perfectly logical appeal for a Federal teachers' subsidy. But the inevitable result—when, and if, a Federal-aid program for education is adopted—will be that the Federal Government itself will assume control over the educational system of this country, and will quickly dictate the teaching policies of those educational institutions.

To supplement and fortify all of the foregoing program, so effectively worked out and proven effective in Germany—and which has been step by step imposed upon us in America—is kept flowing a steady stream of governmental propaganda designed to extol and praise all those who bow the knee, intentionally or unintentionally—while at the same time villifying or crucifying all those who dare to raise their voice in protest.

Ladies and gentlemen, National Socialism stands for a leveling process; it stands for a process that makes the lower classes among us think they are getting something for nothing; it keeps the efficient and thrifty people from rising and possibly getting out of hand. And at the same time it enriches the Treasury for the purposes of wasteful spending by the executive leader. I think we want none of this in this country and I think when the American people wake up to themselves and realize, after careful consideration, that this is what we have among us today, they will put an end to it.

Ladies and gentlemen, when I started broadcasting over this station, I was very properly requested by the management, who make these broadcasts possible, to refrain from partisan political discussions. I have steadfastly sought to adhere to that principle which is certainly perfectly logical. This question is not a partisan issue nor a question of partisan politics. It is a patriotic question of where we are heading in America. I feel it my sincere duty to give you my views and to call your attention to my reactions to what has been going on, what is going on, in Washington. To those of you who may feel that I have been indulging in a partisan political discussion here today, may I recommend to you that you read the Reader's Digest issues of last August and September. Much of what I have told you today you will find in an article entitled "America Is Being Made Over, and We Won't Like It" written by the Senior Democratic Senator from Wyoming, the Honorable JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY; and in the September issue, under the title "Don't Blame the Bureaucrat" is an article written by Chairman HATTON W. SUMNERS of the House Judiciary Committee, a Democrat from Texas, who has served 32 years in the House of Representatives.

Wake up America.

Furloughs for Overseas Men and Others

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 13, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, when the United States entered the World War, I promptly announced that the responsibility for conducting our war operations, in my opinion, rested upon the trained experts in the Army and the Navy. It has been my policy to support the programs of these Departments of our Government, and I have felt that in doing that I could render the best possible service to the men and women in our armed forces.

It has been my policy to support programs of these departments of our Government, and I have felt that in doing that I could render the best possible service to the men and women in our armed forces. There has been a lot of enthusiasm about a speedy termination of the war, but I think I am correct in saying that progress in that direction has been slow, and sometimes not favorable.

From time to time I get letters from fathers and mothers who have relatives in the armed forces overseas. They ask me why is it not possible to have our armed forces rotated so that those who have served overseas for a certain period of time can be returned to the United States, and replaced by others who have not had overseas service. I feel that these questions are fair and that it would contribute to the morale of our armed forces as well as to that of relatives in this country if some system of furlough could be worked out properly so that men with a certain period of service can be returned to the United States and be replaced by others who have not been overseas.

One of the letters I received last fall stated that the man was inducted in February 1941 and shipped overseas in 1942, and at that time he had been 2 years in foreign service. I have many other letters similar in character, and I believe there is a general feeling among the people throughout the country that the question of furlough should have more active consideration by our Government agencies.

I have no desire to make any unjust criticism, or to hamper in any way the progress of this global war. I do know however, that when men can be granted a furlough, even in this country, that it contributes to the happiness of their families, and makes them more determined than ever to render effective service in efforts to bring this World War to a prompt conclusion.

The House of Representatives is the only elective body where the voters and constituents of a Member of Congress can have a voice and be heard. I call attention to this furlough problem, for that reason, to the Members of Congress, because I think it is important for many reasons.

I hope that the proper committees in Congress will give consideration to these suggestions, and I know that I speak the sentiments of the people of my district in these brief remarks.

Address of Speaker Sam Rayburn at Jackson Day Banquet, San Francisco, Calif.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. SAM RAYBURN, of Texas, Speaker of the National House of Representatives, at the Jackson Day dinner in San Francisco, Calif., March 30, 1944:

When a man goes west across the country, for every 900 miles on the average, he has to set his watch back an hour. But when he gets to the Pacific coast he has to set his mind ahead a generation.

That is how I feel when I come among you, out here where tomorrow is always more important than yesterday; where the traveler, if he has eyes that see and ears that hear and a soul that responds to his fellowman, always catches the contagion of looking ahead, always has a feeling that he has reached the gateway to a new world.

I think I remember hearing once or twice in my life, perhaps, some few brief references to your climate. Of course, that is a topic that you Californians never discuss with strangers.

Well, that may be. But the thing that exhilarates me here is not your climate. It is your people. It is the sense I get from them of being in a young country with a forward-looking viewpoint, where folks pride themselves less on what their ancestors did than on what their children are going to do.

Well, you and I know that California and Texas are doing their full share now, today, to make that future certain. Now, with just a little more of that same cooperation from the District of Columbia, a few more men in Washington from the far West, with that same western streak in the blood, we might speed up the solution of many problems.

Let no man tell you that those problems are going to come to an end with military victory. The days that lie beyond the armistice, beyond the peace treaty, loom before us even now as days of crisis.

To meet that time of crisis, our country will need men who have bred into them the habit of looking forward, with chins up; men who have in their very veins the lifeblood of a new world.

I think our country is going to need men of that kind, and need them more in those days that lie just ahead than she has ever needed them since the time when our forefathers gave the world their courageous design of a new way of life.

So I am in dead earnest when I tell you that it would be a wholesome thing for the Nati n if more men of California and your neighbor States on the west coast were taken into the high councils of government in Washington. And in coming here to speak to you, it is part of my purpose to pass on to you this belief and more than belief, this intention.

There are some other intentions we have, that I think I should tell you about now. One of them is our intention, war or postwar, to keep our country safe, and especially to keep this particular part of it safe.

Nobody has to come and stand here before a meeting of Californians and warn them of the dark designs of those forces that we are now attacking out there on the Pacific. Long ago, you told us about the Japs. I am not going to tell you about them. I am going to talk about us.

The men in Congress refused to fortify the island of Guam. Where is Guam today? For what it was worth, those men had the satisfaction of overruling the aims and purposes of the administration.

Well, Guam is a spot on the Pacific. There are scores of dots in that vast expanse of water just like it. Now, with the passing months, above those dots—more and more of them—the American flag is flying.

In the world of tomorrow, with its new tools of war as well as peace, many of those islands will take on new strategic importance. They will be as vital as Guam once was. And the day will come when it will be up to us, not the Japs, to decide what shall be done with them.

We Americans don't need what Adolf Hitler calls living space. We don't want those islands for the sake of relieving the housing shortage in Richmond.

But we Americans do need to know, now and for all time, that there will never be another Pearl Harbor. We need to know, now and for all time, that there will never be another march of death like the one that took place at Bataan.

We need to know that never in the future can the island outposts of the Pacific Ocean be put to the treacherous uses of the Jap. They can send their emissaries to this country and they can smile and scrape and bow till kingdom come; we will be the ones to say what will be done with those islands in the future.

From now on, let us look at that smile of theirs over the barrel of our heaviest artillery. Let us turn our backs to only one kind of Jap—the dead kind.

There may be some who will say that this is empire. What I say is that when any Jap war lord knocks a foul ball our way, we want to be the umpire.

It must be our intention to safeguard our national security in the Pacific Ocean after this war in any manner and by any means that may be necessary. We know now that treaties and agreements, presuming a sense of honor in both parties, do not accomplish this in the case of the Japanese because the Japanese are not an honorable people.

They have interpreters to translate words of honor into their language but they have no interpreters who can bring the meaning of honor into their understanding and their hearts.

But there is one language that they can understand. Our battleships, our planes of war, our tanks, our fighting men, speak that language. Our 16-inch naval guns speak it fluently. So do our block busters and our torpedoes. And with this kind of language, we want to be ready at any time, now and forever, to talk to the Japanese in case they don't get what we mean.

For this reason, when the war is over, our great fleet is going to remain intact. We are not going to sit down with any representative of Tokyo and figure out ratios on paper and then sink our battleships to fit the details of a scrap-of-paper peace.

This time the only battleships that are going to be scrapped are those that fly the Rising Sun.

For our part, we can scrap any illusions that we may have had about dealing man-to-man with a Jap. We can scrap any dangerous notions of pacificism on the Pacific Ocean. We can scrap a lot of our old thinking and our old methods. If we want to get rid of something when this war is over, let's get rid of our red tape, of the endless controls over persons and business that this war has made necessary, and of old ideas that our trade with the world should be all take and no give.

But again, in order that the Japs will not misunderstand us owing to differences in language or to any other differences, when we say no more treachery, no more Pearl Harbors, we are not getting rid of our submarines, our airplane carriers. Our bombers and fighters and patrol planes are going to be ready for business at any time. When we end this war, it will be with the Jap in surrender at gun point; and after the war, we the people and the armed forces of America, are going to keep him covered.

And may I say now that with the heroism and courage that can spring only from confidence in a hopeful future for her people, our ally, China, continues—steadfast as ever—in its determination to fight until not one inch of her proud land any longer bears the imprint of the Japanese imperial sword.

For nearly 7 years China's fighting men and women and, yes, children, have marched against the Japanese in the soil that is drenched with the blood of China's brave dead.

In the realm of facts, had we not been witnesses in the war that China has waged against Japan, it might be nearly impossible to believe that a country whose only preparation for war was a deep desire for peace could for these many years hold off an aggressor whose long and careful preparation for war made her indeed a dreaded foe.

At no point did China underestimate the strength of her formidable enemy. At no time did she feel that victory would be early or easy, but she preferred death to compromise.

We are very proud of the 160 years of unbroken friendship that has existed between this country and China. The bond of understanding will be even stronger through our having fought side by side, sacrificing for each other in the common cause of free people.

Now, this problem of the post-war military, as much as any other post-war consideration, is going to take some good, hard thinking and planning. And one of my purposes in coming here to speak to you is to assure you people on the coast that the Congress is already at work on it.

As I see it, there ought to be a unit of the Congress exclusively devoted to that one job. In matters as vital as this to our national security, we must allow no possibility of a lag. As soon as hostilities end, alert peacetime policing of the Pacific Ocean begins. And the time to get ready for that is today.

Also, as I see it, in any such group of the Congress, the west coast should be given a direct, substantial representation.

Only recently I appointed a committee of 18 men to study post-war planning. We must get ready to do the great job of peace as our soldiers are doing the terrible work of war. I asked the members of this committee to consult with those in Government, in industry, in labor, and in agriculture in order that the best and soundest ideas may be put into our recommendations to the Congress. I appointed a Californian as a member of this 18-man committee, the Honorable JERRY VOORHIS.

We must have a military policy in the United States after this emergency is over. On Tuesday of this week I appointed a committee of 23 members to study post-war military policy. Almost 20 percent of that number, or 4, are from the 3 west coast States. Two of them, JOHN COSTELLO and HARRY SHEPPARD, are from the State of California. I do not know what all of our post-war military policy will be, but some of it I do know, and may I repeat that we are not going to destroy all of our munitions factories, we are not going to tear down our airplane plants, we are not going to sink our Navy.

Once we have tackled and licked that great post-war "must" job of making and keeping the Pacific Ocean safe, the West, your territory, will have its big chance to come into its own.

We hope, and we are determined, that prosperity will go hand in hand with peace throughout this country. But from what I have already seen here in California, I would venture to say now that your State and your neighbor States on the coast, together with my own State of Texas, will do the leading of the way.

Foreign trade depends on foreign policy. With a wise foreign policy, the commerce of that newly awakened world of tomorrow will be brought to the Golden Gate in volume such as may be hard at this time to imagine.

For, remember, out there beyond those blue horizons to the west of you, when peace comes there will be a new world a-building. A vast world, embracing vast peoples who have been backward through the centuries but will be backward no longer.

Where you find progress, there you find trade. Nowhere else in the world is there such room for progress, nowhere will there be such demand for it, as we shall one day witness beyond those great wastes of water to the westward. And as that world builds, your State and your city will be channels of the trade that measures this growth of a new world.

In the focal points of any newly developed flow of commerce, in order to keep the ships sailing, the planes flying, there is other work—work to be done in offices and factories and shipyards, work on the docks and over the railways.

In your bay area here you have these facilities. They are in high gear now, working for war. They should not be let down when the time comes to work in peace.

Here, as in the field of the military, there should be no lag, and there need be none. But to prevent it, to keep the wheels turning and the people employed, real foresight real statesmanship, positive leadership, will be required.

That is going to be a stiff test of what we Americans and our future leaders are made of. And that is another reason why I think your territory and your people should have fuller representation in the Federal Government.

You have an example, in northern California, of what that kind of leadership can do, of what it has been doing in the past dozen years. That example is Shasta Dam and the whole Central Valley project.

Shasta Dam is helping America today to meet the tremendously increased need of light metal production for war. It will help America tomorrow to meet other needs, needs that will be just as critical in time of peace.

In the whole Central Valley project, the investment of $300,000,000 which the Federal Government has made will be returned to the American people manyfold through the years.

Certainly it widens the horizons of the people of California. The supply of low-cost water for new lands and for supplementing what is now available to your farms will stabilize the agriculture of your rich valleys. Low-cost power will put industry that is now used for war into the new uses of peace. You will be able to find a workable balance between farm and factory. And that is where we want to see your working people—on the farm, in the factory—not on relief.

For the boys who come home from the war, no medals, no parades, will express the gratitude of America for what they have done as much as the chance at a job. For those who deserve bonuses we shall provide bonuses. But no dollar bonus within the gift of this rich Nation can equal, in their eyes, the great moral bonus of security, of steady employment, and the right to work. If that right can be granted them anywhere in America, it can be granted them here.

Problems of Men and Women in the Armed Forces and Their Dependents—Information of Interest to Returned Service Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, in these remarks I want to discuss some of the legislation that is of interest to men and women in the armed forces and to their dependents; also I want to call attention to legislation that has been passed which is very important to those who have been discharged on account of service in World War No. 2.

Preliminary to this discussion, however, I want to discuss the provisions of the law which entitles men and women in our armed forces to a vote in the coming elections. Public Law 277, Seventy-eighth Congress, which provides for such a ballot, became a law some time ago without the approval of the President. This legislation was designated in the newspapers as a compromise and I supported it. Prior to its enactment there was legislation known as the bobtailed ballot, which consists of a blank piece of paper and provided that men and women in the armed forces could write in their choice for President, United States Senator, and Member of the House of Representatives. There was no provision in the bill granting men and women in the armed forces the right to vote for State and county officials. Public Law 277 gives men and women in the armed forces that privilege. It is true that some high-pressure groups in the district have criticized me for not voting for the bobtailed ballot. I am satisfied that when people know the facts that they will be glad that I supported legislation which is at least constitutional and which permits our armed forces to vote for State and county officials as well as Federal officials.

The War Department under date of April 3, 1944, issued Circular No. 128 giving in detail the procedure to be followed in voting by members of our armed forces. Of course, the Minnesota Legislature has passed a law which will facilitate the voting of every man and woman in the service of their country if they so desire. I take this occasion to suggest to relatives of every man and woman in the Army, Navy, or Air Forces to contact the county auditor of the county in which such person has legal residence and see to it that the county auditor is requested to have a ballot sent to the person in service. Under the Federal statute, Public Law 277, and under the law enacted by the State legislature there is absolutely no reason why every member of the armed forces cannot vote if they so desire. Any statements to the contrary are false and circulated purely for political and propaganda reasons.

LEGISLATION AFFECTING MEN AND WOMEN IN THE ARMED FORCES AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

Congress has passed many laws which are to the advantage of those in the service of their country. I do not here enumerate all of them and I would suggest that interested parties confer with local veterans' service organizations because they have the necessary information and can advise fully as to rights and procedure. If there are any further questions, my office will be glad to have a letter from you and will render all possible assistance in connection with these cases. If Congress should not be in session, my congressional office in Washington will be open and in charge of competent and efficient secretarial help and any communication addressed to me at room 244, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C., will receive prompt and courteous attention.

During the summer I may be back in the district, but it will expedite matters if letters are addressed to me direct to Washington.

A great many people are not familiar with the rights and benefits under the various laws enacted by Congress, and I would again repeat that it is important that they confer with the service officers of the various veterans' organizations throughout the district.

I now discuss legislation in which you are particularly interested.

BENEFITS PROVIDED BY LAW FOR VETERANS OF WORLD WAR NO. 2 AND THEIR DEPENDENTS WHILE IN THE ACTIVE MILITARY OR NAVAL SERVICE

Active service in the Army or Navy during the present war includes active service in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard and the personnel is composed of regular officers and enlisted men, members of the Army and Navy Nurse Corps, female reservists, National Guard men called into active service, volunteers and selectees and persons appointed to the armed forces from civilian life. The Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard are included among those in the active military and naval service. The Office of War Information, in its release of April 6, 1944, announced that the Army of the United States has reached its planned strength of 7,700,000 officer and enlisted personnel, but will require 75,000 to 100,000 men a month throughout the remainder of 1944 to maintain that strength. The Navy Department has estimated that it would reach a strength of 3,500,000, including the Marine Corps and Coast Guard personnel, by July 1, 1944, and that approximately 300,000 men will be needed to reach that net strength and at the same time provide necessary replacements. An additional 100,000 men will be added to the net strength of the Navy between July 1 and September 1, 1944.

ACTIVE SERVICE PAY

The Pay Readjustment Act, 1942, as amended, increased the pay of privates from $21 to $50 per month with proportionate increases for noncommissioned officers to $138 per month for master sergeant or chief petty officer, first grade. Longevity pay was improved by adding 5 percent to the base pay for each 3 years of service up to 30 years. A 20-percent increase is provided for enlisted men and 10 percent for officers on sea duty or in any place beyond the continental United States or in Alaska. Active flying duty increases base pay by 50 percent and active parachutist's duty increases the base pay by $100 per month for officers and $50 per month for enlisted men. Similar liberal increase is provided for submarine and diving duty. The Pay Readjustment Act, 1942, as amended, also provided entitlement for retired personnel to adjustment of retired pay.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

The Servicemen's Dependents Allowance Act of 1942, as amended October 26, 1943, provides family allowances for dependents of any enlisted person, male or female. A rate of $50 per month is provided for a wife where there is no child; $80 per month if there is a wife and one child, with $20 for each additional child; a rate of $42 per month if the enlisted man has no wife but one child, with $20 for each additional child; a rate of $50 is provided if the enlisted man has one parent dependent upon him for chief support, but no dependent brother or sister; $68 if such enlisted man has one parent and one brother or sister dependent upon him, with an additional $11 for each dependent brother or sister; a rate of $68 per month is provided if the enlisted man has two dependent parents but no dependent brother or sister, with $11 additional for each dependent brother or sister. A rate of $42 per month is provided if the enlisted man has no dependent parent but has a dependent brother or sister, with $11 for each additional dependent brother or sister. The monthly pay of the enlisted man is reduced by or charged with the amount of $22 per month for any month in which an allowance is paid with an additional $5 if the dependents include more than one class of dependents.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS

The Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended, provides for a temporary suspension during the war and for 6 months thereafter of legal proceedings and transactions which may impair the civilian rights of persons in the active service. These rights involve rent, installment contracts, mortgages, insurance, taxes, homestead rights, and so forth. The primary purpose of this act is to relieve members in the military service from worry over their inability to settle their civilian liabilities by reason of reduced income because of military service. It does not relieve a soldier from the obligation but provides a means of relief. The courts are given jurisdiction to stay the enforcement of certain obligations. In title IV of this act, which is administered by the Veterans' Administration, any person in active service having a commercial life policy or policies meeting the requirements of the law, upon application to the Veterans' Administration upon a form supplied by the Army and Navy may secure guaranty of premiums on the amount of insurance not in excess of $10,000 while he is in the service during the present war. The premiums guaranteed by the Government constitute a lien and must be paid by the company out of any settlement. In the event of the discharge of the insured, he has a period of 2 years within which to pay the premiums with interest so guaranteed, otherwise the indebtedness constitutes a lien upon the policy with interest. As of March 31, 1944, 72,204 applications, with insurance totaling approximately $178,000,000 have been approved and premiums guaranteed.

NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

Members of the active military and naval service may at any time while in such service file application for national service life insurance, which is administered by the Veterans' Administration. If the service person applies within 120 days after enlistment or enrollment no medical examination is required, otherwise satisfactory evidence of good health must be furnished. Insurance in the amount of $10,000 with premiums paid by the Government is available for aviation cadets of the Army Air Corps; enlisted men detailed to schools as aviation students, participating frequently in aerial flights; cadets at the Military Academy while undergoing flight training; enlisted naval and Marine Corps Reserves or cadets undergoing training as aviation pilots; and aviation cadets of the Navy or Marine Corps are included within this protection. Upon being commissioned or released from flight duty they must pay premiums on the insurance.

This insurance is against death and includes waiver of premiums during total disability existing more than 6 months and commencing prior to the insured's sixtieth birthday. The policy is a 5-year level premium term policy and is payable to specified classes: Widow, widower; child, including stepchild or illegitimate child if designated as beneficiary by the insured; parent, including person in loco parentis; brother and sister of the insured; and is payable only in monthly installments. The insured may change the beneficiary at any time. If the policy has been in effect for at least 1 year, while in force it may be converted into an ordinary life policy, 20-payment life, or 30-payment life policy upon application to the Veterans' Administration, without examination. As of March 30, 1944, over 14,000,000 applications had been received representing a total of over $105,000,000,000 of insurance. The average policy is approximately $7,382.69; the average coverage per life is $8,926.74. In the event of the death of the insured the policy is payable as an annuity in 240 monthly equal installments of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance to any beneficiary under 30 years of age at the time of death of the insured; otherwise it is payable in continuous monthly installments throughout the life of the beneficiary with a guaranty of a payment of 120 monthly installments. Under the latter method of payment, the amount of the monthly installment is dependent upon age of the beneficiary. For example, if the beneficiary is 40 years old, the monthly installment is $4.50 for each $1,000 of insurance; if 50 years of age, $5.39 per each $1,000; if 60 years of age, $6.81 per each $1,000; or if 70 years of age, $8.51 per $1,000. Taking those particular ages and a policy for $10,000, the monthly installment would be $45 if the beneficiary is 40 years old; $53.90 if the beneficiary is 50 years; $68.10 if the beneficiary is 60; and $85.10 if the beneficiary is 70. Claims for insurance benefits should be addressed to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C., but the necessary forms may be secured from the nearest Veterans' Administration facility.

GRATUITOUS INSURANCE

Any person in the active service on and after October 8, 1940, who, while in the service, and before April 20, 1942, died in line of duty without having in force at the time of death insurance under the War Risk Insurance Act, as amended, or the World War Veterans' Act, as amended, or the National Service Life Insurance Act, as amended, in an aggregate amount of at least $5,000 is deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance in the amount of $5,000. This gratuitous insurance is payable to the widow or widower; or if no widow or widower, to the child or children; or if no widow or widower or child, to the dependent mother or father of the insured, if living. Provision is also made for gratuitous insurance to those who within such period suffered line of duty total disability for 6 months or more without having in force an aggregate amount of $5,000 insurance under the acts aforementioned. The law also provides for gratuitous insurance to those who, prior to April 20, 1942, were captured, besieged, or otherwise isolated by the forces of any enemy of the United States for a period of at least 30 consecutive days and extending beyond April 19, 1942.

DEATH GRATUITY

A death gratuity equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received by the veteran at the time of his death in line of duty is payable by the War and Navy Departments. Provisions for payment of this gratuity are administered by the Service Department having jurisdiction of the person in the armed forces, and the benefit is payable to persons within a certain class. Application for the 6 months' death gratuity should be submitted to the Chief of Finance, War Department, Washington, D. C., if the person served in the Army; Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, Washington, D. C., if the person served in the Navy; Commandant, United States Marine Corps, Headquarters, United States Marine Corps, Washington, D. C., if the person served in the Marine Corps, and to the Commandant, United States Coast Guard, Washington, D. C., in the cases of members of the Coast Guard.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

With certain exceptions set forth in the act of February 3, 1944, members of the armed forces discharged or relieved from active service under honorable conditions on or after December 7, 1941, may receive mustering-out pay. The rate is $100 if there was service of less than 60 days; if the person served more than 60 days in the continental United States, the rate is $200, payable at the rate of $100 upon discharge and $100 1 month later; if the person served more than 60 days and served outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska, the amount is $300, payable at the rate of $100 upon leaving service, $100 1 month later, and $100 2 months later. This pay is in addition to whatever regular pay and allowances to which the person may be entitled. Persons entitled to base pay of over $200 per month or who are retired with pay, or who were discharged at their own request to take a job, or who served only as a student in the Army educational program are not included for mustering-out pay. If the person served overseas, however, he would be entitled to mustering-out pay, even though discharged at his own request. Mustering-out pay is exempt from taxation and is not subject to the claims of creditors.

IN-SERVICE EDUCATION

Extensive programs of in-service education, including the retention in service of persons whose disabilities do not disqualify them completely for active service for readjustment into proper activities in the armed forces have qualified and will qualify thousands of persons for lucrative employment after the war and in a great many instances it has been possible for persons to supplement their education while in the active service so that in many instances the handicap from an educational standpoint has been materially reduced.

REEMPLOYMENT

The Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, preserves employment rights of persons entering the military and naval training forces, who occupied permanent positions at the time of entering service. These provisions are administered through the Employment Division of Selective Service. These provisions apply both to Government employment and private employment to insure restoration of the veteran to the former or similar position upon his discharge or release from the armed forces. It is necessary to apply for reemployment within 40 days after discharge.

The United States Employment Service, Veterans' Placement Service, with local agents, are ready to assist veterans in getting a job.

HOSPITALIZATION

Members of the armed forces are provided with all necessary medical care and hospital treatment and their rights upon discharge as veterans of World War No. 2 will be stated later.

OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS' AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

These benefits are administered through the Federal Security Agency and the operation of State plans. Practically all of the States have enacted legislation protecting the unemployment insurance credits of persons in the armed forces and legislation is pending to make certain that all necessary protection is afforded the insured workers who are in the service and to liberalize in any other manner which may be justified the laws governing these benefits.

RETIREMENT PAY

In addition to the regular retirement of officers and enlisted men of the armed forces, Reserve officers and officers appointed to the Army of the United States from civilian life and enlisted men with 20 years or more of service may be retired for disability incurred in service in line of duty and in such event they are entitled to three-fourths of their base pay which is paid by the Veterans' Administration upon certification of eligibility by the War Department.

BENEFITS ADMINISTERED BY THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION AND PERTAINING TO WORLD WAR NO. 2 VETERANS

The Veterans' Administration administers pensions to disabled World War No. 2 veterans, their dependents, national service life insurance, hospitalization and domiciliary care, and vocational rehabilitation for the service disabled as well as some other benefits which I will not enter into at this time.

The Veterans' Administration has 94 facilities throughout the country. To give you an idea of what has already taken place in connection with benefits to veterans of World War No. 2 and their dependents, I will give you a few figures. From December 1941 to January 31, 1944, there had been paid to World War No. 2 veterans for service-connected disabilities over twelve and one-half million dollars and in addition approximately $700,000 in retired pay administered by the Veterans' Administration. There had also been paid approximately eleven and one-half million dollars in pension to dependents of deceased veterans of World War No. 2, making a total expenditure of approximately $25,000,000. You will understand that this is an accumulated figure and the expenditures are of a continuing nature and are increasing steadily. Between December 1941 and January 31, 1944, the Veterans' Administration had paid national service life insurance cash benefits for death in the amount of approximately $20,000,000. Over the same period the cost of hospitalization and domiciliary care, World War No. 2 veterans, was over $9,000,000. Through February 29, 1944, there had been approximately 52,500 admissions of World War No. 2 veterans for hospitalization or domiciliary care. The number remaining under such care at the end of February 1944 was 11,622.

PENSIONS

Pensions are payable for disability or death incurred in or due to active military service in line of duty and not the result of the person's own misconduct. Disability pension is payable to any person honorably discharged depending upon the degree of disablement, ranging from 10 to 100 percent with payments from $10 to $100 per month. For specific losses, as the loss of a hand or foot, blindness, and so forth, additional amounts are payable, the highest rate being $250 per month. Death pension is payable where the World War No. 2 veteran died as the result of service-incurred disability. The rates of pension are: Widow, with no child, $50; widow, with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child; no widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38, with $10 for each additiona' child; dependent mother or father, $45, or both, $25 each. As to the widow and children, the total amount cannot exceed more than $100 per month.

REHABILITATION (HOSPITALIZATION, EDUCATION, AND TRAINING)

The first step of rehabilitation is that of physical and mental repair for the service disabled. Medical and hospital care, prosthetic appliances, and domiciliary care are available to any veteran of the present war honorably discharged for a service-connected disability requiring such care, treatment, or appliance, or one who was discharged for disability and not dishonorably discharged, and also one not dishonorably discharged who is unable to defray his own expenses, is entitled if he has tuberculosis or neuropsychiatric ailment or disability which requires hospital care. Any veteran of the present war, not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, and who is in need of such care and is unable to defray the expenses therefor, is entitled to hospitalization or domiciliary care, notwithstanding the disability, disease, or defect is not shown to be due to service. This latter benefit is contingent of availability of facilities. It might be stated at this point that in the 94 facilities of the Veterans' Administration, as of March 23, 1944, there was a total of 92,019 beds. The Veterans' Administration also has 7 diagnostic centers. The present building program will raise the total beds to 100,000. The Veterans' Administration anticipates and expects an eventual need of 300,000 beds to enable veterans of World War No. 2 and of prior wars to receive hospital and domiciliary care to the extent now provided. However, this is an estimated maximum and should not be needed until long after the war or require eventual additional construction of more than 100,000 beds since there will be, under present plans, 100,000 beds in Veterans' Administration facilities, and it is anticipated that it will be possible to obtain another 100,000 beds from the Army and Navy shortly after the termination of the war.

Vocational rehabilitation of the World War No. 2 disabled is provided by the act of March 24, 1943. It covers the veterans of the present war, honorably discharged, and who have a disability incurred or connected with such service which is pensionable or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay and who are in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of the disability. This benefit is administered by the Veterans' Administration through the Director of Vocational Rehabilitation in central office and the planning and control functions are performed there. The operations, which include the determination of the need of training, vocational advisement, induction to training, supervision, and selection of training facilities, are handled by the Vocational Rehabilitation Division in the facility of the Veterans' Administration in the territory where the veteran resides. There are 53 such facilities. The veteran while in training, unless his pension equals such amounts, is entitled to $80 per month if single; $90 per month if married, with $5 additional for each child and $10 for each dependent parent. All expenses of training, including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required. Persons honorably discharged from the service may make claims for vocational rehabilitation with the nearest Veterans' Administration facility.

TAXATION

Payments under any of the laws relating to veterans are exempt from taxation, exempt from claims of creditors, and are not liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by legal or equitable process. The exemption does not apply to certain claims of the United States arising out of such benefits or to property purchased in part or wholly out of such payments.

PENDING LEGISLATION

There are numerous bills pending in the present Congress proposing to grant additional benefits to veterans and their dependents and which would, if enacted, be applicable to persons who served in the present war. Exclusive of the bills to liberalize pensions and to change the existing law pertaining to national service life insurance, the major proposals are those which would grant aid to World War No. 2 veterans in securing employment; provide reasonable allowances as a protection against unemployment; afford educational and training opportunities without the requirement of a service-connected disability producing a handicap, and centralize in one agency, namely, the Veterans' Administration, the services to veterans without physical transfer thereto of other established agencies or any part thereof. There are other bills pending which would provide adjusted-service pay, particularly in the form of bonds, which could be used by the veterans to meet their needs. The purpose of this statement is to indicate the consideration now being given by the Congress to additional aid to World War No. 2 veterans without entering into the specific bills and their progress.

Not the American Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt said that one of the objectives of this war where hundreds of thousands of Americans will be required to die, was to carry the "four freedoms" to the uttermost parts of the world in our time.

The death of a million or more Americans, which Rickenbacker predicted, cannot be justified on any ground other than that the war is necessary for self-preservation.

As the casualty lists grow and as community after community throughout this land of ours is notified that some of those who used to be met day after day on the streets have been wounded, killed, or are missing in action, the frightfulness of the war becomes more apparent.

The administration day after day calls for additional young men, who, it says, are necessary to carry on the fighting. But here at home the President, through his administrative agencies, denies to thousands of our people at least one of the "four freedoms"—freedom from want, unless they submit to the unjustifiable, unconstitutional demands of his political allies.

The press once again carries notice of picket lines, which, in mass formation, attempt to prevent, attempt to deny to, American citizens their God given, their constitutional, right to work to earn the wages which will keep them from want; which will supply them and the members of their families, their dependents, with food, shelter, and clothing.

While our armed forces are fighting abroad to open the way, so that people may be free, so that they may work to avoid want, this administration permits massed picket lines to interfere with American citizens who are on their way to their jobs in the plants of Montgomery Ward & Co.

Congress gave the War Labor Board authority to settle labor disputes by issuing orders, provided those orders were fair and reasonable and did not conflict with the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act.

The National Labor Relations Act permits, but it does not require, employers to enter into a closed-shop contract with any union. Nevertheless, the National War Labor Board, according to the testimony of its Chairman, William Davis—and I heard that testimony—has required employers and unions to enter into contracts containing a so-called security-of-membership clause.

Under that clause, if a man belongs to a union which has a contract with an employer and does not withdraw from the union within a specified time, he must thereafter remain a member of the union, pay all dues and assessments levied by that union. The practical effect, regardless of the legal terminology used, is to establish in many instances a closed shop.

The Chairman of the Board admits that such an order was issued against Ward, but it also admits that it has no legal authority to enforce that order; that the only remedy is to notify the President of the situation and that he then can take over the plant.

And, if the usual course is followed, the President will take over the plant and his representative will then employ only union men, who will be required to pay all union dues and assessments and, in some instances, undoubtedly the dollar which will go into a political fund, a part of which will be used to reelect the President.

According to reliable authority, Congress never gave the President or any administrative agency any authority over any industry or business which was not engaged in war production.

Montgomery Ward & Co. is not engaged either in war production or in war activity. It is carrying on a civilian mercantile business. Nevertheless the W. L. B. has issued an order which would ultimately, if the usual procedure is followed, compel the employees of that organization to join a C. I. O. union, pay dues, and assessments.

Some of the C. I. O. affiliates are levying an assessment of $1 each against their members, the dollar to go into a political fund, a part of which is to be used in support of the administration and New Deal candidates for Congress.

Employees, in order to hold their jobs, will in some instances be forced to contribute to a campaign fund to be used to elect candidates whom they oppose.

To get the dollar, the employee must work. Analyzed, the procedure of the Board forces an American citizen to spend at least a part of his time in involuntary servitude to earn the dollar which the C. I. O. political action committee intends to use, and will use, in opposition to the employee's political views.

Is it not logical to argue that inasmuch as the administration and the War Labor Board force employees to join a C. I. O. affiliate, which in turn forces them to work to earn the dollar which goes into the campaign fund of the C. I. O.'s Committee for Political Action, which in turn supports the President for a fourth term and supports those candidates who agree to go along with the President's program, the Administration is practicing involuntary servitude?

But get this: Last Monday, the United States Supreme Court, a majority of whom were appointed by President Roosevelt, held that a Florida statute, which made subject to fine and imprisonment a man who obtained money by falsely representing that he would work to earn it, was unconstitutional and void; that the enforcement of such a statute amounted to involuntary servitude.

But is not the man who, in order to earn a livelihood, who in order to hold his job must pay an assessment of $1 levied by a union to promote a political campaign, also subjected to involuntary servitude?

If he would eat, unless he steals, is wealthy, or is an object of charity, he must work. If he would work, he must join the union; and, if he belongs to the union and would remain in good standing and so hold his job, he must pay the dollar to support a candidate against whom he may intend to vote.

The inconsistency of such a situation is apparent to everyone. Boiled down, this phase of the administration's labor policy means that it is trading, through administrative order and directive, special privileges to C. I. O. unions in return for political support for the fourth term.

If the foregoing is not an accurate statement of the situation, if the conclusion is not logical, let some member of the majority side give us the answer from the floor of the House.

War Damage Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following announcement by the Secretary of Commerce:

Jesse Jones, Secretary of Commerce, announced today that in consideration of premiums heretofore collected, War Damage Corporation will extend automatically for a period of 12 months from their respective expiration dates all war-damage policies duly in force March 31, 1944, without any additional premium or other charge. No action is required of the insured or the policyholder to keep the insurance in force for this extended period.

New and additional insurance that may be written effective on and after April 1, 1944, will be at the presently established rates and premiums.

This action is being taken with the approval of the President and also with the unanimous approval of representatives of the insurance companies participating in the program.

War Damage Corporation, created by R. F. C. pursuant to section 5d of the R. F. C. Act, as amended, began business July 1, 1942, and established uniform rates by classes throughout the country. By operating through the insurance industry, War Damage Corporation has been conducted on an economical basis, and great credit is due the insurance industry for its cooperation and assistance. 546 fire and 88 casualty-insurance companies have participated, taking an aggregate of 10 percent of the risks and being entitled to 10 percent of any profits. The fire-insurance companies have a maximum liability of $20,000,000 and the casualty companies $5,000,000, with maximum possible profits of like amounts. Any company that does not wish to continue in the underwriting will be relieved by War Damage Corporation, the company withdrawing to be relieved of any possible losses and not to share in any possible profits. It is hoped that all companies now in the program will continue their participation.

Up to December 31, 1943, premiums collected amounted to approximately $218,000,000 after payment of all expenses, which have been unusually light.

Claims for losses totaling $72,899.74 are in process of adjustment. In addition, approximately 300 claims arising out of the explosion of the destroyer Turner in New York Harbor on January 3, 1944, have been presented and are being investigated.

United States Naval Home, Philadelphia, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, it was with misgiving and dismay that I recently learned a board of naval officers had visited the United States Naval Home in Philadelphia and made a detailed inspection of the entire installation with a view to determining the further usefulness of the institution.

The Appropriations Committee has eliminated the sum of $39,900 from the home's appropriation, which it seems would have been used for repairs and rehabilitation. This action indicates that the Navy Department is seriously considering turning the Naval Home to other purposes and transferring those who live there to some other facility.

The Naval Home is a safe harbor today for over 250 retired and disabled officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps. All of these veterans saw honorable service at sea and many of them are survivors of battles in the Spanish-American War and World War No. 1.

The Naval Home has a long and glorious history. In 1811 Congress granted authority for its construction and for 111 years it has harbored naval veterans. The Naval Academy was originally established in the home in 1839 when 11 midshipmen were ordered there for instruction, and it was not until 6 years later that the naval school was transferred to Annapolis.

Today it is a real home for many naval heroes and is the last word in comfort for the sick, the lame, and the halt who in the years that have fled rendered great service to their country.

No investigation is necessary to determine its usefulness. It has been a snug home for more than a century as the Navy Department well knows without any inspection, and I propose to do all in my power to see to it that these veterans of other wars do not lose their home. Any action on the part of the Navy to take over the institution for other purposes would be the heighth of folly. But more than that it would be notice to the heroes of today that they, too, may be forgotten in the years to come.

The United States Naval Home must not be disturbed and I call upon all those who are interested in those heroes of yesterday to join with me in the fight today.

Inexcusable Confusion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, some waste, some confusion is connected with the operation of every business. The bigger the business, the greater the opportunity for mistakes which create unjust discrimination.

The administration in peacetime carries on what is probably the greatest single business enterprise in the world. With a million or more employees added to the Federal pay rolls, with Government activities increased to an almost incredible extent, with some 10,000,000 men and women in the armed forces, mistakes which work hardship are unavoidable.

Many a businessman has seen his means of livelihood destroyed by a Government order. Many a farmer has found it almost impossible to till the soil, produce the food which normally came from his land. Some workers in mill, mine, or factory and certainly many white-collar workers have found it almost impossible to meet the increased cost of living, pay increased taxes, buy War bonds, and create a fund for old-age security.

All those things are hardships which grow out of an inefficient administration which refuses to acknowledge the existence of the law of supply and demand, which refuses to admit that it cannot control the weather, the growing seasons, or the frailties of human nature.

But some hardships can be cured by the ousting of the New Deal next November. The substitution of practical men in the places of dreamers and theorists will give some relief. Some of the mistakes, some of the waste, some of the suffering, which our people have been enduring cannot be eliminated; much of it can in the manner just suggested.

But over and beyond those hardships to which reference has just been made, there have been hardships, loss of business, loss of opportunity, and acute mental and physical suffering for which there is no excuse.

THE DRAFT CONFUSION

April 13, speaking in the Senate, Senator TAFT clearly and concisely stated the evil, placed the responsibility, when he said:

The time has come to quit playing fast and loose with the existence of American men and their families. It is utterly ridiculous at this stage of the war to have married men telling their families good-bye, giving up their jobs, and selling their businesses, only to be told the next day it was all a mistake and they will not be needed; that they can go back home and pick up the scattered threads of their lives—but not securely, for they might be called again on a moment's notice.

President Roosevelt has authority to promulgate and enforce draft regulations. He is directly responsible for much of the unnecessary loss and suffering which those subject to draft have been required to undergo because of conflicting draft policies.

Manpower Director McNutt, Draft Director Hershey, Secretary of War Stimson, Interior Secretary Ickes, and General Marshall, Army Chief of Staff, administer draft legislation. They are all under the President's control. They issue conflicting orders and on occasion one or the other issues orders which are later overruled by the President himself. Local draft boards know not where to turn and draftees and their families are suffering cruelly, unnecessarily, from the conflicting regulations.

The President refuses in the first instance to himself exercise complete authority over the induction of men. Then when some of those authorized to issue orders do so, he or some subordinate changes or overrules those orders. He has refused to adopt a clear, definite policy covering the conscription of men.

Those subject to draft and their dependents have a right to know what to expect.

The administration's handling of the drafting of men is clear proof, if any were needed, that this administration is not competent to successfully, efficiently, and with the least cost in material and life, carry on this war.

The incompetent should be ousted at the coming election, and men with a record of success, with experience, should be placed in charge of the civilian machinery upon which the success of our armed force depends.

Address of Hon. John W. McCormack at Bataan Day Exercises

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AIME J. FORAND

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by the majority leader, Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK, at the Bataan Day exercises held on Boston Common April 9, 1944:

We gather here in solemn tribute to the heroes of Bataan. On this day when the alleluiahs for a risen Christ triumphant over sin and death resound throughout America, we pause in memory of those valiant men and women who, in heroic battle, fought the enemy of mankind until their weapons fell from hands too tired to carry on to victory the fight their spirit so devoutly desired consummated. With courage high and heart heavy those men—the bravest of the brave gave way before the foe—not in ultimate defeat but in anguished despair that our beloved Stars and Stripes could not continue in glorious permanence, over the land for which America gave of its fortune and its blood. Men of Bataan, your bravery and sacrifice in the cause of free mankind relighted the path for us who, as true Americans today, give promise that your cross shall not have been borne in vain.

We all know the story of the epic of Bataan. When the siege of Bataan began, General MacArthur had in his command approximately 7,000 American combatant troops, 8,000 Filipino Scouts, and 55,000 Filipino Reserves. This small army was without important air and naval protection. Heroically they battled against a force of yellow zealots far superior in number, seasoned by training, well equipped for battle. The Japanese were supported by bomb divers and naval guns, with lines of communications intact, reinforcements constantly available, supplies and ammunition at instant command. Despite these overwhelming odds our men fought until exhausted from hunger, sick from disease, and until their ammunition had been exhausted.

Beleaguered American soldiers held their ground against repeated and sustained attack, meeting assault upon assault without rest or replacements, tired to exhaustion in a situation greviously aggravated by lack of sustenance, medical aid, and munitions. At their outpost they were surrounded and cut off from our aid by an enemy superior on the sea, in the air, and on the land. They met their enemy with faith in their hearts—courageous beyond description—in conduct becoming our fighting forces. Under fearful bombardment from daylight to nightfall and from dusk till dawn they kept a faithful vigil at their posts. Four long months of siege was withstood by these brave men who succumbed only after they had become so exhausted by hunger, disease, and fatigue that it was humanly physically impossible for them to carry on. Their days were numbered as the world knew, and on April 9, 1942, after 4 months of siege in which a fearful enemy utilized every instrument of destruction, the bitter truth that courage alone will not suffice in war became too evident and a battle of man against machine was over. We in America have not felt, nor can we feel, their suffering, but we can, with reverence, be ever mindful of their dignity in their fate. General MacArthur had no hesitancy in proclaiming publicly: "The sacrifice and halo of Jesus of Nazareth has decended upon them and God will take them unto Himself."

The significance of Bataan rests upon the vital moral effect of our defeat upon the American people. After World War No. 1 America, ostensibly at least, had been lulled into the false security that a war to end war had been fought and its end accomplished. America refused to face reality and even in the approaching storm when the heavens filled with war clouds Americans refused to believe that World War No. 2 was our war. Then came dastardly Pearl Harbor, and Bataan and its horror. Then America, aroused from its peace-loving lethargy, proved that her sons had not grown soft in luxury and could, with men of other nations, equally withstand the frightfulness of modern warfare. Bataan regenerated hidden American morale.

In this hour of recollection America must not forget the courage and devotion with which Filipino troops fought side by side with our soldiers. Their example established them to a place among free nations and vindicated forever the basic soundness of our American policy of holding the Philippines, not for exploit or gain, but for the development, education, and preparation of their long-awaited self-government. When our hour of crisis came, these natives of the Philippines, three out of four of our Army being Filipinos, never hesitated or wavered in their determination to fight valiantly and unflinchingly with America for its future destiny—and our victory. We must never forget that they, with us, were glorious in an army which won the commendation, "No army has ever done so much with so little."

There are, because of understandable circumstances, few available statistics which will accurately portray the fighting forces of Bataan. On April 17, 1942, a War Department communique stated that there were approximately 35,000 American combatant troops and several thousand noncombatant troops and reserves at Bataan. There were included in these figures Filipino Scouts. In January of 1944 the War Department stated that the casualties of the Philippine campaign amounted to 1,092 killed, 1,720 wounded, 15,309 missing, and 13,494 prisoners of war. In this total of 31,615 fighting troops who became casualties, there are included 12,506 Filipino Scouts. Foreign governments have officially notified that 1,614 prisoners of war have died in prison camps and it is safe to assume that the majority of these men died following their capture and internment by the Japanese.

No story will ever be complete without reference to the group of American nurses who were always at the side of our soldiers in their hours of sorrow and suffering. No words of mine can adequately portray their sad and inspirational performance of duty. These heroic women faced hardship and danger without murmur or complaint—with distinguishing courage and example. Only the men who were there can truthfully tell what we can but imagine—the strength and faith and spirit instilled into our soldiers by these angels of mercy as they quietly and efficiently cared for the wounded and the sick, encouraged the impoverished, made brave the faltering. These women learned intimately the meaning of want and privation. They suffered the worst of heartache and disappointment, as only a woman can know and understand the suffering of a man. These heroes of our nursing corps have won, unasked and unasking, our undying praise and gratitude for their devotion to duty. And their sorrow, the bitterness of their fate, is but a mild reflection of the sorrow of womanhood throughout the world—in all lands—where the crimes of the aggressor nations have brought death and ruin.

America has learned a lesson from Bataan—taught by those heroes who knew they never had a chance but who fought a hopeless, delaying series of actions that our country might have as long a time as possible to recover from Pearl Harbor. We have learned realism in international relations. May we ever profit by their teachings—may we never forget that international trust must be wise as well as sincere. Reproachment and recrimination will never avenge our sorrow. Hope and faith will, however, soften its grief.

We have learned another lesson from our Philippine campaign. You and I, as Americans, have come to know that we can make sacrifice in our daily lives without complaining. We, as a nation, have come to realize that by our sacrifices alone we can reward those men and women who have left their homes and families and today, on distant battlefields, protect our lives, our wives, our parents, our children, from the crushing evil of despotism and tyranny. We have learned as a Nation that we are glad to be able to show individual appreciation of that protective sacrifice of the men and women of the armed forces which brings both sorrow and joy into our hearts. May we ever strive to be more worthy of those men and women who have given and are giving all that we may live in freedom and peace.

President Roosevelt has said, "I give to the people of the Philippines my solemn pledge that their freedom will be redeemed and their independence established and protected. The entire resources in men and materials of the United States stand behind that pledge." Inspirational words of our inspirational Commander in Chief, General MacArthur, on the first anniversary of Bataan, stated, "I was the leader of that lost cause, and from the bottom of a seared and stricken heart I pray that a merciful God may not delay too long their redemption, that the day of salvation be not so far removed that they perish; that it be not again too late."

I, too, say Bataan shall be redeemed. The vile barbarism of the hand that wreaked havoc upon our people with all the terrible consequences of cruel and devastating war shall be destroyed. The guilty will be punished. No plea of madness will bar retribution.

No; Bataan was not fought in vain, a futile sacrifice upon the altar of militarism. The greatest single defeat of our history has proven worth the tears and blood. Bataan has taught that America can lose a battle and win the war.

Let us hope and pray that after we win the war, that the heroism and sacrifices of those who fought at Bataan and on other battle fronts, past, present, and future, will be the guiding spirit to our statesmen in winning the peace.

T. V. A. and Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERE COOPER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of April 14, 1944:

T. V. A. AND POLITICS

The Tennessee Valley Authority, when it was first established, constituted an experiment with a new type of governmental instrument—the regional development corporation. Today it is almost universally acknowledged that the experiment has been signally successful. No one now dares openly to assail the T. V. A. But Congress at present has under consideration two proposals by Senator MCKELLAR—passed by the Senate as amendments to the independent offices appropriation bill and currently before a Senate-House conference committee—the effect of which would be to undermine the political independence which has been the cornerstone of the agency's effective operation. It is of the very first importance to American Government that these proposals be defeated.

In setting up the T. V. A., Congress gave the most careful consideration, through committee hearings and debates on the floor, to the principles of organization and the managerial policies under which this new instrument of government was to be administered. It laid down two basic rules: (1) that responsibility should be fixed in one place for an entire undertaking of varied yet interrelated parts; (2) that politics should be rigidly excluded from the selection of personnel and the technical decisions to be made by T. V. A. The purpose of these two rules was summed up recently by Senator LISTER HILL, one of the South's ablest and most progressive legislators, who as a Representative in 1933 was one of the conference managers for the original T. V. A. bill and just lately led the defense of the agency in the Senate. The intent of the whole T. V. A. statute, he said recently, was "to create an agency which would be free of some of the Government red tape about which we complain, which would have authority commensurate with its responsibilities. We made certain that it could not 'pass the buck' to another bureau or department in the event of failure, and that it would not be required to waste time and energy in jurisdictional disputes. It was intended that the Board alone be held responsible for the effective administration of the policies laid down by Congress."

One of Senator MCKELLAR'S proposals would require the T. V. A. to deposit its receipts in the Treasury's general fund and come to Congress each year for operating appropriations. As we have pointed out before, this could not fail to be a serious handicap to efficiency and would make it impossible for officials to deal adequately with unforeseen contingencies. It would, moreover, subject the T. V. A. to political pressures respecting such matters as the location of power lines or the granting of special concessions to favored companies from which it ought to be kept altogether free. T. V. A.'s financial operations are now meticulously audited and subject to the closest congressional scrutiny. This attempt to take hold of its purse strings can have only the most sinister political implications.

We have dealt many times in the past with Senator MCKELLAR'S other proposal—senatorial confirmation of all executive appointments to jobs above the $4,500 level. T. V. A. would be only one of many victims of this transparent patronage grab. But its victimization would be peculiarly disastrous because it would end forthwith all hope for the authority's political independence. T. V. A. simply could not do the job assigned to it if its personnel had to be chosen at the behest of Congressmen—Senator MCKELLAR, for example. Its work is of a highly specialized and technical character calling for appointments strictly on a merit basis.

In passing these amendments advanced by Senator MCKELLAR, the Senate has threatened to destroy one of the most hopeful contemporary adaptations to the problems of Government in our complex economy. We hope fervently that the House conferees will not let these narrow, vindictive, and venal measures become law. They strike at the root of sound administration.

A Report on the Second Session of the Seventy-eighth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Bridgeport Chamber of Commerce on April 11, 1944:

Ladies and gentlemen, Benjamin Franklin once said: "The absent are never without faults, nor the present without excuses." He was speaking, no doubt, of his Congressman. In any case, I am very happy today, after a long absence from Bridgeport, to be asked to report to you on the second session of the Seventy-eighth Congress, and to offer whatever reasonable excuses there may be for the failures and faults of a congressional session in which there were few outstanding accomplishments and virtues.

The history of the Seventy-eighth Congress has been a complicated and a stormy one. But of necessity, I must review that history briefly. And brevity is bound to rob such a report of much significant political and legislative detail.

In trying to report succinctly on so vital a subject, I am reminded of the story of the English cub reporter who was frequently bawled out for relating too many details, by an editor naturally pressed for space. After one such last warning, the cub reporter turned in the following copy: "A shooting occurred last night. Sir Dwight Hopeless, a guest at Lady Panmore's ball, complained of feeling ill, took a highball, his hat, his coat, his departure, no notice of his friends, a taxi, a pistol from his pocket, and finally his life. Nice chap. Regrets and all that sort of thing."

If one were to condense the history of the Seventy-eighth Congress in similar fashion, it might read like this. "The price for the third and fourth terms has been very high for the American people. Franklin Delano Roosevelt, an able politician, campaigning as the man best fitted to keep America out of war, sought and won the third term in the face of tradition, the instincts of the people, and an unmistakably anti-New Deal trend in the country. War came anyway. So Franklin Roosevelt faced a disillusioned people, the Seventy-eighth anti-New Deal Congress, and a hundred national and international problems which cried for the leadership of a man who should stand wholly above personal ambitions or partisan politics. In spite of which, he seemed to wish 16 years in office. Whereupon the Congress, Democrats and Republicans, took fright, took stock, took heart, took themselves to politics, took every legislative means to clout the administration over the head, took Roosevelt down, took few bows for any other accomplishments. Awfully hard on the war effort and the American people."

Yes, history will certainly relate the story of the Seventy-eighth Congress as a long and bitter struggle by the legislative branch of the Government to wrest from the executive branch the proper restoration of those powers which, if there had been no third term, would naturally have returned to it. Had there been no third term, or even today no threat of a fourth term, the Seventy-eighth Congress would have been free to concentrate completely on the conduct of the war and the shaping of our foreign and domestic post-war policies. The force of public opinion alone would have made Congress cooperate fully with truly disinterested leadership from the White House. For if the President were not so widely believed to be a fourth-term candidate, there would then be no reason to suspect that any request of his for this or that legislation was inspired by a desire to keep himself in power. Increasingly, during the past 4 years, the great energies of both the Chief Executive and the Congress have been tragically diverted to a dreadful internecine struggle which has ill served the cause of the American people at war.

Once again it seems that George Washington and Thomas Jefferson were right when they established the tradition that two terms in office sufficed to safeguard the welfare of our Republic.

But to return to a specific, though brief, review of the second session of the Seventy-eighth Congress. In this atmosphere of mutual distrust, suppurated with political suspicion and saturated with political expedience, in which Congressmen on both sides of the aisle missed no opportunity, however small, to pin back the ears of a President of "ambitious views," to use the words of Jefferson, Congress passed only three major pieces of legislation.

One act authorized the expenditure of $1,350,000,000 for U. N. R. R. A. This is the amount of the people's money that the Congress has authorized the administration to spend on Europe's post-war grocery bill. I was heartily in accord with the passage of this legislation. The rehabilitation of post-war Europe is vitally necessary, not only to a peaceful world but to American post-war prosperity. But I would feel much better about voting that sum if I were sure that the American people were totally aware of two facts:

First. That this $1,350,000,000 is really only about half the amount we are going to be asked to lay out for Europe's grocery bill, for another billion and a half, for post-war feeding of Europeans and Asiatics, is concealed in future Army and Navy appropriation bills, for food to be used in the wake of our armies, and in lend-lease military protocols to our allies, notably our lend-lease protocols to the Russians. Once the Russians have crossed their old frontiers, they will be using American groceries in all the countries they occupy. I would like it if in the countries soon to be occupied by the Russians the peoples were as well aware of the source of their groceries as they are of the nationality of their Russian liberators, for food is a very great political weapon, both in war and in post-war strategy. "Who eats my bread sings my song." And I think it would serve both the cause of democracy and American interests best if the peoples of Europe and Asia would sing Yankee Doodle Dandy quite as loudly as they will sing the Internationale or Britannia Rules the Waves. In short, I hope this $3,000,000,000 European grocery bill, which will be presented to the American taxpayer, will be as much a matter of common knowledge in foreign lands as it is bound to be in America.

The second fact I am not certain that Americans are aware of is that many of our present domestic agricultural policies may well result in such serious American food shortages that when the war is over we may not be able to feed the peoples of Europe, anyway.

The second major bill passed in Congress was one which my subcommittee worked on, and reported out of the Military Affairs Committee, the bill to provide mustering-out pay up to $300 for servicemen, at a total cost of about $3,500,000,000 to the people. No one in Congress quarreled with this legislation, which was designed to provide a small monetary cushion to the ex-serviceman, in order to tide him over the time during which he sought to adjust himself to civilian life.

It is to be hoped that no further legislation of such a nature, certainly no bonus legislation, will be passed until the whole problem of what fair and generous financial arrangements are to be made for ex-servicemen and their families can be reviewed by a calm and nonpartisan Congress. There is today, however, a desperate need for the Congress to turn its attention vigorously to the drafting of over-all legislation for the rehabilitation, care, and reemployment of our returned veterans. For my part, I would like to see all legislation affecting ex-servicemen and their families gathered together in one comprehensive omnibus veterans' bill, to be handled after its passage by one department of the Government and placed under one governmental roof, so to speak.

The third major piece of legislation was the soldiers' vote bill, passed only after months of bitter wrangling and savage and sometimes deliberate misunderstanding by both sides. Some of the arguments both for and against the Federal ballot bill were sound. But many of them were merely sound. In the end, the States' rightists won an equivocal victory. Of course, there are always two sides to every question, and they say a politician will generally take both of them. But I am being utterly sincere when I say that, whereas I feel that a straight Federal ballot was desirable both from the point of view of the soldier and home-front patriot, I am glad that its defeat has guaranteed that the constitutionality of the next election will be unchallengeable.

It was above all in this debate that one saw how the third-term and fourth-term ambitions of the President had compromised, poisoned, and vitiated the patriotic instincts of many legislators, both in his own party and in the opposition. In the end, the President, softened up by the stinging rebuke his veto of the tax bill had received, let the bill become law without his signature. If soldiers do not vote in the next election in as great numbers as we all could wish, the blame must be shared by the President with the Congress.

I have spoken of the tax bill. This bill was finally passed in such an unsatisfactory form that the President vetoed it. Not his veto, but the language in which it was couched, provoked the storm that ensued. The message bristled with jibes and barbs, and was interlarded with a contempt for Congress almost unique in the history of Executive messages. The storm was climaxed by the resignation of long-suffering New Deal Senator BARKLEY as the Senate majority leader. BARKLEY was forthwith unanimously reelected majority leader by a Democratic caucus. And then the Senate and the House, its unique purse-string power impugned, its dignity affronted, passed the tax bill by an overwhelming majority. Had the President, in his veto message, taken a temperate tone, and made a simple patriotic plea for higher taxes to foot the war bill with, the answer of Congress might have been different. Here was yet another unhappy example of how the knock-down, drag-out battle between a domineering, power-hungry Chief Executive and a stubborn, alarmed legislature compromised the war effort.

Only one major appropriation bill, the first deficiency, was passed.

A bill extending the Commodity Credit Corporation and its crop-lending powers again reached the floor, festooned with anti-subsidy amendments—just as had occurred in the previous session of the Seventy-eighth Congress. When passed, after acrimonious debate, this bill was also scorchingly vetoed. But this time the President's veto was sustained. And for a simple reason. While the Congress profoundly, and I believe properly, suspects the cynical election uses to which a fourth-term aspirant may put subsidies, the Congress is equally concerned about inflation. The Congress is not at all anxious to have the onus for inflation laid on its doorstep. But all the debates on this legislation were dominated by the fear that the administration would, once granted the wholly legitimate economic instrumentalities of subsidies, abuse them politically. Still one more tragic example of the high price every consumer in the land is today paying for the fourth-term desire. We will no doubt see an unhappy reenactment of that entire bare-knuckled debate when, in the next session, we receive again the Price Control Act—which now expires June 30. This bill is now pending before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. The outcome is unpredictable. But on the record of past performance, it would seem that the farm bloc, in alliance with those who cannot but fear, as I say, the political uses to which subsidies may be put, will prevail to vote down subsidy authority—and thus invite another scorching veto.

De Tocqueville, that wise and sympathetic critic of American institutions, once wrote: "A candidate who is not the President, seeking the Presidency, is but an individual, while the President seeking renomination is the state itself, intriguing and corrupting with its immense resources." To keep these immense resources out of the hands of a President seeking renomination for the fourth time was the great battle fought—though not completely won—in the last session of Congress. And partially won in the process was the real battle for the restoration to Congress of its constitutional powers.

So much for the last session. Its whole political temper was keynoted, not by a Republican, but by a Democrat, and an ardent new dealer at that, Senator BARKLEY. "Dear Alben," in the manner of "Dear Brutus," was the good friend who finally, in the name of the peoples' representative government, delivered the unkindest cut of all to the New Deal Caesar. For BARKLEY had begun to see which way the American political winds were blowing. All through the session the Democrats had been growing more and more jittery as they lost district after district in special elections. In 11 elections the Republicans had won 8 seats, including 3 held previously by Democrats. Today their membership in the House is below a clear majority and although the election of W. G. STIGLER in the Second Oklahoma District gave them a shot in the arm, it did not allay their deep doubts about November 1944. For in all these elections the leadership of Roosevelt himself had been made the issue. Publicly, the Democrats are still claiming that the name of F. D. R. remains potent magic at the ballot box. But privately in the cloak rooms, in the House restaurant, they will tell you that this just ain't so. When big ED JOHNSON, the Senator from Colorado, plumped against the fourth term in Chicago recently he voiced the private conviction of many a Democratic Senator and Congressman and started what may yet be a bandwagon rush away from Roosevelt. Senator BAILEY and Senator BYRD may second at any moment this un-nomination of their ancient party leader. Many a Democrat today is beginning to view his own bootstraps as a safer device for political levitation than Mr. Roosevelt's threadbare coattails. Add, that many governmental activities have stirred up that bitterest of all questions, racial questions, and you have the formula for a sizable anti-Roosevelt rebellion in Democratic ranks in Congress.

Thus, as I say, the loss of many special elections, continual Democratic as well as Republican sniping at the President and vice versa, the President's own tragic lack of leadership on vexing and crucial home front problems, the even split in numbers between Democrats and Republicans, and the imminence of a national election, all conspire to the creation of an atmosphere hardly conducive to the passage of vigorous, foresighted, dynamic national legislation in the next session.

And yet—there is a next session to be gotten through before the November elections can happily clear this surcharged air. What is there to be accomplished which can be accomplished when we meet again this week?

I have already touched on some of that legislation: The Price Control Act and veterans' legislation. There are a dozen appropriation bills to be passed by June 30, including the independent offices appropriation bill, with its highly debatable McKellar amendment, requiring Senate confirmation of every Government employee earning $4,500 or more. And there is still to be enacted the extension of the lend-lease program. H. R. 4254 now has a new amendment, and I believe an excellent one, offered by Representative WADSWORTH, which would make the Congress, rather than the President, the final arbiter of settlements between the United States and beneficiary lend-lease nations after the war.

A bill is also being worked on, in the Ways and Means Committee, to simplify our Rube Goldberg tax laws. As things stand today, a man who doesn't know how to make out his income tax goes into jail. Let us hope when he does know how he won't go into bankruptcy. In any case this bill ought to encounter few difficulties on the floor, and will certainly be welcomed by the American people.

And then there is the question of whether or not to pass manpower legislation. The manpower problem has been before my committee ever since I went to Congress. To date, the War Manpower Commissioner, Mr. Paul McNutt, has not demonstrated that he could effectively solve the problems of shortages, replacements, and turn-overs.

Today, with the Presidential termination of almost all draft deferments of men under 26, and with the decided trend of war workers back to private civilian employment, there rises a new threat to our production program. The best known solution in the Congress is the Wadsworth-Austin national service bill, which has received new attention since the President called recently for national service legislation. I do not hesitate to say I have always been vigorously against this over-all National Service Act as a workable or democratic solution to our manpower problem. I have offered myself legislation of a very limited nature, designed specifically to divert nonessentially employed 4–F's and 38–45 unmarried men into essential industry. Although my last bill has been reported as a labor-draft bill, it is nothing of the kind. Even so, I have never pressed this legislation, and I do not do so now. I prefer, as every American should, to see the production home-front job entirely done by private initiative and the voluntary method, if it is at all possible. Nevertheless, should legislation become necessary—and most departments of the Government charged with the war effort have testified before my committee that it is necessary—I favor limited and specific legislation, such as my own, which will not in any way threaten the gains made by union labor. For no unbiased review of organized labor's part in this war can fail to show it has on the whole magnificently met the challenge of production. It is such specific legislation I have tried to draft, in case—and only in case—legislation is needed.

Another piece of legislation upon which my committee has worked, and which I believe to be of primary importance to this Nation, as well as to Connecticut and our Bridgeport area, is contract-termination legislation. There are bills in the Senate, in the Naval Affairs Committee, and before various other committees of the Congress which duplicate this legislation before our own committee. I don't care a fig which committee's bill finally comes to the floor, if only we will soon pass a bill which will enable war contractors to be paid fully and promptly as their contracts are canceled, clear their factories of Government-owned facilities, and enable them to convert with utmost rapidity to consumer production. Legislation too long postponed or faulty legislation in this field may easily result in longer bread lines and vaster unemployment than this country has ever known. Good legislation may pave the way to greater prosperity than even the most optimistic can foresee.

Now I have perhaps painted too gloomy a picture for you of the atmosphere in which the Congress has worked this past 18 months—and is doomed to work until next January. There are bright portents and hopeful signs both in the mood of the men who make up your Congress and in the legislation upon which they are working. Congress's many economy measures in the last session are rightly to be applauded. Bipartisan committees in both Houses are working most honestly and patriotically to explore programs for our post-war industrial, agricultural, and employment problems; and although it was a resolution doomed to defeat by the administration, the Palestine resolution, sponsored by Connecticut's own RANULF COMPTON, was a sign of the humanitarian and international understanding Republicans are showing for foreign peoples. And while it may not sound so to those who are forced to listen to radios almost completely dominated by New Deal commentators, today in Republican ranks in Congress there is a wholehearted, realistic, and vigarous interest in America's role in post-war international problems. It was, after all, the trenchant letter of 24 freshmen Congressmen, of whom I had the honor to be one, to Secretary Hull which finally drove him to the radio on Sunday night to explain the administration's foreign policy to the Nation and elicited from him the promise to cooperate and consult fully with the Congress in the future.

Indeed, I could say, very tritely, it is often darkest before the dawn, and that Congress has, I believe, hit its legislative bottom. I believe that from here out, as the great issues, both foreign and domestic, are debated in the public forum in this election year—yes, precisely because of this debate—Congress will soon begin to formulate clearer policies, better legislation, a more vigorous program; so that, in the end, in both your Houses, legislative victories will be won for the people that are worthy of the military victories that our soldiers are winning for us in the Pacific and the Atlantic. And I can further reassure you that when you have penetrated the smoke and pall of politics that unavoidably hang over a Congress threatened by an unprecedented fourth term every Congressman, Democrat as well as Republican, stands united with all his colleagues on the question of victory. To win the war, finally and indisputably, and to make a better world and a better America, is the deep desire of every Congressman. We are Americans first and Republicans and Democrats only secondarily. And that is why, cost what it has, in wealth or in blood, every piece of legislation that has been presented to your Congress since the day of Pearl Harbor which has clearly had to do with aid to our allies and victory to our arms has passed swiftly and overwhelmingly. Next year the President may change, or he may not. But this year, regardless of what happens at the polls, your Congress will, to a man, vote for victory over America's enemies.

Records of Three Wars Show How Lucky We Are

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Record of April 9, 1944:

RECORDS OF THREE WARS SHOW HOW LUCKY WE ARE

Uncle Sam has won his most important battle on the home front.

President Roosevelt has released a report from his economic advisers which shows that in the year since his hold-the-line order prices were reasonably stabilized.

For 12 months the United States Department of Labor price index has remained around 134—a remarkable testimonial to the efficacy of the entire O. P. A. program.

True, some prices increased in that year, but others dropped. What matters most is that a level generally has been maintained—thanks to a vigilant O. P. A. and to generally wholehearted public cooperation.

As the President's advisers state: "One year of stable living costs is a record unprecedented in this war or in the last war."

To a lot of people, however, statistics don't mean much.

That's why Edwin Kemp's recent interview with Clay Park, grocer, of Three Springs, Huntingdon County—which appeared in the Record the other day—tells us in a homely but effective way how lucky we really are on the home front in this war.

The Park store has been a landmark for many years. It was old when the Civil War broke out. Its ancient, faded records tell the story—

The cost of the market basket in three of this Nation's great wars: The Civil War, World War No. 1, and the present war.

During the Civil War, for example, Park's records show that calico which formerly sold for 10 cents a yard soared to $1 a yard. Likewise, muslin, "the same we now sell for 18 cents."

Let's hear more from Grover Park:

"Coffee? In the Civil War there wasn't any. People had to do with roasted rye. There was very little wheat. Flour you now buy for $2.85 a sack was $7.50 then. Soldiers got $13 a month, when they got it, so they and their families had no purchasing power."

The Park's store records show interesting comparisons with World War No. 1. Here are a few extracts:

"In World War No. 1 a 48-pound bag of flour you can buy for $2.85 today was $4, and in order to get it you had to buy rice flour, barley flour, and other substitutes which brought the price to $8.

"Sugar was 30 to 32 cents a pound. Today it's 7 cents. We sold Boscul coffee in 1918 for 55 cents. Same brand is now 35 to 38 cents. Butter we're selling for 50 cents now was 70 cents then."

In that country store they sell shoes as well as groceries, and the same books show that shoes now selling for $6.50 were $15 in World War No. 1.

Perhaps you read the whole story. But these facts and figures are worth repeating because they tell us how fortunate we have been and how well—in spite of griping and opposition—the price control program has succeeded.

Whether you take the statistics which show the price index stabilized or the records of Clay Park's country store—you can see what a good job has been done for you by the O. P. A. and by W. L. B., which has kept wages down.

Yet at this very moment O. P. A. is fighting for its life.

The Emergency Price Control and Stabilization Acts expire after June 30 and Congress is now debating their reenactment.

There is strong opposition. Especially from groups which would stand to gain bigger profits if O. P. A. ceilings were killed and the sky again became the limit of the price index.

Look at that price index again. Reflect on the faded records of Clay Park's country store. Then ask yourself whether we are to keep the system which has kept prices in control—or whether we are to junk it under profiteer pressure?

We know what your answer will be.

But don't tell it to us. Write your Congressman.

A 3-cent stamp now will save dollars in your market basket after June 30.

Advertising Subsidy for Newspapers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ED ROWE
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Elyria (Ohio) Chronicle-Telegram of March 31, 1944:

WE DON'T BELIEVE IN SUCH A SUBSIDY

Reports from Washington are to the effect that congressional advocates of a Government advertising subsidy for newspapers are pressing for a hearing before the House Rules Committee to bring before the House their bill for a $15,000,000 yearly subsidy.

The bill purports to aid War bond campaigns and the stabilization program by forcing the Treasury to pay 12½ to 15 million dollars yearly for advertising War bonds in weekly newspapers and some 400 small dailies.

The Treasury is opposed to the subsidy bill on the ground that it would disrupt the system by which record-breaking amounts of advertising are contributed by advertisers to War bond campaigns.

It is stated that the bill is supported by officials of the National Editorial Association, representing half of the 10,000 weekly newspapers who would get an average, in excess of $1,000 annually for bond and other governmental advertising.

We are opposed to this bill and we sincerely hope it will be defeated. We have a number of reasons for our opposition to it. If this amount were spent in newspapers it would not be long until there would be another bill calling for equal or larger amounts to be spent in magazines, radio, out-door advertising, direct-mail advertising, and larger newspapers.

We wrote to Senators BURTON and TAFT, and Congressman BENDER, back in June 1943, that in our opinion the Government needs to spend less, not more money. This bill is just another one to open the floodgates of public spending. We do not believe it is sound business for the spending of advertising dollars should be determined by the market so as to get the greatest value for the dollars spent.

Such a proposition might well develop into a subsidy to the newspapers of the country and this would be a dangerous thing for the people, for the Government, and for the newspapers themselves.

We have long felt that the newspapers of America cannot afford to place themselves in a position where anyone might have an opportunity to accuse them of securing benefits from the Government. Subsidies for advertising is just an opening wedge to a policy that newspapers might eventually find very hard to combat.

The idea of a free press is fundamental. We de not believe that any publisher should jeopardize the freedom of his editorial expression.

We fear that governmental subsidies might eventually be destructive to the very spirit of a free press.

Advertising is a business proposition. It should be purchased on the basis of the service it renders in the production of sales or creating a desire to purchase. We believe the newspapers should be resourceful enough to sell space direct to the citizens of this country in sufficient amount to publicize bond-selling campaigns. We do not believe it should be necessary for the Government to pay for any such advertising space. We can't see why the Government should take on additional overhead in War bond campaigns. We can't see why the Government should be seeking new avenues into which to pour public funds.

We have long believed that the greatest asset that a newspaper has is the confidence of the public. This confidence could deteriorate under a Government subsidy set-up because of the possible political influence. We know that a lot of publishers feel free to criticize governmental policies now. We wonder just how much effect and in what direction advertising subsidies would have. We can see where political influence might be a great deal stronger where it is backed by subsidy funds from the Government which would be paid for advertising.

We believe it would be a very short-sighted policy for publishers to accept such advertising subsidies from the Government. In the long run the influence of such public funds might be disastrous on newspaper policy. We hope we shall never see the day that any governmental official will be in a position to bring any influence on any newspaper, large or small, because of advertising funds he may have at his command.

We believe individuals should sponsor advertising as they desire but we can't see such an expenditure being made by the Government.

Government Anti-Inflation Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Federal grand jury report from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Indiana, Fort Wayne division, April term 1944:

The grand jury sitting at Fort Wayne, Ind., for the northern district of Indiana herewith presents a report of its investigation into alleged black-market activity in said district, this 12th day of April 1944.

We have conducted this investigation for the purpose of determining the degree of compliance with all phases of the anti-inflation program of the Government. We have heard evidence from approximately 335 witnesses called from each of the 32 counties of the district, as well as leading experts and businessmen. The investigation has concerned itself with alleged black-market activity in the fields of gasoline, oil, and tires; food and liquors; industrial materials; farm machinery; and the rent program of the Office of Price Administration.

The grand jury, in addition to hearing scores of general witnesses, has heard evidence in 41 specific cases of black-market activity and herewith returns in open court 24 indictments, charging 26 persons and corporations with violations of the Federal statutes investigated by this grand jury; 14 cases were continued for further investigation.

Gasoline, oil, and tires: The principal black market with respect to gasoline is brought about by the illegal printing and distribution of counterfeit coupons of B, C, R, and T denominations. There is also evidence of illegal activity in the district with respect to the unlawful sale and transfer of gasoline in the market where no coupons are required for the purchase of gasoline.

The Office of Price Administration, and other law enforcement agencies, have been vigilant and active in investigating and apprehending the illegitimate dealers in gasoline but are urged by the grand jury to double their efforts and improve the vehicles of enforcement in order to strike down the coupon counterfeiters. They are the greatest menace to the legitimate market and present a problem in the enforcement of the law.

Unless the black-market activity in gasoline is curbed the legitimate supply for the consuming public will be materially diminished.

The grand jury found no black-market activity with relation to fuel oil.

The investigation revealed no evidence of black-market activity in automobile tires in the district.

Food and liquors: There is some activity on the part of a few wholesale fruit and vegetable merchants in the district to evade ceiling prices. The evasion is brought about by either directly overcharging the retail merchant or by invoicing the ceiling prices to the merchant and in addition receiving side payments in cash for the merchandise involved. The evidence before the grand jury indicated that such practices cause the retail dealer to sell at a loss or in turn sell at retail prices over the ceiling level as prescribed by law.

The grand jury heard evidence from wholesale or retail liquor dealers from every one of the 32 counties in the district. There is evidence of a few persons traveling about the district and offering liquor for sale in case lots far in excess of the ceiling price. The grand jury is continuing its investigation into these practices.

The practice of tying in unwanted spirituous merchandise with the sale of whisky by a wholesaler to a retailer is condemned.

The grand jury finds that no evidence of alleged violations of food-price regulations has been presented against any person or corporation unless prior notice of such alleged violations has been given an opportunity for compliance afforded.

Industrial materials: The grand jury found no evidences of black-market activity in the field of industrial materials.

Farm machinery and equipment: The grand jury found that the heavy demand for farm equipment, coupled with the practically nonexistent supply of new farm equipment, had created terrific pressures against the used farm-equipment ceilings. Evidence was presented to the grand jury which revealed that machinery of this character had brought several times its ceiling price; used equipment in many cases selling for sums far in excess of its price when new. In the absence of vigorous enforcement this condition, we believe, will contribute materially to the inflationary spiral.

Rent: In the northern district of Indiana, the grand jury found virtually universal compliance with the rent program of the Office of Price Administration. Only two instances were found on which to base indictments in this field, indicating the substantial compliance in the district on the part of property owners.

From all of the evidence presented the grand jury desires to report that almost all persons, with few exceptions, were in favor of the Government's program to curb inflation. The control of war prices, rationing, and rent was considered a good thing as a whole—minor improvements were suggested and made a part of the transcript of the record.

The grand jury desires to inform the court in conclusion that generally the drive against inflation in the district has been successful. The report of the investigation conducted by the grand jury and the indictments returned herewith for alleged violations of the war price, rationing, and rent program are presented as an aid in the enforcement of the law and to assist in the drive against inflation.

Respectfully submitted.

Civil Aeronautics Act, 1938

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a letter from the Pacific American Steamship Association to Hon. CLARENCE F. LEA on the subject of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938:

PACIFIC AMERICAN STEAMSHIP ASSOCIATION,
San Francisco, Calif., March 20, 1944.
Hon. CLARENCE F. LEA,
Chairman, Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LEA: Referring to your letter of February 14 addressed to our Washington, D. C., office, and with particular reference to the third paragraph, which reads:

"This would break down the general policy of preventing monopoly by undue control of one type of carrier by another which developed out of protection of water transportation 30 years ago. On account of the widespread application of the proposal, it must be considered in relation to the whole problem."

We are not suggesting "undue control of one type of carrier by another." What the shipping industry has suggestd, which it contends is only fair and just treatment, is the removal of a discrimination which has grown out of misinterpretation of the law by the Civil Aeronautics Board which would prevent overseas carriers from using planes integrated with their ships in a complete transportation system between their customary terminals, serving the same business which they have developed and to which they have furnished transportation services for many years.

That it is necessary for a transportation system, or any other type of business, to progressively apply new methods and new and modern types of equipment which serve the same purpose and which are desired by the public and are in the public interest. In this instance the industry envisions the transition of a portion of its passenger business from surface carriers to air carriers. The extent of such transition depends upon the wishes of the traveling public. To the extent that the traveling public desires to use air transport, the regular line carriers which have developed and served this business for a great many years should be allowed to furnish this type of service in conjunction with their customary services, as a complete transportation system. It follows the many progressive steps which have taken place in transportation, from one mode or form to another.

That what the shipping industry is suggesting is the opposite of monopoly. To restrict aviation development to particular groups would trend toward monopoly. The shipping interests have never suggested any diminution in the number of permits which might be issued by the Civil Aeronautics Board as found by them to be in the public interest. All that the industry asks is the same privilege which all other citizens have, to utilize aviation in conjunction with its business where this can be shown to a proper Government regulatory body as being in the public interest. The shipping industry does ask the removal of a discriminatory misinterpretation of the law by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

There has never been any general policy of dividing modes of transportation as these apply to traffic outside the boundaries of the United States. The Panama Canal Act and the Motor Carrier Act deal only with internal commerce, which is strictly controlled and regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Congress has always recognized by the application of a different rule that overseas commerce should be given different treatment. It cannot therefore be said that in removing this discrimination against the shipping industry there would be a breakdown of general policy.

We feel that perhaps there has been a misunderstanding concerning the shipping industry's objective, and as to the whole proposition, and are confident a reanalysis will justify the giving of the relief sought.

Very truly yours,
J. P. WILLIAMS, Secretary.

School Hot-Lunch Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I have had many inquiries in reference to the attitude of Congress toward assisting the States to establish and maintain school lunch programs. This program has been in existence for some time, but unless legislation is enacted for the next fiscal year Federal assistance to the various schools will soon be discontinued.

In my district the school hot-lunch program has been of great advantage to many rural communities and other sections of the district in taking care of numerous school children who desire that this program be continued.

I think a mistake was made when the House failed to adopt legislation for this purpose, and it is a matter of record that the House Appropriations Committee made no appropriation in the appropriation bill submitted by the Committee on Agriculture for the purpose of continuing the school hot-lunch program.

This program has operated successfully in my district. School children are transported by bus many miles from home to school, and, in my opinion, this program has contributed to the health and physical condition of the students.

The appropriation bill is now pending in the Senate and the only way to continue the school hot-lunch program is to have an amendment adopted in the Senate for that purpose. I am hopeful that the Senate will take favorable action so that this matter may again be presented to the House under the parliamentary procedure for further and favorable action in connection therewith. I shall support such a Senate amendment.

Organization of Fair Employment Practices Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN S. GIBSON
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I have been very deeply concerned over the purposes and activities of the organization here in Washington known as the Fair Employment Practices Committee. It is common knowledge that such an organization could have no proper functions in this democracy. It has been my opinion that it was born of the fertile mind of someone in this commonwealth of communistic philosophy and based on its activities I am convinced that my convictions were founded on truth and fact. The Communists some months ago came out with the statement that the South was the black man's country and in substance that they expected to put him in possession of the property of the South and in control of its destiny and people.

I have recently procured factual information on the personnel of this committee, which I think will and should be of vital interest to the membership of this body and for that matter to every taxpayer in the United States. It is, of course, known that Malcolm Ross is chairman of the committee, whose function is reputed to be to see that there is no discrimination in employment account of race or color in this country. It is noteworthy in the organization of his committee this principle is most flagrantly violated. Over all, there are 106 paid employees—61 Negroes and 45 whites. Compare that with the percentage of Negroes against the percentage of whites in this country. I am a great believer in letting the people know the facts and that with such knowledge they will correct any wrong. When the people are called upon to favor increased taxes I hope you will remember this committee which is not only totally useless, but a vicious bureau that breeds disunity and costs the people each 12 months $317,160 or approximately $1,000,000 every 3 years. The 45 white employees draw $143,600 per annum and the 61 Negroes draw $173,560 per annum. The employees of this bureau are the highest paid of any bureau or department of the Federal Government, on a per capita basis.

In the central office where all the policies are made and enforced here in Washington there are 10 white employees and 35 Negro employees, the whites drawing $48,540 per annum and the Negroes $94,220.

The chairman is white, his associate fair-practice examiner is a Negro. The office of the chairman is staffed by 2 other whites and 3 Negroes. His administrative office is staffed by 11 Negroes and no whites. His Operations Section is staffed with 7 Negroes and 6 whites, his Review and Analysis Section has 7 Negroes and 3 whites. His Legal Division 2 Negroes only. Hearing examiners, 1 white and 5 Negroes. The Director of Review and Analysis is a Negro. In fact, the whole set-up is strictly Negro dominated with just enough whites to give a slight diversity of color. This is the gang that goes into the South and sets up offices with Negroes and whites working together; to Detroit and sets up an office with one Edward M. Swann, a Negro man, as fair-practice examiner, at a salary of $3,800 per year, with a white lady for his secretary at $1,620 per year, the 2 constituting the entire office force. This is the same gang that has told the management of southern railroads they must use Negro engineers and conductors, and union officials that they must accept Negroes in their organizations.

In the capital of my State, Atlanta, Ga., this same gang of Washington Negroes, by the authority of this committee, set up an office with Bruce Hunt, a white man, as senior fair-practice examiner, at $5,400 per year; John Hope, Jr., a Negro, as associate fair-practice examiner, at $3,800 per year; James H. Tipton, white, associate fair-practice examiner, at $3,200 per year; Myra Bunting, white, clerk-stenographer, at $1,800 per annum; and Thelma Horton, Negro, whose classification and salary was either intentionally or inadvertently omitted. Please note that Hope, the Negro, and Tipton, the white, have exactly the same classification, the only distinction being color, and the Negro gets $3,800 and the white $3,200 for the same duties and in the same office, and yet this infernal Committee is designated the Fair Employment Practices Committee.

They were liberal enough to let the regional offices in the deep South have a slight advantage in number of white personnel. In New York, however, the regional office has a personnel of nine, six of whom are Negroes and three whites. The big boss, head of the office, with the classification of regional director, is a Negro at $5,600 per year, and the highest paid white in the office is designated "associate field examiner" at $3,200. His white lady assistant clerk-stenographer gets only $1,620, while her Negro boss draws approximately three and one-half times this amount.

There are four regional directors in the entire United States, one Negro at $5,600 per year and one Negro at $4,600 and two whites at $4,600 per year. You will note in every instance the Negro has the controlling voice and the higher salary with the same classification.

I am wondering if our people have reached the great divide in the path of civilization and have started down the slope to the sunset of the same. I wonder if they have become so spineless—and in this I include the membership of the Congress—and so weak and faint of heart that they will see perish before their eyes all that has made our Nation great, and sleep through the operation being performed on our democratic system of government by the Communists of this country, and let them bury beside the heroes who made the air free for Old Glory to fly, the Stars and Stripes that has stood vigil over their tombs through the years of freedom and progress this Nation has enjoyed.

The greatest responsibility placed on mankind is to keep his race pure; the greatest destroyer of civilization and Christianity is the mongrelization of races. If this bunch of moral lepers are not stopped the depth to which they will bring our citizenry is unpredictable. God made His people as He would have them be, and if you doubt that the full plan and chart of these communistic rats call for a full race adulteration watch the years that are to follow soon, and your complacency so abundantly enjoyed now will stand before you an ugly skeleton of condemnation. I have in the past and expect to in the future warn my people of these dangers and fight these Communist enemies of America as long as I am able to speak.

I hope it will be borne in mind that the Congress had no part in establishing this Committee, nor was this body consulted with regard to the advisability of its establishment; nor has the Congress ever appropriated one dime for the operation of this Committee, the money for its operation being taken from the President's emergency fund.

The President created the Committee by Executive Order No. 9346, May 27, 1943, said Executive order providing:

First. All agencies of the Government of the United States shall include in all contracts a provision obligating the contractor not to discriminate against any employee or applicant for employment because of race, creed, color, or national origin.

Second. All Federal agencies concerned with vocational and training programs for war production shall take all measures appropriate to assure that such programs are administered without discrimination.

Third. The Committee shall formulate policies to achieve the purposes of this order and shall make recommendations to the various Federal departments and agencies. It shall also recommend to the Chairman of the War Manpower Commission appropriate measures for bringing about the full utilization and training of manpower in and for war production without discrimination.

Fourth. The Committee shall receive and investigate complaints of discrimination. It may conduct hearings, make findings of facts, and take appropriate steps to obtain elimination of such discrimination.

Fifth. The Committee shall assume jurisdiction over all complaints and matters pending before the old committee.

Sixth. The Committee shall have the power to promulgate such rules and regulations as may be appropriate or necessary to carry out the provisions of the order.

I have given the full facts as disclosed by the records with regard to this committee's origin, powers, and functions. I leave it to the verdict of the citizenry who make up these United States of ours—

First. Whether this Committee has any place in the orderly progress of our Nation.

Second. Whether the powers granted this committee are beyond that which should be vested in a board of Negroes to exercise against the people of the United States.

Third. Whether the effects of the activities of this Committee create unity or discord and, whether the war effort is advanced or retarded by its existence.

Fourth. Whether the expenditures of these great sums of money can be justified when the people are staggering under the tax load they are now carrying.

Business Controls of Army Service Forces' Procurement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Mr. Howard Bruce, deputy director of matériel, headquarters, Army Service Forces, before the Commerce and Industry Association of New York, Inc., Wednesday, April 5, 1944:

The Army Service Forces' procurement constitutes the largest business under one management that the world has ever seen. It represents an expenditure of close to $2,000,000,000 each month. This figure includes substantial procurement for Lend-Lease, Navy, and the Air Forces, but does not include Army aircraft and related items.

Our task is to design, develop, procure, maintain, and distribute, on time, to camps and stations in this country and to theaters of operation that cover the globe, most of the items needed to equip and to maintain an army of over seven and a half million.

The number of items of supply, including spare parts, reaches a total of more than 1,000,000, involving, it is estimated, over a million prime and subcontracts.

In carrying out its program, the Army Service Forces, at one and the same time, are creating and expediting the completion of new facilities for the production of urgently needed items, putting in stand-by condition other facilities, placing and expediting emergency contracts, largely for newly developed items of supply, cutting back contracts for other items of supply, computing requirements, establishing throughout the organization machinery for accurate price analysis, renegotiating contracts, trying, through the War Manpower Commission and other agencies, to assist in relieving shortages of manpower in certain areas and in taking advantage of surpluses in others.

It is obvious that an enterprise of this magnitude requires close controls. We have been developing controls for years. Our critical problems requiring control are never static, which means that the major effort or the emphasis is constantly shifting. Our experience indicates that whenever and wherever sufficient intensive effort has been brought to bear on a critical problem, it responds to treatment and drops back in degree of urgency. But there is always a new crop of problems to take its place

The shifting of emphasis is illustrated by the phases through which Army Service Forces' procurement has passed. In 1941, while we were constantly planning and preparing, the war had not come close enough to bring about a complete change from the normal way of life. Then Pearl Harbor, overnight, brought on a period of unprecedented expansion—expansion of production in existing facilities and expansion of facilities. The results since that time represent the most remarkable accomplishment by industry, labor, and Government in all history.

Our sights were set high—in some instances, perhaps, too high. We began to run into conflicts between production and the creation of facilities for increased production. More and more we had to bring the various programs into a balance that was within the country's facilities and raw materials capacity.

The priorities system did not balance supply and demand, nor provide adequate controls of distribution of the basic raw materials. Such a system will not work successfully where demand substantially exceeds supply. The production requirements plan, which was an attempted combination of priorities and allocations, though an improvement, was still not adequate. Eventually the controlled-materials plan succeeded in balancing requirements against supply and in controlling distribution of the three basic materials—steel, copper, and aluminum. After some confusion and much education, C. M. P., together with limitation orders, brought the country's production into workable balance so that all essential programs could be met. As a result, it was astounding to observe the almost miraculous shift of emphasis from materials to critical components and finally to manpower.

This brings us to the present. Today the shortage of manpower is our No. 1 worry and is the chief threat to production. We are much concerned about this problem because, so far as we can see, the situation is likely to become worse before it becomes better.

Our second important problem is the necessity for developing even closer and more accurate controls over procurement. This need has become more pressing as the phase of procurement concerned with furnishing initial equipment to troops and filling the "pipe line" approaches completion. From now on, production must closely approximate consumption and with the rapidly changing demands of war, it is difficult to keep the two in balance at all times. This must be done in order to meet the needs of our armed forces and, at the same time, avoid the piling up of surpluses. Surpluses mean wasteful expenditure of money and the absorption of manpower direly needed for items in short supply.

In spite of these manifold problems, both the Army and industry have gained enormously from experience, and many of the production problems that were both difficult and critical have finally settled into grooves. Our procurement is more and more a going concern, and like any going concern, we should operate on a minimum working capital consistent with maintaining our ability to meet promptly all the needs of our armed forces.

For the purpose of closer supply analysis, there has been established an authorized stock level for each item of Army purchase. For each item, the necessary information on inventory, past issue, estimated future issue and scheduled procurement must be brought together. In an effort to achieve balance and flexibility, procurement agencies which a year ago were being urged to place contracts well into the future, in order to get the benefit of proper scheduling, are today being urged to restrict contract commitments to the practical minimum both as to time and quantity. Regardless of the Army's efforts, it is inevitable that when this war does end, there will be surpluses. The mere fact that no one can predict the duration of the war makes it necessary to operate on the assumption of a continuing war. This means the "pipe line" must be kept filled all the way from the manufacturer through the many points of storage and transportation to the theater of operations.

Now that industry has the benefit of 2 years or more of experience, production costs of many items are subject to fewer uncertainties and cost-analysis work is assuming greater prominence. It is the hope that closer buying, with better knowledge of costs, will permit greater use of fixed-price contracts and will supply a substitute for renegotiation.

It is important to realize that such a vast program of procurement cannot be controlled in all minute details from one central point. Therefore, a large degree of decentralization is essential. Each of the seven technical services, which are the procuring and issuing agencies of A. S. F.—Ordnance, Quartermaster Corps, etc.—is responsible for certain classes of items; and these services, in turn, decentralize procurement to their field offices. The degree of decentralization varies with the type and character of the items involved. It is necessary to maintain a closer and more centralized control over items of major significance from a military, monetary, and materials-consuming standpoint than over less important items. Our procedures are designed to take into account such factors—we would become hopelessly enmeshed in red tape and detail if we did not do so.

Cut-backs and their byproducts of contract cancelation and settlement constitute another very large sector of Army Service Forces' business. Definite procedures have been laid down covering the actions to be taken from the moment requirements are reduced until a given plant has been released or placed in stand-by.

Cut-back recommendations of the procuring offices are passed upon in each service by a board of review whose findings are submitted to a similar board in the staff headquarters. There is in process of organization a War Production Board committee that will lay down the policies, criteria, and broad procedures governing the cut-back actions of all the procurement agencies.

In the selection of facilities to be cut back, among the considerations are: Dependability; cost of product to the Government; availability or scarcity of labor; the amount of subcontracting, with particular consideration to the use of smaller war plants; and transportation.

After giving due weight to the above, there often occurs the necessity of a selection between a Government-owned and a privately owned facility. Where there is a probability or even a possibility of a future need for the cut-back item in increased quantity, there is often an advantage in cutting back the Government-owned facility, as it can be placed in stand-by and later, if needed, quickly restored to production. This reasoning will be reversed when cut-backs become wholesale and conditions are such that private industry can return to normal peacetime production without jeopardizing the war effort.

The critical and decisive stage of the war is still ahead of us. Yet this discussion would not be complete without giving assurance that we are doing some sensible planning against the eventual end of the war. General Marshall has been aware of this problem from the beginning, and successive steps have been taken to perfect our plans.

Almost a year ago, a number of committees were set up in the Army Service Forces, among which was one under Maj. Gen. Lucius D. Clay, Director of Matériel, A. S. F., to begin planning on the industrial side of demobilization. Since we began this work, there has been much discussion in Congress, and recently a very able report by Mr. Baruch and Mr. Hancock on war and post-war adjustment policies has disclosed the fact that we are cooperating in the preparation of "an 'X-Day reconversion plan' based on the assumed defeat of Germany on 'X-Day.'"

It is vital that this work be seen in its proper perspective. Today it is distinctly of secondary importance and must not be allowed to interfere with the all-out effort required to defeat our enemies.

The first rough A. S. F. demobilization plan was developed last September, and since that time there have been improvements so that we now have a better plan, not yet perfect, but the planning is being carried forward steadily by a small and detached group of officers working in close collaboration with the Baruch committee, the Army General Staff and other governmental agencies concerned.

It is extremely fortunate that present terminations are providing a laboratory in which the War Department and industry may test principles and methods so that when the problem becomes general, smooth-working plans will be in operation.

It has been our view that our greatest problem at the end of the war would be to clear the decks so that industry could provide employment in the production of civilian products. If we fail in this, demobilization will bring about chaos. Therefore, our plans have emphasized such matters as:

Setting up of machinery for prompt termination and settlement of canceled contracts.

Making available to industry, through prompt payment of claims or other means, its urgent needs for working capital.

Clearing plants so they can promptly return to peacetime work.

We now are sending the many thousands of private plants that contain Government-owned equipment a questionnaire to obtain from each an appraisal of its situation and its judgment of the measures necessary to free it for civilian production. This survey will also develop information on contractors' plans for purchasing or leasing Government-owned facilities.

I cannot leave this subject without again emphasizing the fact that it would be fatal if the Army, industry, labor, and the public generally in this country allowed any post-war considerations to reduce by even the smallest degree the concentration on our one important job—winning the war.

General Somervell recently said: "No organization ever reached perfection in its methods but no organization worth its salt ceases to strive for it." The organization of the Army Service Forces is "worth its salt." It is drawn 95 percent from civil life and represents a cross section of this country. Its management has the same habits of thought and familiarity with business procedures as the men who run this country's industries. They have a full appreciation of the problems and an earnest and enthusiastic desire to improve constantly their performance.

Veterans' Benefits—A Series of Articles by Congressman Philip J. Philbin, of Massachusetts, Appearing in Massachusetts Newspapers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from articles written by me and appearing in the Boston Traveler and other newspapers on veterans' benefits:

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS—MATERNITY CARE PROVIDED BY ACT—PHILBIN POINTS TO APPROPRIATION FOR FREE MEDICAL AID TO WIVES, BABIES

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

(This is the first of a series of articles to appear in the Boston Traveler on veterans' benefits by Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of the Third Massachusetts District.)

With the drafting of pre-Pearl Harbor fathers, American families are facing many bewildering problems. In addition, there has been of late much agitation for congressional action on the recently enacted mustering-out pay bill for veterans of World War No. 2. Evidently some persons have the impression that Congress has done comparatively little for the man in the service.

Of course, this is not true, as I propose to show in this résumé, which describes the various governmental aids and benefits already extended to servicemen and discharged veterans.

I plan to touch, as briefly and as concisely as possible, on monthly family allowances, emergency aid for servicemen and their families made available through the Army Emergency Relief, Navy Relief, and Red Cross home service, maternity and child-care assistance through the State department of health, national service life insurance, veterans' compensation, and related matters which affect veterans of World War No. 2 and their families.

MATERNITY AID

In this first article, I would like to treat of a subject which has received far too little publicity: the Emergency Maternity and Infant Care Act, legislation provided by Congress.

Financed by Federal grants, free maternity care for wives of men in military service and free medical and nursing care for their babies are now provided through the Massachusetts State Department of Health, Dr. Florence L. McKay, director of the division of child hygiene, is in charge.

A total of $4,400,000 for this purpose was appropriated by Congress last spring and an additional $18,600,000 was voted by Congress on October 1, 1943. Of this amount, $530,388 has been allocated to date to Massachusetts. These allocations are made monthly.

The emergency maternity and infant care program, or E. M. I. C. plan, as it is called, provides for prenatal care for the wife of a serviceman by a qualified doctor of her own selection at her home or at the doctor's office. At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. In addition, the baby is entitled to receive free medical care during the first year of his life.

Next: Further discussion of maternity and infant care.

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS—MOTHERS TOLD HOW TO GET E. M. I. C. AID—WHEN THEY FIRST VISIT DOCTOR'S OFFICE SPECIAL UNITED STATES FORMS MUST BE FILLED OUT

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

(This is the second of a series of articles to appear in the Boston Traveler on veterans' benefits, by Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of the Third Massachusetts District.)

STUDY E. M. I. C. RULES

So that there be no question as to eligibility to participate in the E. M. I. C. program, wives of servicemen should acquaint themselves thoroughly with the rules made by Congress and the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor in Washington, which supervises State operation of this program. These regulations are procurable from the State department of health or from the Children's Bureau and they must be carefully followed in order to obtain this free care and service. When the wife visits her doctor the first time, she should ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this service. If the doctor does not have these blanks, write the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, 73 Tremont Street, Boston, asking that an application form be sent to you.

Fill out the application form carefully and be sure to include your husband's serial number. It is necessary for you to fill out part 1 of the form. Ask your doctor to fill out part 2 and then send it to Boston for approval. If your application is passed upon favorably, you will receive a letter from Dr. McKay within a few days to the effect that your physician and the hospital, in the event you decide to go to the hospital, have been notified that funds have been authorized for your case. Keep this letter since it will serve as a means of identification when you go to the hospital.

APPLY EARLY

It is important that wives apply for E. M. I. C. funds in early pregnancy. The State department of health will not approve payment of the doctor, hospital, or any service bill before the application is made. In case of emergency it is advisable that the doctor in the case make application for you within 48 hours after the service is rendered since no bills for hospital or medical service will be paid under the E. M. I. C. program if this is not done.

Wives can consult their regular family doctor for this aid. It is not necessary to go to a Government doctor.

Should you know of any wife of any serviceman who is in need of this care, be sure to impress upon her that it is necessary that she should see a doctor at once and make application. In too many instances wives of servicemen were refused E. M. I. C. funds, because no application was made beforehand, a very unfortunate and tragic occurrence, but this is required by the State.

CARE PROVIDED

The charges for this medical, hospital, and surgical assistance are paid through the division of child hygiene, Massachusetts Department of Public Health, directly to the hospital and the doctor and nurse. No money is given the wife.

A minimum stay of 10 days in the hospital after childbirth is arranged for the mother, if facilities permit. Hospital care may be authorized in any hospital, including Army and Navy hospitals, where maternity and pediatric services have been approved by the State department of health. Therefore, it is imperative that the prospective mother ascertain whether or not the local hospital has been approved by the State under the E. M. I. C. program.

Next: Employment opportunities for disabled veterans in the Government service.

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS—PROVIDE TRAINING FOR DISABLED VET

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

(This is the third of a series of articles to appear in the Boston Traveler on veterans' benefits, by Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of the Third Massachusetts District.)

Both Congress and the Federal agencies recognize that the reemployment of disabled veterans is not exclusively a post-war problem since disabled veterans are being returned every day from the fighting fronts all over the world.

I think practically all of us feel that preferences should and will be extended to veterans, whether disabled or not, by both public and private employers. As a matter of public conscience, over 11,000,000 of our young men and women cannot be taken from their normal pursuits and asked to make every kind of sacrifice and then be cast aside to shift for themselves, deprived of previous jobs and new opportunities after the war has been won.

FEDERAL PLEDGE

The Selective Training and Service Act specifies that persons who have left positions in the Federal service and have entered the armed forces shall be restored to the positions they left, or to like positions of seniority, status, and pay. This is the obligation of every appointing officer of any Federal agency and there is no question that this obligation will be carried out conscientiously and honestly.

The act specifies that the veteran who formerly worked for the Government has a right to return to his old position or to a position with similar seniority, status, and pay if he is still qualified to perform the duties of such position. This provision could be interpreted by some Federal officials that the Federal Government, as an employer, is under no obligation to a former employee who becomes disabled and who is unable to perform the duties of his former position.

NEW TRAINING

This means that in many instances disabled veterans will have to be trained to do things which they have never done before. Fortunately, this training will be provided by several agencies, for instance, the Veterans' Administration through its vocational rehabilitation program, which is already functioning here in Massachusetts, the Federal Security Agency, the Army, the Navy, and the War Manpower Commission. All these are by law required to see to it that the disabled veteran is given some type of special training to utilize his skills and background in the best possible manner so that the veteran may take up his peacetime way of living without serious disruption. Other enabling laws will doubtless simplify and coordinate these efforts.

For some time past, the Civil Service Commission has been working on the rehabilitation phase of the veteran's problem. Over 2,500 different positions in the Government embracing millions of job opportunities have been examined and surveyed to find out what jobs can be filled by handicapped persons. This survey has disclosed just what abilities and what faculties are needed in particular jobs. Already, civilian persons, who are handicapped, have been placed in many of these positions on the basis of war-service appointments, and there is no question that these people are making a magnificent contribution to our war effort. Since October 1942, more than 15,000 physically handicapped persons have been placed in the Federal Government as the result of this special rehabilitation activity of the Civil Service Commission.

REAL SERVICE

There is no question but what our disabled veterans will be able to take over these and many other positions in the Federal Government without interfering with the status of faithful and efficient regular employees.

Armed with factual information obtained by various surveys, the Commission will be in a position to render real service to all former Government employees who have been disabled as a result of their war service. The Government will work with the handicapped veteran in finding jobs which can be filled by persons with the abilities and faculties which he possesses, even though he may be regarded at the same time by the Veterans' Administration as a physically handicapped person. There is no question but that the handicapped veteran will be given preferential treatment once it has been demonstrated that as a result of special training he can do the job required.

WHAT OF OTHERS?

What of the disabled veteran who, prior to his entrance into the service, did not work for the Government? As an indication of official policy, I quote United States Civil Service Commissioner Arthur S. Flemming, in a recent talk before the Disabled American Veterans in New York City:

"They should be given preference in the filling of these positions.

"* * * we will present to appointing officers disabled veterans who have the faculties and abilities needed to perform particular jobs, irrespective of any other physical handicaps which they may have. Appointing officers who pass over veterans must now submit in writing their reasons for so doing."

Already the Commission has established in its Washington office an organizational unit charged with the responsibility of devoting all of its time to veterans' problems. In time each of the Commission's regional offices, including Boston, will have a similar staff.

It is evident that in pursuance of long established congressional policies, our administrative practices are being shaped to accord to returning veterans, especially the disabled, decisive preferences and widespread employment opportunities for training and placement.

Please direct your inquiries for further detailed information to the United States Civil Service Commission, the Veterans' Administration, both at the Federal Building, Boston, or to me at House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS — INSURANCE PAID ACCORDING TO AGE — BENEFICIARIES OF 6 MONTHS' WAGE SHOULD BE DESIGNATED AT ONCE

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

There is hardly a town in Massachusetts which has not felt the heavy burden of war through the loss of a native son on some distant battlefield. Sad to relate, more such sacrifices will follow. It is, therefore, appropriate that our people be informed as to just what dependents and next of kin are entitled to as a result of the loss of a son, a daughter, a husband, or a father. I hope and pray our people may be spared but if a casualty visits your family or your immediate neighborhood, you ought to know the rights of certain relatives. Basically, there are four money benefits as follows:

1. A 6-month gratuity payment: This payment is automatically paid to a wife of a deceased veteran; or if there is no wife, it is automatically paid to the surviving orphan child or children.

This 6-month gratuity is not automatically paid to parents or brothers or sisters. The man or woman in the service must designate beforehand that the parents or brothers or sisters receive the 6-months gratuity payment. As a result, it might be well to advise the unmarried soldier to obtain necessary forms from his commanding officer and designate his parents or brothers and sisters to receive this payment. If this is not done, the parents or brothers and sisters are not eligible for this payment.

DEPENDS ON RANK

The amount of the payment depends on the rank of the soldier. If the casualty is a private, it is $300. If he is a corporal, it is $396. If he is a sergeant, it is $468. The payment is six times the monthly base pay of the man or woman in the service. This payment is made in addition to insurance and is payable even if the soldier has no insurance.

2. Monthly insurance payments: This insurance is not paid in a lump sum. It is paid on a monthly basis, depending on the age of the beneficiary. The older the beneficiary, the higher the monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy a beneficiary under 30 years of age will receive $55.51 a month for 240 months. A beneficiary over 30 years of age will get a guaranteed 120 equal installments—and if they survive beyond 120 months, it is paid for life. The amount paid to the beneficiary over 30 depends on the actual age. Under the $10,000 policy, a 50-year-old beneficiary will receive $53.90 a month. Under the same policy, a 70-year-old beneficiary will receive $85.10 per month, and so on, according to tables set up based upon the age of the beneficiary.

PERIODIC CHECK

It is always a wise procedure for the parents and next of kin of veterans to check periodically with the men in the service concerning insurance policies to make sure they are in effect and in order. The serviceman can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brother, or sister, including those of half blood.

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS—PENSIONS, BACK PAY EXPLAINED—BE SURE TO DETERMINE IF WAGES HAVE BEEN COLLECTED UP TO DATE

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

Besides the 6-month gratuity payment and the monthly insurance payments, discussed in an earlier article in this series, benefits to veterans and their dependents include pensions and arrears in service-personnel pay.

A pension is paid automatically to a wife and children. All children under 18 are eligible and children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school at the time of death. If the child marries before 18 or 21, he or she is not eligible for this pension.

Parents who have been dependent upon the soldier can get a pension at the same time his wife and children are receiving a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are:

One parent, $45 a month. Two parents, $25 each. A widow under 50 gets $45. In addition, she receives $10 per month for the first child up to 10 years of age She also receives $15 per month for each child between 10 and 18 and this continues up to 21 years of age if the child is in school.

It is important to note that a widow, a child, or parent receives the insurance payments, if a policy has been taken out by the enlisted man, in addition to getting a pension. Both may be collected, the pension and the insurance. Accordingly, make sure that insurance is in effect and in order.

BACK PAY

Arrears of pay is a possibility sometimes overlooked.

When a casualty occurs, there is always a chance the veteran has back pay due to him. For instance, if the casualty occurs on the 27th day of the month, the veteran had 27 days' pay coming to him. If the casualty occurs on the 15th day of the month, 15 days' pay is due, and so on.

Also, when soldiers are at the front, there is always the possibility that they may have missed several pay days. All this back pay is paid directly to the next of kin. Inquiries should always be made about possible arrears of pay so it can be collected by those entitled to it.

To summarize, I advise that you make careful note of these four payments due the dependents of deceased service men or women:

1. Six-month gratuity payment.
2. Insurance.
3. A pension.
4. Arrears of pay.

In the event there should be any difficulty in getting these payments from the Government, it might be advisable to write me at Washington.

Next: An explanation of the Increased Veterans' Dependents Allowances Act.

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS — DEPENDENCY CLASS KEY TO PAYMENTS

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

AN EXPLANATION OF THE INCREASED VETERANS' DEPENDENTS ALLOWANCE ACT

Recently, Congress voted an increase in allowances to be paid to veterans' dependents. Since there is considerable confusion as to how these payments are made and who is eligible, this article may help clarify some of the problems of the dependents of veterans.

Broadly any dependent of a man or woman in the service, who is being paid $138 a month or less, is eligible to receive a dependent's allotment or allowance from the Government. This act applies only to men and women in the service whose base pay is $138 a month or less. Those servicemen who get more than $138 a month come under another system. The new act provides for a monthly allotment as follows:

Class A dependents: a wife, $50; a wife and child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife with one child, $72; a divorced wife with each additional child, $20. In case of alimony, a wife separated or divorced from a serviceman will receive no more than the amount fixed in a court order or decree. If the divorce or separation order does not call for alimony or separate maintenance, she will not receive any allotment.

Class B dependents, or where the dependency on the serviceman is less than 50 percent: A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers or sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37. It is important to make mention that Class B dependents are classified as such because they are only partially dependent upon the service men or women for support. In other words, if the dependents are dependent upon men or women in the service, 50 percent or less, they come under Class B. Only $37 is given in such cases and applicants have to prove that they are dependent upon the enlisted man or woman for support.

B-1 DEPENDENTS

Class B-1 dependents, or where the dependency on the serviceman is 50 percent or more: One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $50 plus $11 for each brother or sister; two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $79; two parents and each additional brother or sister, $68 plus $11 for each brother or sister; a brother or sister but no parents, $52; each additional brother or sister without parents, $11.

Here also it is necessary for the applicant to prove 50 percent or more dependency. If the proof given is not sufficient, the dependent automatically comes under class B and gets much less. Thus, the dividing line, above or below 50 percent dependency, has an important bearing as to the amount of the allotment.

Now that many of the married men in the community are being called for the services, it is important that they make application for allotment upon induction. The allotment payments are not retroactive and only begin the date the application is filed. As a result, if the enlisted man waits 1 month or 2 months, or even more, before filing his application, he automatically loses 1 or more months' allotment money. It is highly desirable that the serviceman file the day he is inducted so that his family can be promptly provided for.

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS—DEPENDENTS' AID OF SEVERAL KINDS—NOT ONLY WIFE, CHILDREN BUT PARENTS, BROTHERS, SISTERS MAY BE ELIGIBLE

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

The application for veterans' dependents' allowance is important, and there is need for giving the matter prompt attention.

This application is made on special forms, available at the induction center from the enlisted man's commanding officer. In filling out the form the enlisted man should be careful to spell all names correctly and give exact information as to marriage, dates of birth, etc. Many of the difficulties concerning allotments are due to carelessness in filling out the form.

In the event the enlisted man fails for some reason or other to make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. These forms may be obtained from the War or Navy Department or you may obtain an application by merely writing your Congressman or Senator, who will be pleased to forward one to you and assist in every possible way. The Army requires that its regular application form be filled out, while the Navy simply requires a letter giving the name of the applicant's wife and children, date of birth, and service address of the enlisted man.

If the serviceman does not wish to make application for class B or B-1 dependents, no other person can apply. These allotments are granted and continued only at the will of the man or woman in the service. They cannot be forced to make application. However, whenever an enlisted man fails to make such application and the dependents are reasonably sure that he will approve it, they may make the application themselves.

The permission of the enlisted man then will be obtained by the service; and if he gives permission, the allotment will be approved and payments started.

Thus, it can be seen that only class A dependents can obtain allotments without the consent of the serviceman. All other dependents require his approval.

OTHER RELATIVES

Parents and brothers or sisters of servicemen can receive an allotment even if the serviceman's wife and children are getting one. If the enlisted man also partially supported his parents and brothers or sisters prior to his entrance into the service, they are also eligible for an allotment. Application can be made in the usual manner and all that is necessary is proof of dependency, as though the enlisted man were single.

For example, if there is a wife and one child dependent upon the serviceman, they receive $80. If this same man has two parents and a sister, also dependent upon him, they can receive a total of $79 also. To get this extra $79, all that is necessary is an additional $5 deduction from the serviceman's pay. The Government makes up the difference. If the parents and brothers or sisters are only partially dependent—that is, less than 50 percent—if they can get $37.

In addition, if parents are dependent upon more than one son or daughter, who are both in the service, they are eligible for larger allotments. For example, if two parents are greatly dependent upon a son in the service, they receive $68 a month. Now if another son or daughter enters into the service, upon whom they depended also for support, these same two parents are eligible to receive another $37 from the second son or daughter.

Often your Congressman can help expedite allotment applications when there is real need for this money, so it is advisable that you write him when payments are slow in coming to you. Also, your Representative in Congress often can help clear up some of your difficulties. Do not hesitate to write to him.

Next: Emergency relief for servicemen and their dependents.

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS—RELIEF FUNDS FUNCTIONS TOLD—MEN THEMSELVES, AS WELL AS FAMILIES, OFTEN MAY RECEIVE TEMPORARY AID

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

Now that some of the married men of this community are being called into the service, there sometimes arise cases of extreme hardship involving dependents of servicemen. In some cases, even the men and women in the service have found themselves in destitute circumstances at one time or other. Many dependents, and even members of the armed forces themselves, are not fully acquainted with the two emergency agencies set up for the express purpose of helping such persons in need.

These two agencies have branches all over the country. They are the Army Emergency Relief Fund, whose functions have recently been assigned to the Red Cross, and the Navy Relief Society.

ARMY RELIEF FUND

Any member of the armed forces in the Army can appeal to the Army relief fund at the special offices set up in each Army camp in the United States and overseas or through the Red Cross, if he is not at camp, for needed immediate financial assistance, and he will receive courteous and willing assistance at all times. The fund is open to all dependents of men and women in the Army. Should anyone know of any destitute dependent at home or any destitute member of the Army, advise him to get in touch at once with the Army emergency relief fund direct or through the local Red Cross office.

Another agency is the Navy Relief Society. Any dependent of a man or woman in our naval forces can appeal to this agency for urgent financial assistance. Any member of our naval forces in destitute circumstances can appeal to this agency and his needs will be taken care of. Should you know of anyone in our naval forces in dire circumstances, advise him to take up his case with the Navy Relief Society. To get immediate action from the Navy Relief Society, it is advisable to take up the case through the local chapter of the American Red Cross. The Red Cross is in a position to expedite matters, but in the event that it is not possible for the dependents of the enlisted man in the United States Navy or the man himself, in destitute circumstances, to get in touch with the Red Cross, an appeal can be made to the Boston branch of the Navy Relief Society Auxiliary, Bank Building, Thompson Square, Charlestown, where prompt and courteous assistance will be given.

ONLY FOR SERVICEMEN

These two agencies were set up to take care of the urgent critical cases of men in service who are in need of immediate financial assistance. This service is available only to men actually in the armed forces and is not available to servicemen who have been discharged. Likewise, the service is available only to dependents of men in our armed forces, and not to dependents of a discharged soldier or sailor.

If urgent need actually exists, it should not take more than an hour or two to get financial help for anyone who is destitute. The Army and Navy Emergency Relief Funds reach out to every community in the country. This emergency help is available at all times, and our service men and women and their dependents should have no hesitation in making application for it when in real need.

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS—RED CROSS AIDS SERVICE FAMILIES—WILL HELP WHILE DEPENDENTS OF FIGHTERS AWAIT RECEIPT OF THEIR ALLOTMENTS

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

Another agency that gives aid to the dependents of servicemen is the Home Service of the American Red Cross and this is available through the chapter located in your town or the nearest community. The Home Service gives financial assistance to dependents of servicemen during the period from the time of filing of the soldier's or sailor's application for a family allotment and the receipt of such allotment. There is no specific sum granted for all cases. The amount will depend on the extent of the dependents' needs at the moment.

OTHER ASSISTANCE

The Red Cross will not supplement the dependents' allotment once the checks start coming from the Government, taking the position that the increased allowances are ample to take care of the immediate needs of the families of servicemen.

Other assistance available from the home service of the Red Cross is funds for transportation of wives stranded far away from their homes when their husbands leave for overseas assignments, or transportation home when their husbands are transferred to other camps. Medical care to the wives and children of servicemen is also available from the home service in the event there are no community facilities available to provide such care. This medical care is especially given to wives or families of servicemen living in the so-called camp communities whose hospital facilities are closed to them because they are transients.

The home service is also equipped to give financial assistance to dependents of servicemen for special and unusual needs, such as operations, and so forth, when such assistance is not available from community welfare services.

FOR DISCHARGED VET, TOO

There is also this special fact to note about the home service of the Red Cross, as compared to the assistance from the Army Emergency Relief Fund and the Navy Relief Society; this financial assistance is also available to the discharged veteran, especially the disabled, during the interval of the filing of his claim for veterans' compensation and the adjudication of his claim by the Veterans' Administration, a period extending anywhere from 3 to 8 months.

NEW ARRANGEMENT

In response to inquiries I have made concerning problems of veterans' dependents as a result of the closing of the Army Emergency Relief district offices in Massachusetts, A. E. R. headquarters in Washington advises "This new arrangement with the Red Cross was effected in order to prevent duplication of effort by the Red Cross and the Army Emergency Relief and further in the interest of a conservation of Army manpower now used in relief work. The Red Cross has given every assurance that it will care for the needs of servicemen and their depedents and the Army Emergency Relief stands ready to supplement that aid in any case where the Red Cross is unable, due to the provisions of its home-service policy, to handle a particular case."

Where supplemental aid, not given by the Red Cross, is needed, servicemen or their families should ask the local Red Cross to channel their request to northeastern headquarters, American Red Cross, 300 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y., where a liaison officer of the Army Emergency Relief is stationed, or write or wire me at Washington.

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS—DISABLED VETS GET GOVERNMENT CARE—PAYMENTS ARE FROM $10 TO $100 A MONTH; THOSE HANDICAPPED VOCATIONALLY TRAINED

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

Since the founding of the Republic, the United States has paid out more than $21,000,000,000 in direct benefits to veterans and their families, including those of World War No. 2. This is ample proof that a grateful Nation has ever been mindful of the sacrifices made by her sons and daughters in defense of our country. At the present time, the Government is caring for veterans of all wars and their dependents and at last count, the Veterans' Administration was caring in one way or another in substantial manner for more than a million persons.

One theory underlying all laws concerning disability resulting from service in the present war is that the Government is under a duty to do everything humanly possible to enable our disabled men to become once again useful and self-supporting members of the community. Disability must have occurred or have been aggravated in line of duty in order to warrant a pension or vocational training, but hospital treatment and domiciliary care in soldiers' homes may be given for disability not due to war service.

DISABILITY PAYMENTS

These disability payments run from $10 a month for a 10 percent disability to $100 a month for total disability. The current average rate of disability for World War No. 2 is 40 percent, which means payments of $40 a month. Sums as high as $250 a month may be paid for certain specific disabilities of an unusual or particularly burdensome character.

If the disability is characterized by a vocational handicap, the veteran is entitled to receive vocational rehabilitation or training from the Veterans' Administration for a period of 4 years, if he requires and demands it. All expenses of this training are paid, including books, tuition or other equipment. In addition, the veteran's pension is increased to $80 a month, if single, and $90 a month if married, with additional sums for other dependents this man has to support while in training. Application for this training should be made at the Veterans' Administration, Boston.

LIFE INSURANCE

Every serviceman may apply for what is known as national life insurance. This insurance is sold at a lower price than would be possible for a private insurance company because the Government assumes the entire cost of operation, as well as the cost of the extra war hazard. Beneficiaries of this insurance are limited to wife, children, parents, sisters, and/or brothers. The serviceman may apply for amounts running from $4,000 to $10,000 and within these limits may take out more than one policy if he so desires. He may designate beneficiaries of his own choice within the categories mentioned above.

The serviceman may apply for this insurance without examination during the first 120 days following his induction. After the first 120 days, he is given a physical examination when he applies. After 1 year, the serviceman may convert his insurance to standard forms such as 20-pay life, which in addition to protecting his family, will build up a solid asset for him when he returns to civilian life. The serviceman may continue his insurance after he has left the service by forwarding the required monthly payments to the Veterans' Administration at Washington. While in the service, the man has regular deductions made from his monthly pay. More than 13,000,000 policies have been applied for with a face value of about $92,000,000,000, a number larger than the total enlisted in all the armed services.

Next: Further means of emergency assistance.

FAMILIES GUARDED AGAINST EVICTION

(By PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Congressman, Third Massachusetts District)

There are other benefits arranged by the Federal Government for the war veterans, besides insurance and others which have been discussed in this series.

Other servicemen's benefits I might mention include protection against eviction of servicemen's dependents for nonpayment of rent under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act. Under this law, evictions for rentals not exceeding $80 a month may be made only on court order and may be stayed for 3 months by the court.

In addition, stays of judgments, attachments, garnishees, in the discretion of the courts, on actions against men during their service or within 90 days thereafter, may be granted. Further information concerning these legal protections is available at the local courthouse or soldiers' relief agent in your town.

The Seventy-eighth Congress during its first session has already enacted several sweeping and vital measures extending liberal benefits and rights to service men and women. Those include Public Law No. 10, providing hospitalization, domiciliary care, and burial benefits to World War No. 2 veterans on a parity with World War No. 1 veterans; Public Law No. 13, authorizing renewal of the expiring 5-year level premium term insurance policies by the agent or beneficiary of an insured serviceman who is outside the continental United States; Public Law No. 16, providing for the rehabilitation of disabled veterans, mentioned earlier in this article.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

Of very direct interest to all discharged veterans in certain categories is the so-called mustering-out pay bill, which provides for payments ranging from $100 to $300, depending on the length and character of service of the veteran. Now that this legislation has become law by virtually the unanimous vote of Congress, veterans eligible for mustering-out pay receive such payments as they are discharged from the service without making the special application required of the 1,300,000 or more veterans discharged prior to the enactment of this bill. Of this number, about 700,000 are believed eligible for mustering-out pay and I desire to make some brief observations for the benefit of these men and women which may help them to expedite their respective applications.

Discharged veterans, desiring to apply for mustering-out pay may obtain mimeographed application forms from the Finance Officer, United States Army, Chamber of Commerce Building, 80 Federal Street, Boston. These same forms may be used by Navy, Coast Guard, and marine veterans. In addition, local veterans' organizations may also have a supply of forms, and newspapers throughout the country have printed the official blank, which is readily procurable.

CERTIFICATE NEEDED

Let me emphasize here that the serviceman must return this application with his original service-discharge certificate. Under regulations, photostatic copies will not serve the purpose inasmuch as the original certificate itself must be marked with appropriate notations that the serviceman has applied for and has been granted mustering-out pay. This ruling was made in order to minimize duplicate or fraudulent claims and at the same time expedite payment to the veteran, inasmuch as centralized discharge records will not be consulted for some time following actual payment of these benefits. The applications of all discharged veterans who were inducted from this area must be returned to the Army Finance Officer at Boston and payment will be made from that office. Veterans should not become concerned if they receive their first check without their discharge certificate returned in the same envelope. The certificate will be sent in a day or two as an added protection against mail-box theft of the check. These safeguards were deemed necessary to prevent fraud and misrepresentation.

WRITE FOR OTHER DATA

It is exceedingly difficult to write at length and explain in full detail all benefits available to veterans of this and previous wars.

I have tried in these articles to sketch briefly and concisely the benefits and rights of veterans under existing legislation. Of necessity, it was impossible to recite in full detail in such limited time and space all the ramifications and technicalities of the relief provided by Congress.

I hope the information contained herein will, in the main, point the way of guidance and effective action by which veterans may move to avail themselves of current legislative measures in their behalf. If anyone has special questions or special problems, I suggest you write to me personally, 420 Old House Office Building, Washington 25, D. C.

This is the last of a series by Congressman PHILBIN. Possession of these articles may be of inestimable value as guidance if you need them later.

The Rights of Man in the Post-War World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address on the subject The Rights of Man in The Post-War World, delivered by the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr.

O'MAHONEY], before the Virginia State Chamber of Commerce, at Richmond, Va., on April 13 last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It would be difficult to find a spot in all the world more appropriate for a discussion of the principles which must guide us in reorganizing the post-war world than here in Virginia, for of all of the States in the Union none made a richer contribution than Virginia to the founding of the Nation. The leaders of this State in the formative period of the Republic had a clear understanding of the principles upon which free government must be built. The people of Virginia may still be proud of the fact that its public officials in both State and Federal office hold the respect and admiration of the country. Both Senator GLASS and Senator BYRD are known and respected everywhere for their loyalty to conviction.

Certainly, too, it would be impossible to find a day more appropriate than this for the discussion of any theme involving freedom of the individual, for this is the birthday of the author of the Declaration of Independence. The fame of Jefferson increases with the passing years. Nothing can dim the luster of his reputation as the philosopher of human rights.

"Nothing is unchangeable," said he, "but the inherent and inalienable rights of man." That was his faith, political and economic, from the day he penned the Declaration of Independence until that day in June 1826, half a century later when he wrote the last message that ever came from his hand.

I need not tell this gathering that the mayor of the city of Washington had invited Jefferson to attend the celebration that was planned for the Nations Capital on the fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration and that Jefferson, unable to leave Monticello, sent him this message in response:

"All eyes are opened, or opening, to the rights of man. The general spread of the light of science has already laid open to every view the palpable truth that the mass of mankind has not been born with saddles on their backs, nor a favored few, booted and spurred, ready to ride them legitimately by the grace of God."

With these final words there passed from the active scene the great Virginian who, in the Declaration of Independence, had asserted that governments are instituted among men to secure the inalienable rights they derive from their Creator and that the just powers of government come only from the consent of the governed. This principle of the relation of government to men is now enduring its most dangerous attack. The appalling conflict in which we are engaged was initiated by men whose views were at utter variance with those of Jefferson. The war was started for the purpose of making government supreme and of denying to men the right to control it.

We now know that this attempt to destroy the principles of free government has failed. We know that though military victory may be delayed and though we must still pay a terrible price, nothing can now prevent the forces of freedom from achieving it.

MILITARY VICTORY WILL VINDICATE JEFFERSON

When that victory comes it will be a vindication of the philosophy of Jefferson and the principles of political freedom which this Nation has always cherished. It has been the contribution of the people of America, the people in whom Jefferson had such profound faith, that has made this victory possible. Totally unprepared as we were at the outbreak of the war in Europe, our people have transformed this Nation from one which was devoted only to the pursuits of peace into the mightiest military power that ever existed. We have produced the implements without which Britain and Russia could not have withstood the totalitarian might of Germany. We have produced the food necessary to maintain not only our own military forces but to supplement the supplies of all our allies as well.

Agriculture and industry both have been organized by a free people in such a manner as to exceed the most efficient achievements of concentrated arbitrary state power. We entered this war with only part of a one-ocean Navy. Now we have a Navy capable of dominating two oceans, a Navy greater by far than that of which any dictator ever dreamed. We entered the war with only a handful of airplanes. Today we are driving Japanese planes from the sky and, in cooperation with our British allies, are slowly but certainly destroying the Luftwaffe on the ground and in the air.

In a single month our industrial machine is now producing three times as many airplanes as we were capable of manufacturing in an entire year before the war began. Our industrial organization is today outproducing both Germany and Japan in the manufacture of all types of combat material.

This is the achievement of a free people, an achievement which beggars all description, an achievement which will be remembered long after the annoyances we have endured and the sacrifices we have made will have been forgotten. It is an achievement which justifies the faith of Jefferson and all those other Americans from all 13 of the original colonies who built the American Republic upon the indestructible foundation of popular sovereignty.

But if we look back upon the legacy which was bequeathed to us and seek to peer into the future to discern the outlines of the new structure of freemen that is to arise, we must ask ourselves how it came about that 168 years after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the principles of human freedom came to be in such grave danger. Hitler and Mussolini warned us long before the war began of their intention to make the state the master of men instead of their servant. They told us in words of one syllable that democracy was outmoded and could not endure in the modern world. We heard them, but we did not believe them. We waved aside their declarations as the unimportant rantings of demagogs, but we know now that if it had not been for the heroic defense of Britain by the freedom-loving people of England and if it had not been for the extraordinary productive output of our own people, Hitler and Mussolini would have made their boasts good. It is incumbent upon us, therefore, in our plans for reorganizing the future to search out the causes of this great horror which might have turned out to be complete disaster for the rights of man.

STABLE LOCAL ECONOMY ESSENTIAL

The message I bring you is simple and I think altogether understandable—there can be no successful defense against the encroachments of central arbitrary power until first there is a stable local economy. It has been the loss of economic stability in local communities and subdivisions, in villages, cities, and States that has undermined political freedom and made possible the growth of the totalitarian state.

When Jefferson and his colleagues labored for the establishment of this Government, our economy was almost exclusively individual. Today it is an organized economy and is preponderantly national in scope. This change from the individual basis to the organized basis has taken place all over the world and we have not successfully adjusted ourselves to the alteration. It was the failure to make this adjustment, the failure of a central economy to provide sure and certain employment for all men that created the opportunity for the advocates of totalitarian central power to walk upon the scene.

Our success in reorganizing for the post-war world will be measured by the degree in which we succeed in stabilizing the opportunities of individuals and localities in a world in which the advance of science has made organizational activities necessary. This adjustment can be obtained without injury to any group or class, without the necessity of any class warfare, without the loss of individual freedom if only we open our eyes to certain plain and inescapable facts.

Forty years ago there were in the United States 30,000 more post offices than are in existence today. Good roads and high speed automobiles have destroyed the little post offices and built up the big ones. At the turn of the century we had over 72,000 fourth-class offices and only 194 post offices of the first class. Today we have only 27,000 fourth-class post offices while offices of the first class have increased in number from 194 to 1,444.

With the change of the instruments that we use in the modern world, there has been a complete change likewise in our manner of living. No one, of course, would want to go back to the days of the dominant fourth-class post office. No one would want to sacrifice the improvements and the comforts which have come with the increased number of first-class post offices, but unless we understand precisely what brought about this change in the geographical structure of the country we shall not understand how it happens that little business and local business is in such a precarious position from end to end of the country. Precisely the same influences which have been destroying the small post offices have been sapping the vitality of little business, of local business, of individual enterprise.

Let me give you another example. The United States Steel Corporation during the last week in March published in most of the great newspapers of the country an advertisement to show what it has accomplished in the war effort, how much it has produced, what it has received for its production, and how its receipts have been distributed. This record shows, for example, that of almost $2,000,000,000 which it received in 1943 from its customers (an increase of 22 percent over what it had received in 1941) almost $1,000,000,000 was paid to employees who received 45 percent more than they had received 2 years before.

THE "POPULATION" OF BIG BUSINESSES

The advertisement showed that the United States Steel Corporation in 1943 paid out $707,000,000 for the purchase from others of products and services. This was also an increase of 22 percent over payments for the same purposes in 1941.

Significant as these figures are, the United States Steel Corporation has given us even more significant information in the advertisement by reciting that it has more than 340,000 employees and 222,000 stockholders. Let us add these two figures together and we find that the "population," so to speak, of the United States Steel Corporation, without taking into account at all the families of employees and stockholders, is more than 562,000 persons. How many cities in Virginia, how many counties, have a population that great?

Let us suppose that each one of these employees and each one of these stockholders is a member of a family of three—that means a "population" of 1,686,000 persons. There are 18 States in the Federal Union each of which has fewer people than that.

Let me take another example. This is from an advertisement published by General Motors in all the leading newspapers of the country this week. Like the ad of the United States Steel Corporation, it tells a story of marvelous achievement, of efficient industrial management, of a great contribution to the war. But here again we have an amazing revelation of the gigantic size which has been attained by industrial organization. General Motors which manufactures not only 5 different models of automobiles, a popular truck, a desirable coach, the Fisher body, and the Frigidaire, but also a score of other highly essential and valuable products, tells us that in 1943 its average number of employees was 448,000. Its stockholders numbered approximately 421,000, a total "population" of individual employees and stockholders of 870,000. Multiplying by 3 we have a total industrial "population" of 2,600,000, again exceeding the number of inhabitants found by the United States Census in 1940 to be domiciled in each of 29 of the 48 States.

General Motors tells us with pardonable pride that in 1943 the physical volume of war materials which it produced was more than double that produced in 1942. It tells us that the value of this production amounted to $3,500,000,000, and that it paid for materials and services purchased from others approximately $1,900,000,000.

General Motors tops the list of all the organizations in the country to which the Government has awarded its war contracts. It and 99 others have received war contracts amounting in value since the beginning of the war effort to more than 70 percent of all the billions of dollars which the Federal Government has expended out of its deepening deficit—70 percent to 100 huge organizations, 30 percent to all the other thousands. Here, again, you have the same condition of little groups drying up and big groups growing bigger that I showed you at the outset in the story of the Nation's post offices.

HOW WHOLE COUNTRY IS AFFECTED

It is undoubtedly true that this country could not have made the marvelous record in the manufacture of war materials, of which we are so proud, without the highly efficient, well-organized activity of these giant industrial institutions. But it is only necessary to consider for a moment the magnitude of the purchases made by these units to realize that the prosperity of every community in the land is dependent upon what the managers of these organizations do and the decisions they make. When United States Steel, which last year bought $707,000,000 of products and services from others, or when General Motors, which last year bought almost $2,000,000,000 of such materials and services, reduces the amount of its orders, mines, and factories, farms and stores all over the country will experience a reduction of business. Communities and States from coast to coast are intimately affected by the decisions reached by the managers of these units and nothing that the people in those communities or in those States can do is likely to affect the result.

But the condition is even worse if instead of United States Steel or General Motors, we consider "General Government," the title which I give for the moment to the huge Central Government organization we have had to establish in Washington to wage totalitarian war against totalitarian dictators.

It has been necessary for the Federal Government to control production and allocate materials in order to organize the war effort, because we had to have the guns, the airplanes and the battleships with which to overmatch the aggressors of Europe and Asia. This was all done necessarily by increasing the national debt to unimagined proportions. The orders which have come from Washington from the Army and the Navy, the Maritime Commission, the Defense Plant Corporation and all the rest amounting in value to about $150,000,000,000, account for more than 50 percent of all the goods and services which are being produced in the United States. In other words, Uncle Sam is buying with deficit dollars more than one-half of all the things that are produced and all the services that are rendered in this country by the people of the country. When the peace comes and that purchasing stops, when Uncle Sam withdraws from the market, then indeed unless we are ready in advance, every community in the land will feel the effects. This is the picture of the effect of economic concentration upon the lives of people. This is the story of the effect of an organized economy upon an individual economy.

Here is the reflection in our country of the very conditions which in Europe and in Asia produced arbitrary central political power. Here is the illustration of the two conflicting principles which lie at the root of this war—individualism versus arbitrary central power. Fascism and communism both stem from central economic power. They came into existence because men did not know how to adjust the necessary huge organizations of the modern world to the needs of individuals and localities. Because men did not know how to make that adjustment, they began to struggle among themselves for control of the government upon which, in turn, they were ready to depend for the complete control of their economic lives. People divided into groups, workers or proprietors or farmers, and each sought to protect its own interest by seizing and holding the government and excluding the members of all other groups from that position of advantage.

MEANING OF THE AMERICAN WAY

If the American experiment in government means anything, if this American way of life of which we all speak so readily means anything, if the principles that Jefferson taught and Washington fought for mean anything, they mean that in America government is the instrument of all of us and not the instrument of any group or class. The American ideal of living is that both economically and politically we are all freemen and no part of us has any right or shall be permitted to regiment all the rest of us.

The problem of the modern world is the problem of the preservation of economic independence. Without economic independence, as the terrible events of the last 4 years have taught us so well, there can be no such thing as political liberty. One depends upon the other. The founding fathers were able to build a democracy in America because men were economically free. The very existence of democracy has been threatened all over the world because the growth of economic organization has been such as to unstabilize the economic basis of our society.

When, therefore, we look to the future, we must give our thought to the reestablishment upon a stable basis of the economy of the people in their local communities. This does not mean the destruction of big business at all. It does not mean the sacrifice of any of the great achievements, of any of the great efficiencies that big business has brought. It means, first of all, the protection of the local economy from arbitrary central power whether it is exercised by public or private authority.

A big country needs big business. Much of the enterprise which modern civilization demands cannot be carried on except by huge organization. The airplanes with which we are battering down Fortress Europa were possible of production only by huge organizations like General Motors. When the war is over we shall have to depend on the same organizations to build the planes which will carry the new commerce of the air across all continents and all oceans.

Just as when in the middle of the last century we spanned the continent with railroads, now that we expect to girdle the globe by air transport, we must expect to utilize huge accumulations of capital and large armies of workers under expert management. But we shall make a mistake if we imagine that we can turn the direction of the future over to the managers of these great units without Government supervision in the public interest. Government is just as essential as industrial organization. What is needed is not the elimination of industrial managerial authority or the elimination of Government supervisory authority, but the establishment of a rule of law under which the responsibility of all groups, public and private, to the whole people shall be recognized and maintained.

If big business is necessary, as we must recognize, to furnish the commodities and the services which the modern world demands, little business is no less necessary, for upon it depends the maintenance of the market which all business requires.

PURCHASING POWER OF PEOPLE ESSENTIAL

It is not necessary to tell any group of businessmen that there can be no prosperity unless the people have the means with which to purchase that which business handles. We have had a higher standard of living in the United States than ever was established anywhere in all the history of civilization, only because a larger proportion of the people here have been able to enjoy the output of all industry. The wise businessman first of all builds his markets, for unless he can sell his goods he has no interest either to produce them or to deal in them. Every chamber of commerce, therefore, which devotes attention to the problems of the post-war world must give heed to the creation of a stable purchasing power by the people throughout the Nation to take the place of Government purchasing when the war is over. That in turn means that one of the primary concerns of every chamber of commerce should be to help create new opportunity for employment in every community. Stable employment at good wages in every town, village, city, and State should be one of the primary objectives of local business everywhere, for only thus can a private economy be maintained.

We know that there is no other course to follow because we have tried the alternative courses, and each of them has failed. The private managers of our concentrated industrial economy were not able to prevent the collapse of 1929. Government managers by public spending did create subsistence jobs for the unemployed in the 10 years that followed, but a self-sustaining private economy was not established because concentrated public management is just as unable as concentrated private management to provide opportunity for all. Moreover, it must be perfectly obvious that deficit financing by the Federal Government in the post-war period offers no hope for the establishment of a stable economy.

Already the Government deficit is climbing toward $200,000,000,000, or almost $1,500 per capita for 135,000,000 people. The annual interest charge upon this deficit is more than $3,000,000,000, and this in turn is greater than the aggregate debt of all 48 States.

A PROGRAM FOR A DYNAMIC DEMOCRACY

The substitute for public spending is private spending. We know from the records of the banks and insurance companies, and from the reports of the United States Treasury Department that the people have been saving. They have the money, and it seems to me to be the plain conclusion of common sense that if we really want a private economy, if we really want an individual economy, if we really want men to be economically free as well as politically free, we have no recourse but to take those measures that are necessary to stimulate the investment of these savings in local private business, in new competitive industry, and then protect these investments against the destructive action of both private monopoly and arbitrary central-government power.

The tax laws can be revised in such a manner as to promote and encourage the investment of private capital, and thereby stimulate the substitution of private spending for Government deficit spending. New enterprises thus brought into existence by the investment of private capital can be protected from destruction by monopoly through laws which will more clearly define the powers, responsibilities, and duties of all economic organizations.

This new enterprise can also be protected from regimentation or restraint by government by laws which though recognizing the necessity for public supervision, shall deny to all administrative bureaus the power to be both judge and jury, manager and master of private business. It should not be difficult to draw the line between local business and national business. It should not be difficult by law to stake out the respective jurisdictions of the two, so that while escaping from central government domination we shall not be in danger of falling back into the control of private managerial power, which, through national and international cartels and combinations, can close the door of opportunity to little business and to the individual.

Finally, we should seek to revive our confidence in State and local authority. We should undertake to stimulate the local development of local resources, and to develop everywhere throughout the country a new community consciousness, a new pride in our local subdivisions. We have had altogether too great a tendency to look to either concentrated financial power in the hands of big business or concentrated political power in the hands of big government to provide the employment which our local communities have neglected to provide by their own initiative. We have permitted class consciousness and pressure groups to grow at the expense of the integrity of the communities in which we live, and thus the vitality of both the economic and the political systems has been drained away.

Democratic society is the most difficult of all societies to maintain, but it is the society which is natural to man, because man is free.

The theories of fascism and communism are defeatist theories. They have been conceived by men who do not believe that the individual is competent to direct the modern economy. It is because of their lack of faith in man that they erect the state as the source of all power and authority.

The people of America have already demonstrated by their tremendous accomplishments in this war that they are not defeatists. They still believe in the principles of individual freedom, and I have no hesitation to say that they are competent to direct a free economy under a free government.

The Republic which Jefferson and the colonial fathers founded will lead the world to the reestablishment of a free economy, just as it is now leading the world toward the redemption of free government.

One thing only is needful, faith in ourselves, faith in the heritage that is ours, faith in those inalienable rights which Jefferson taught us were given to man by the Creator of the universe.

Address by Senator Bilbo Before Mississippi Legislature

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THEODORE G. BILBO

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, on March 22, at the invitation of the joint session of the Mississippi Legislature, I delivered an address which has caused some slight disturbance in the minds of some, which I think is largely due to the fact that they do not know the contents of the speech, since only short reports of it have appeared in newspapers. I ask unanimous consent that the speech be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Your Excellencies, Governor Bailey, Governor Wright, Mr. Speaker, members of the Mississippi Legislature, and you ladies and gentlemen present and of the radio audience:

The gracious invitation of the Mississippi Legislature to come here today and to speak to you in joint session made me very happy indeed because returning to these familiar scenes and greeting my friends of many years give me the joy and happiness of the prodigal son returning to loved ones and the old homestead.

For 16 years on these grounds and in this building I dreamed, planned, and labored, giving the best efforts of my life to make Mississippi a greater State and her people happier, more contented and more prosperous. How well I realized those ambitions of earlier days you are in position to know. You will pardon me, I am sure, for a brief mention of some of the fruits of my dreams and efforts.

A few minutes ago, as I rode up Capitol Street, so beautiful and prosperous looking that it would do credit to any city in America, I could not help but visualize the dilapidated old Capitol Building, home of bats and owls when I first became Governor in 1916, which now stands restored, rejuvenated, useful, and beautiful with all the historic and thrilling memories of our State's great and glorious past history, an architectural structure of beauty and joy forever.

I am happy to see the faces of several of my colleagues who helped in this great restoration still members of the Mississippi Legislature. I am also happy to note the presence of one of my dearest friends on earth, Senator H. K. Rouse, of Poplarville, Miss., the only member of this legislature who was a member of the last legislature that convened in the old capitol, and who, by the way, after the roll call defeating the bill to erect this new Capitol Building in which we meet today, changed his vote making it possible for Mississippi to have one of the most beautiful capitol buildings in America. By the way, Senator Rouse is a first cousin of mine; otherwise he would not have changed his vote.

The tubercular sanatorium, one of the Nation's best and largest tubercular institutions, has sent its tens of thousands back home well and happy, with a new lease on life, being saved from the ravages of the great "white plague," and it will save hundreds of thousands more in the days to come.

The feeble-minded colony at Ellisville, where the unfortunate feeble-minded are being trained and taught, and many returned to their homes able to make their own living in life.

The great industrial training school at Columbia has snatched, as "brands from the burning," hundreds of our neglected and wayward boys and girls, converting them into useful members of society. And tens of thousands will yet be saved at this great institution.

Tens of thousands of the poor and indigent have been restored to health and life at the South Mississippi Charity Hospital at Laurel.

The tax commission revolutionizing the revenue system of the State, equitably distributing the burden of taxation without which the State's fiscal system could not have been saved.

The highway department that has dug Mississippians out of the dust and mud and has given us one of the best highway systems of any State in the Union.

The completion of the Mississippi State Hospital that is unexcelled by any State in the Union.

The enlargement and expansion of buildings and facilities for the University of Mississippi and other higher educational institutions, the wisdom of which has been vindicated by the enlarged enrollments and higher standards of educational attainments for our Mississippi boys and girls.

I secured passage of necessary legislation to make Mississippi one of the greatest cattle-raising States in the Union.

In addition to these great institutions and remedial and progressive laws and measures, I sponsored and urged the adoption of many others; but, though delayed in the fulfillment of my dreams, I thank God that I have lived to see most of them come true. Governor Conner saved the financial structure of the State by the passage of the sales tax, for which I plead for 4 years as Governor. Governor White's administration made my dream of a State-wide system of connected hard-surfaced highways come true. And with all my pleading and working for years, it was left to Governor Johnson—and may God bless his memory—and his administration to give free schoolbooks to all the children of Mississippi.

I want to apologize to the legislature for the delay in responding to the great honor and consideration that you have shown me in inviting me to speak to a joint session. While my many duties at the Nation's Capital demanded my presence and attention, yet I want to be frank with you and tell you that while I was anxious to come I did not want to come until you had practically finished the work of this session of the Legislature, because I did not want anyone to say that I came to Mississippi to try to tell the Legislature what to do and what not to do. When I supported Governor Bailey I did so believing that he was amply able to perform the functions of a governor in advising the Legislature as to the status of the commonwealth and in making the proper recommendations of laws and measures for the welfare of the people. And you must remember that I was Governor of this State for 8 years, and well do I remember how many times I made my own recommendations to the Legislature, all in vain. I think I know when I get enough of anything.

Naturally, I have watched with a keen and sympathetic interest the progress of the program recommended by Governor Bailey and the enactment of same by the Legislature, and I want to congratulate Governor Bailey, Governor Wright, Speaker Sillers, and the members of the Legislature on the very splendid program that you have put over. You have more than justified the hope and confidence of your constituency. No doubt some mistakes have been made, both in commission and omission, but such is common to all administrations, even to the best of them, but on the whole you and the people of Mississippi are to be congratulated sincerely upon the progressive and harmonious session that will now close in a few days.

Fellow Mississippians, as your servant, agent, representative, spokesman, advocate, and ambassador in the United States Senate, the upper branch of the greatest lawmaking body of the world, assembled in the busiest and most important spot on earth, Washington, D. C., the Capital of the wealthiest, most powerful, and influential nation of the world, I come today to make a brief report of the momentous and history-making events and happenings about which every Mississippian is keenly interested because what we, as a nation with such great power in wealth, resources, ingenuity, productive power, and manpower, do in this world crisis will directly affect every human being in Mississippi and our children yet unborn.

It is within our power to shape the destiny of the peoples of the earth for hundreds of years to come. Our opportunity and responsibility in this hour are far beyond mere words to describe.

In the few minutes that I will be permitted to speak to you hundreds of subjects come crowding into my mind that I would be happy to discuss on this occasion. I know how keenly interested you are in many of the laws and policies and problems that the Congress has had and is having under consideration. I would like to discuss with you the all-absorbing question of taxation which becomes more important day by day as the war-tax burden piles up by the hundreds of billions.

Every farmer is interested in the question of subsidies, adequate labor, price fixing, and the adequate supply of fertilizers and implements with which to farm. The small businessman is anxious to know whether he is going to be permitted to do business or whether he is going to be wiped out under the present monopolistic trend. Every businessman is anxious to know whether he is going to succeed or be forced into bankruptcy by the regulations and price fixings of the O. P. A. The traveling man is interested, yea, he has almost been driven mad on the question of gasoline and tires and automobiles. The laboring man wants to know if his wages will keep pace with the rising price of food and clothing.

Hundreds of thousands are still losing sleep over the question of whether they will be called upon to leave their wives and children for the armed service. Everyone is interested in what we propose to do for our brave and gallant soldiers, many of them maimed and crippled for life, as they return from the battlefields all over the world.

All of these and more as equally important questions come crowding into my mind today as I speak to you and the people of Mississippi, for whom I am accountable by virtue of your good will and suffrage—selected as one of your Senators to represent you in all these things in this the darkest period of our country and of the whole world. I will at another time be ready to answer and discuss freely with my masters—the people of Mississippi—all these problems which are my responsibility in part to solve.

Governor Bailey, when you go back to Meridian, please tell my friend "Jake" that he is a false prophet when he says that BILBO will not be a candidate for reelection year after next, 1946; and at that time I will be ready to answer for every vote I have cast and every position I have taken in the deliberations and consummation of the solution of these problems that so vitally affect the people of Mississippi.

Tell him that if any ill-informed dreamer plans to try to take my job away from me because he has heard it whispered that I am not physically well, he will be promptly disillusioned by finding that I am still growing stronger in mind and body as the days go by; in fact, I do not expect to be in my prime until I am 75 years old.

There is one question above all other questions which I am sure is engaging your thoughts, your hopes, and your prayers, and that is the progress and successful conclusion of this global war. While a mere Senator, like a civilian, is not permitted to know the plans of operation and strategy that the Commander in Chief and the Army and Navy are using for the success of the war, yet I do not hesitate to give expression to my views and convictions about the seriousness, the price we must pay, and the time of the victorious termination of this the greatest war of all the ages.

About 28 months ago, we were plunged into this world conflict by the cowardly attack of the Japs at Pearl Harbor, on the 7th of December 1941, a day that will live forever in the memory of man as a day of infamy.

In 1934, when I first ran for the Senate, I announced in the thirteenth plank of my platform that, if elected to the Senate, I would fight for and vote for the biggest and strongest Army, Navy, and Air Force of any nation on earth. If this Nation had done this—President Roosevelt would have done it if he had not been stopped by the Republicans and pacifists—we would have never been attacked and forced into this war. Preparedness is our surest guaranty against war.

It took a war to do it, but I have lived to see that plank of my platform come true, because, with these 28 months of preparation and before the close of this year, we will have a Navy stronger than all the other navies of the world combined. Already we have the strongest Air Force of any nation on earth. Already we have a merchant fleet larger than the combined fleets of our allies, and by July 1 we will have under arms and in training 11,300,000 soldiers, sailors, marines, and men of the Air Force.

We have produced in this short period, through the cooperation of both capital and labor, 150,000 fighting airplanes; 28,000 of these have been turned over to our allies for cash and under the provisions of the lend-lease law. We have over 2,000,000 men in our air service. In addition to our great airplane production, we have turned out unlimited supplies of tanks, antiaircraft guns, cannons, other large instruments of death and destruction, trucks, jeeps, bombs, and small arms by the millions.

With these gigantic preparations we are just now getting ready to fight this war. Up to this date there has been comparatively little fighting done. In fact, there are more than twice as many people in peacetime killed every year in automobiles and other accidents in the United States than we have had soldiers killed for the 2 years and 4 months. We are not really in this war yet. The real battles are yet to come.

Let no one be fooled about what we are now facing. Churchill was right when he said that victory would come only through "blood, sweat, and tears." With my limited knowledge of the task before us, it is my honest opinion that this war will yet last from 3 to 5 years and maybe longer. I pray God that I am wrong, but as I see it nothing but an internal upheaval or revolution at home in the Axis countries, Germany and Japan, will shorten this war.

General Eisenhower, it is said, insisted that we could whip Germany in the year 1944, but since the armies of England and the United States have been stalemated for 6 months in a deadly conflict with a few crack German divisions in Italy as we have attempted to take the city of Rome, many prophets have revised their opinions as to the length and seriousness of the war.

It is true that Russia with unlimited manpower and with several billions of supplies and ammunition and implements of war furnished her by the United States and England has been able to crack the German lines and has practically driven the Germans out of Russia; yet we must not forget that Germany still has between seven and eight million well-trained and equipped soldiers that we must overcome before the German war machine has been destroyed and the Germans unconditionally surrender.

The eyes of the whole world are focused on the impending invasion of western Europe, but do not forget that Hitler, with millions of enslaved laborers from the occupied countries of Europe, has been working day and night for more than 2 years in erecting the most elaborate and near-impregnable lines of defense all the way from the shores of the English Channel to the German fatherland.

In fact, we are yet to meet on the battlefield Hitler's best trained divisions, and he has over 400 of them. Most of the divisions on the Russian front were second-rate soldiers, largely made up from the satellite countries which at the point of a bayonet Hitler had forced into this war as his allies.

He has planted from the English Channel to the German borderland every known contraption of death and destruction. He has from the first held back in reserve his best trained soldiers, his largest guns, his best planes and fortresses and trained crews, getting ready for the real battle of this war.

Let us not be misled. Hitler has adequate supplies in both food and ammunition to contest every inch of ground from the shores of the English Channel to the German homeland. Millions of lives are yet to be sacrificed in this one great European battle, and before we shall have attained victory over the German war machine, every stream from France to Germany will flow on to the sea crimson with the commingled blood of the American, English, French, and German soldiers.

With the defeat of Germany that could take place this year or next year, we will have just commenced the war with the Japanese Empire, with her population of over one hundred million and with an army of twelve to fifteen million soldiers thoroughly equipped and thoroughly trained, fighting with a fanatical zeal, that prefer death or suicide to capture.

The Japanese have had universal military training since 1875, and this means 2 years of hard and thorough training to every able-bodied male inhabitant of this great empire. Tens of thousands of their women are equally well trained.

I have no doubt about the ultimate defeat of the Japanese by the American and English soldiers, because with the few small battles that have been fought on the fringes of the Japanese Empire it has been proven that our soldiers are more than an equal to the vicious, cunning, fanatical Japs. But the delay in consummating this certain defeat of the Japs will be due to the great distances that we must traverse with our ammunition, guns, supplies, and men before we can really get to the Japanese in all parts of their sprawling Empire from the ice-bound stretches of the Japanese Island to the palm-covered atolls of the South Sea Islands.

There is one ray of hope in this dark picture and that is that Admiral Nimitz, that good old Texas boy who is making it so hot for the Japanese in the South Pacific, will open a highway on the broad expanses of the Pacific to the shores of China where we can land our men and supplies and there train, equip, and supply the 50,000,000 potential Chinese soldiers to help us in the final campaign to crush Tojo with all of his cruel, fanatical, atrocious and inhuman, semigorilla, damnable men of war.

But my countrymen, I did not come here today to paint this dark and bloody picture of the future to discourage or break down the morale of my people and destroy their faith in ultimate victory. I wanted you to know the truth as I see it. But with all these forces of 20 or 25 million well-trained enemy soldiers thousands of miles away from our own bases of operation, we will, we shall, we must win in the end because God and right are on our side. The fate of all humanity is hanging in the balance. Under the leadership of the great minds of strategy of both military and psychological warfare possessed by Chiang Kai-shek, Joe Stalin, Winston Churchill and our own matchless, incomparable, world leader, commander in chief and President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, we shall win!

Permit me to digress long enough to tell you that it is a foregone conclusion that the Democratic convention in Chicago in July will nominate Franklin D. Roosevelt for a fourth term as President. And I hope that in these hectic, troublesome days with all the tantalizing regulations incident to prosecuting this world war that no good Democrat in Mississippi will be led astray because of his dissatisfaction of disturbing factors and sacrifices on the home front.

There are many things in the administration that are being said and done that are displeasing to all of us. Let us clean up our own household from within instead of getting on the outside and throwing bricks at the house of our fathers. The United States and the world need Roosevelt to finish the prosecution of this war and to bring victory to our armed forces. He has made a "jam-up" job of it and we are going to need him not only to win the victory but we will need him more in securing a perpetual peace to follow.

Let no good Democrat vote against Franklin Roosevelt because he dislikes some of his associates. The interest of Mississippi and the South will be best conserved by the continuation of a Democratic administration. With Roosevelt, now a world leader, we can win. You may think that conditions are bad now, but if you turned this Government in the midst of this war over to a Republican outfit, you would soon find out that we would be in a "helluva" fix. Paraphrasing Shakespeare, "It is better we suffer the ills of the present than to flee to those we know not of."

Yes, victory will be ours. We are confident of that fact even though the road may be long and bloody, costing hundreds of billions. And today, while our first goal is to win the war at the earliest possible moment, we must not lose sight of the necessity of winning the peace that will follow. We have already made progress in that field. The Moscow Conference last October paved the way for the meeting of President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Churchill, and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek at Cairo, and then a meeting of Roosevelt and Churchill with Marshal Stalin at Teheran.

We all know the far-reaching importance of those meetings in which plans were made for the military victory and for the winning of a lasting peace. We have charted our course and we have pledged our Nation to a policy of international cooperation after the war. Never again shall we make the tragic mistakes of 1918. When peace is again ours, we shall do all that is humanly possible, cooperating with Britain, Russia, China, and the freedom-loving peoples of Europe and Asia and Africa and the Americas, to maintain and to preserve that peace. And we are agreed, in the words of our Commander in Chief, President Roosevelt, "that if force is necessary to keep international peace, international force will be applied—for as long as it may be necessary."

We must do all in our power to win a just and lasting peace for that is the only way we can justify all the sacrifices and blood of this war. These sacrifices are being daily made by our Nation's men and women both in the service and on the home front. In this all-out war, the people of Mississippi are fully playing their part. Our Mississippi boys and girls have gone forth to serve beneath Old Glory, our men and women have answered the call to the war plants and the production centers, our farmers and their families are heroically carrying on to produce the farm products so essential to the war effort. No hardship should be too great for those of us left at home to bear for we are ever mindful of the sacrifices of our boys who are so gallantly meeting the enemy on the battlefields of the world. To them—the finest flowers of American manhood and womanhood—we owe a debt that we can never fully pay.

Today we lift our hearts in prayer to the merciful God above that He will give His divine protection to our fighting men the world over; that He will give them the strength and the power to win the victory; and when the final battle is over, that He will bring them safely home to the loved ones who prayerfully and patiently wait.

In addition to putting forth a total effort to hasten the winning of the war, 1944 presents another challenge to the American people; that is, the preservation of our dual system of constitutional government. We all realize and understand that in time of war, our Federal Government must exercise extraordinary powers and we are in full accord with the belief that our Federal Government should do everything that is necessary to protect the life of this Nation and to win the war in which we are engaged. However, our democracy must not be destroyed in the name of war.

If our ships, our airplanes, our tanks are destroyed, we will replace them; if our factories are torn down, we will rebuild them; if our cities, our highways, our bridges are destroyed, our engineers will restore them; if our inventions are lost, our scientists will discover new ones; if even our armed might should be crushed, we will rear sons who will regain our power. But if our democracy itself should be destroyed, then all is lost; and even though we might have gained the whole world we will have lost our soul. Therefore, I would admonish the American people in these dark and perilous days ever to be on guard, to protect and to preserve with zealous care the American system of constitutional government.

It is not my purpose here today to tell you of all the possible threats to our dual system of constitutional government. You are fully aware of conditions as they exist in this Nation, and you know as well as I do the dangers that would befall us should we be governed by a bureaucratic government on the banks of the Potomac. It is not my purpose to warn you that there is a tendency on the part of the Federal Government to usurp the rights of the sovereign States. Being States' rights Democrats, you are already aware of Washington's growing power, you know that the destruction of the rights of the 48 States and the wiping out of States' lines would open the flood gates and prepare the way for the ultimate destruction of freedom, made safe by our dual system of Government.

And I believe that you, just as I, have implicit faith in the American people and are confident that the people of this Nation will face openly and squarely any threat which may come to our democracy and that our dual system of constitutional government—established by the founding fathers and paid for in American blood—will be preserved. However, there is one bill now pending before the United States Senate directly affecting States' rights which I want to discuss briefly with you. That bill, known as H. R. 7, is the so-called anti-poll-tax bill and I want to bring this bill with all its implications before you, together with a full discussion of the great race problem which we are now forced to openly consider.

The anti-poll-tax bill, which would make unlawful by Federal statute, the requirement for the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite to voting in a primary or other election for national officers, is clearly unconstitutional. Section 2, article 1 of the Federal Constitution provides as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

Amendment 17 to the Federal Constitution makes like provision regarding the electors for United States Senators. Thus, by these constitutional provisions qualified electors for Congressmen and Senators are those electors in each State who are qualified, in accordance with State law, to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Nothing is more clearly shown by the debates in the Constitutional Convention than the intention of the founding fathers that each State should have the power to fix the qualifications of the electors within its borders. The power to fix such qualifications was one which the States zealously guarded. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution, most States required that qualified electors be property owners, and it was some years later that poll tax laws became popular as a means of extending, not limiting, the franchise.

Nowhere in the Constitution is Congress given the power to strike down or add to the qualifications for electors as set up by the sovereign States nor is the Congress given the power to define the qualifications or prerequisites for electors. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court are unanimous in holding that the poll tax laws are constitutional and nondiscriminatory. The tax applies equally to whites and Negroes and the proceeds are generally used for educational purposes.

Regardless of what any of us may think of the poll tax as such and regardless of whether or not we are in favor of its abolition by our State—just here let me say that for the holding of our white party primaries I have long contended that the poll tax should be abolished—nevertheless, the Congress has no power under the Federal Constitution to pass this bill outlawing the tax. Such a law would be an unconstitutional, unwarranted interference with the rights of the sovereign States and would destroy our dual system of constitutional government.

Section 241 of the Mississippi Constitution provides that a qualified elector must have lived in the State 2 years and the election district of his county 1 year next preceding the ensuing election; Section 243 provides for the payment of the poll tax; Section 244 provides for the educational test. Now, if the Congress succeeds in abolishing the poll tax, then the precedent will be set for the abolition by the Congress of any or all of our franchise laws and our ballots in Mississippi, and in all the other 47 States, will be at the mercy of the Federal Government. Constitutional government, as we have known it for over 150 years, would then no longer exist and the rights of the sovereign States would be destroyed.

In the face of these facts, you may rightly ask: Who are the advocates of this infamous unconstitutional bill? Why are the forces behind this piece of legislation so strong that we will have to resort to a filibuster to bring about its defeat in the Senate? You will recall that during the last Congress a similar bill was killed by a filibuster during the closing days of the session, in which I spoke 4 days, but the bill was revived and passed by the House of Representatives last May 25. It is now on the Senate Calendar and may be brought up for consideration at any time.

There are various individuals and organizations sponsoring this bill, but the main pressure groups behind it are Negro organizations. They are able to wield this power because the Negro vote in some nine northern States constitutes something of a balance-of-power between the white Democratic and Republican Parties. And these groups are determined to make an all-out effort to secure passage of this anti-poll-tax bill because the enactment of this piece of legislation is one of the steps—the entering wedge—toward the fulfillment of the "full equality" program which the Negro leaders have launched in this time of war. While I am prepared to speak and filibuster this damnable bill for 8 months to kill it, yet I warn you that if our colleagues in the Senate ever succeed in invoking the cloture rule, which stops debate, the bill will pass.

Thus, the poll tax bill brings the entire race question before the American people. Because of this implication and because of conditions existing in Washington, of which city I am now mayor ex-officio by virtue of the chairmanship of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, I wish to discuss with you this grave race problem fully and frankly. In the interest of our Nation, our Southland and our own State of Mississippi, I shall be forced to make startling revelations to you. Such action I have decided is absolutely necessary at this time.

The race question is certainly not a new one and first, I would like for us to look briefly at the historical background of this problem. As Aristotle once said, "Of all these things the judge is time". Thus, let us look back into the centuries and find what has been written on the pages of history concerning the races.

No one disputes the greatness of the civilization that once belonged to the Empire of Egypt. The mighty pyramids are the most conspicuous evidence of Egyptian greatness, for in the ability of the engineers in planning, and he power of the Pharaohs in perfecting their ideals, we see the Caucasian civilizers of Egypt at the height of their power. We are amazed at the progress of the Egyptian Empire, and we are struck with awe at how the Empire flourished as long as its people remained white. But that great Empire fell from within and we have seen 3,000 years of decay of Egyptian civilization. The period of greatness was over when the day arrived that a mulatto negro sat on the throne of Egypt and ruled a negroid people.

Maspero's History of Egypt says:

"The large number of black women found in the harems of the rich, and even in the huts of the common people, quickly impaired the purity of the race, even among the upper classes of the nation, and the type began to resemble that of the Negro tribes of Equatorial Africa. The language fared no better in the face of this invasion and the written characters soon became as corrupt as the language. The taste for art decayed; technical ability began to deteriorate. The moral and intellectual standards declined and the mass of the people showed signs of relapsing into barbarism."

Now, let us look at the history of India for a moment. There we find another great civilization that perished through contact with the colored races. The white Aryan came into India to find a decayed civilization which was in its last stages and to find the Caucasian which had come earlier and produced that civilization submerged in the black mass about him. The Aryan perpetuated civilization in India and attempted to keep his race pure by the caste system and by laws forbidding interracial marriage. The Aryan conquerors of India tried every remedial measure but one to keep their blood white. They tried everything except a geographical and physical separation of the races, but all their attempts failed and the result is written in one word—amalgamation.

And this is the reason I am urging the voluntary resettlement of America's 12,800,000 Negroes in their fatherland, West Africa. Three and one-half million Negroes have petitioned me to push this legislation, for they are ready to go. When this war is over and the over 2,000,000 Negro soldiers, whose minds have been filled and poisoned with political and social equality stuff, return and hell breaks out all over this country, I think I'll get more help in settling the Negroes in Africa.

We find also in the pages of history the stories of civilizations which have existed in China, Mexico, and Peru, and which have perished through contact with colored races. And even today, right before our own eyes, we see the civilization of South Africa and of Latin America greatly imperiled by such contact. We have only to look about us and to read what time has recorded about race relations to realize that there are only two permanent solutions to the race problem—separation or amalgamation. If the first—a physical separation of the races—is not chosen, then the results will inevitably be the latter—amalgamation, a mixing of the blood and the destruction of both races.

Just as the race problem is not new in world history, neither is it new in the United States. Of course, during the days of slavery, the relations between the white race and the Negro race were definitely fixed, but with the freeing of the slaves, immediately the question of the status of the newly freed Negroes became a national issue.

The man who is credited with the freeing of the slaves, Abraham Lincoln, fully realized the seriousness of the race problem and he further realized that physical separation of the two races was the only solution which would assure the future of this great Republic. In the Emancipation Proclamation—that immortal document penned by President Lincoln—he said:

"I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy thereof, do hereby proclaim and declare that * * * it is my purpose upon the meeting of Congress to again recommend * * * the immediate or gradual abolishment of slavery * * * and that the effort to colonize persons of African descent, with their consent, upon the continent or elsewhere, with the previously obtained consent of the government existing there, will be continued."

In one single breath, President Lincoln proclaimed freedom for the slaves and at the same time proclaimed that the effort to colonize them, which had been started in the days of slavery, would be continued. Lincoln was opposed to social or political equality of the two races as is shown by the following statement made by him in a speech at Charleston, Ill., on September 18, 1858:

"I will say that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races; that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of Negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality, and, inasmuch as they cannot so live, while they do remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior; and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."

In his second annual message to Congress, submitted in December 1862, President Lincoln again emphasized the fact that colonization would forever settle the Negro problem, and he then proposed an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for such a program. But having brought the war to a successful close, Lincoln was assassinated and the future of this Nation was destined to fall into far less capable hands.

Lincoln's plans for reconstruction were quickly discarded, and the Congress became dominated with Negro-loving politicians. The efforts of reconstruction politicians migrating from the North into every nook and corner of the South paralyzed the activities of the American Colonization Society, and the carpetbagger of those days impregnated the Negro brain with the idea that he should abandon the effort of establishing a Negro nation in a foreign land and become reconciled to his manifest destiny, which was to take over the lands and properties of his former slave owners, and also to make ready to seize the reins of government.

During the era of reconstruction, the unscrupulous political leaders of the Congress succeeded in securing the adoption of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution. It mattered not to them that they had to place the South under military rule and force the acceptance of these amendments upon the Southern States. Their madness to deracialize suffrage knew no bounds, and the methods to which they resorted caused the Secretary of State, Mr. William H. Seward, to question the validity of the fourteenth amendment.

While the Congress was attempting to secure passage of these amendments, what was happening in the Southland where the grass was not yet green over the graves of the heroic dead? Ten of the late slave States were seized and placed under military control; their legislators expelled and new legislatures set up which gave State suffrage to Negroes. Under military rule, many Negroes were installed in these new legislatures, forming almost the whole body of them, and the South lay prostrate in defeat and humiliation.

The history of reconstruction days in Mississippi holds for us tragic significance. Our State, which gave to the Confederacy President Jefferson Davis, paid for the Civil War with the blood, tears, and suffering of our people. But any school child can tell you that the blackest pages of Mississippi history were not being written when Vicksburg fell to the Federal soldiers nor in any of the other battles when the soldiers of the gray and the blue met in deadly combat. Those dark pages came after the last cannon had been fired, and the proud people of the Magnolia State lay helpless at the mercy of the carpetbaggers and scalawags who took over the reins of government.

Those were the days when Mississippi was represented in the Chamber of the United States Senate by a Negro, Blanche K. Bruce, an ex-slave whose term was from 1875 to 1881. Those were the days when the Negro Revels, the first Negro ever to sit in Congress, represented Mississippi in the House of Representatives during the Forty-first Congress. The Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses also found Mississippi represented by an ex-Negro slave. It was during this period that Mississippi had a Negro lieutenant governor, a Negro State superintendent of education, and when there were numerous Negro sheriffs and county officials, as well as Negro members of the State legislature.

With such conditions existing throughout the Southland, the people began their struggle to restore white supremacy. This was done in Mississippi finally, as you know, by the constitution of 1890. And as white supremacy was restored in the South, the relations between the races began to take on a definite fixed pattern. With some 4,000,000 ignorant, freed slaves in their midst, the southern people put into operation the policy of segregation of the races.

With separate facilities and separate accommodations for the white people and for the Negroes, the color line was drawn in every walk of life below Mason and Dixon's line. Accepted by the members of both races just as they accepted the air they breathed, the policy of segregation has remained in the Southland, and the attacks which, down through the years, have been made on it from the outside have met with complete failure. However, it has become necessary for us to consider and to openly discuss the forces which are today attempting to destroy the color line.

The so-called leaders of the Negro race have deliberately chosen this time of war to launch their program of full equality of the races in this country. The March-on-Washington movement, a Negro group headed by A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, carried their demands to the White House in June 1941. Thousands of Negroes threatened to march in mass upon Washington in what they termed "protest of discrimination in Government employment and in the war industries." After conferences with the Negro leaders, President Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8802 and the march on Washington was called off. This order, issued June 25, 1941, provided that:

"There shall be no discrimination in the employment of workers in defense industries or Government because of race, creed, color, or national origin."

The order also established the Committee on Fair Employment Practices to carry this policy into effect. There is nothing in Executive Order 8802 about abolishing segregation and ordering the mixing of the races. However, as a result of the order there is today no segregation in the United States Government offices in Washington.

In the Federal offices in Washington, whites and Negroes work in the same rooms, the same offices, eat together at the same cafeterias, use the same rest rooms and recreational facilities. White girls may be assigned as secretaries to Negro men, and Negro girls may be sent to the offices of white officials. I remember one occasion when a Government official, a man from Atlanta, Ga., called me and asked my advice on a certain matter. He said that upon his request for stenographers the Civil Service had sent him colored girls. In many bureaus and departments, the mixing of the races has gone so far that southern girls, going to the capital city to work, have returned to their homes. Others, who for various reasons must remain there to work, find such conditions almost unbearable.

So far Executive Order No. 8802 has not been successfully enforced in the war industries in the South. Perhaps the attempt to do so in the Mobile shipyards, which resulted in a race riot, was sufficient warning.

The March-on-Washington group proposes to abolish segregation completely throughout the United States and to bring about the full political, economic, and social equality of the races. So that you will have no doubts about their demands, I wish to read you excerpts from an article, "Why Should We March," by A. Philip Randolph, head of the movement, appearing in the November 1942 Survey Graphic:

"* * * What are the reasons for this state of mind? The answer is: discrimination, segregation, Jim Crow * * *.

"It is to meet this situation squarely with direct action that the March-on-Washington movement launched its present program of protest mass meetings. * * * Meetings of such magnitude were unprecedented among Negroes * * *.

"The March-on-Washington movement is essentially a movement of the people * * * the plan of a protest march has not been abandoned. Its purpose would be to demonstrate that American Negroes are in deadly earnest, and all out for their full rights. No power on earth can cause them today to abandon their fight to wipe out every vestige of second-class citizenship and the dual standards that plague them * * *.

"By fighting for their rights now, American Negroes are helping to make America a moral and spiritual arsenal of democracy. Their fight against the poll tax, against lynch law, segregation, and Jim Crow, their fight for economic, political, and social equality, thus becomes part of the global war for freedom."

This is the kind of propaganda being fed to the Negro masses. It is the contention of these Negro leaders that segregation is in itself discrimination. This question has been before the United States Supreme Court on a number of occasions and the Court has held that segregation is not discrimination as long as adequate accommodations are provided for both races.

The theory that segregation is discrimination is adhered to by the Negro judge, William H. Hastie. Hastie resigned from his post as civilian aide to the Secretary of War because of his disagreement with the War Department over its policy of segregation in the armed forces. In a speech before some 20,000 Negroes in Detroit in June 1943, Hastie declared that there is a terrific waste of energy and man-hours by the segregation of Negroes into their own Army groups and by denying Negro officers the right to command Army groups composed in part, or entirely, of white men.

At this same mass meeting there was also a speech made by Roy Wilkins, assistant secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. This association is another of the Negro organizations leading in this fight for full equality of the races. Wilkins declared:

"We refuse to listen to the weak-kneed of both races who tell us not to raise controversies during the war. We believe, on the contrary, that we are doing a patriotic duty in raising them."

I am sorry to say that certain religious leaders of the Negro race are joining the organizations and groups already named in spreading the preachings of social equality to the Negro masses. The following article was clipped from the New York Herald Tribune and will show you how far some of these Negro preachers are going:

"The Reverend James H. Robinson, pastor of the Negro Presbyterian Church of the Master, 86 Morningside Avenue, in an address yesterday in Milbank Chapel, Teachers College, Columbia University, described the race problem in the United States as 'very bad' and suggested that the time might come when certain groups would protest by forceful means.

"Speaking at a 3-day conference on religion in the modern world, sponsored by Columbia University, Mr. Robinson asserted that Negro soldiers who had been taught to kill those standing in the way of democratic principles 'are not going to discriminate between a German and an American who does the same thing.' He warned the 75 delegates that if Americans did not approach the racial problem with frankness and courage, they might see a march on Washington, or race riots, after the war.

"He said the morale of Negro troops is 'very low' because they are being discriminated against by other soldiers in the Army. Similar discriminations, he asserted, exists in war plants, and is lowering morale among Negroes there.

"SAYS TROOPS TRUST IN RUSSIA

" 'The Negro soldier,' he said 'hears platitudes of democracy, but can see no adequate demonstration of them. It is lamentable, but true, that Negro soldiers believe the outcome of the war will be determined by how strongly the Russians come.'

"Although admitting that he was 'very pessimistic concerning the attitude of the United States toward Negroes after the war,' Mr. Robinson said he felt the fundamental solution to the problem could be found in education. But he criticized the colleges for alleged discrimination against Negroes.

" 'Vassar College,' he asserted, 'has not admitted a Negro student in 25 years, and Barnard College has a quota system permitting entrance to four Negro girl students every 2 years.' Barnard, he said, would not admit the quota system existed, but it was there.

"ASKS COLLEGE FACILITIES

"Reiterating that education can go a long way toward solving the problem, Mr. Robinson said a start must be made in the colleges, both through association of white and Negro students and the inclusion of Negro scholars on college faculties.

"He expressed the hope that more colleges would employ Negro professors, so that the American public could learn to associate the professor with a special field of skill and not see him merely as a member of a race.

" 'Negroes,' he said, 'don't want to spend their time talking about race prejudice. They want the opportunity to teach what they are qualified to teach.'

"Asserting that the problem required the most serious thought on the part of Americans, and that they must be courageous enough to realize the potentialities and begin education for a better understanding of the racial problems, Mr. Robinson said:

" 'Lynching is not the basic problem; it is that spiritual death which is worse than physical death.' "

I am sure you have read in the Jackson Daily News of Wednesday, March 8, the Washington story of Dr. Studebaker and his Negro assistant, Dr. Ambrose Caliver, calling on the colleges and universities of the South to open wide their doors for the matriculation of Negro students. This is exactly in line with what Dr. Thompson in New York was advocating in his speech at Columbia University.

It is a real news item when BILBO and Fred Sullens get together and agree on anything, but Major Sullens' editorial on this report from the Office of Education out of Washington, under the title of "Go Straight to Hell," meets with my full and complete endorsement. Sullens is right when he says that the South won't do it and that not in this generation and never in the future while Anglo-Saxon blood flows in our veins will the people of the South open the doors of their colleges and universities for Negro students. I repeat that Major Sullens is right. We will tell our Negro-loving Yankee friends to go straight to hell.

Another group of Negroes recently sounded the warning that they would use force if necessary to win the full equality that they are seeking. This group visited me in my office in Washington shortly after I became chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. Practically every Negro organization in Washington had a representative in the group, and they wanted me to know the demands which they were making for full political, economic, and social equality. When I expressed my doubts as to their receiving what they were asking, one spokesman said that if that were true, then Negroes had just as well quit buying War bonds and get out of the war effort.

It was further said by one member of the group that Negroes intended to secure full equality and would do so by force, if necessary, when the war was over. There you have their demands in no uncertain terms.

The race situation has for some time been tense in Washington. Negroes already compose 30 to 40 percent of the population of the Capital City, and efforts are being made by their leaders to get as many Negroes as possible on the Government pay rolls. If suffrage should be granted in the District of Columbia, the Negroes would soon have control of the city and the alleys would be completely outvoting the avenues.

On the 7th of February 1944, a Negro attorney, John P. Davis, carried his 5-year-old son to a white school in Washington and attempted to enroll him. Davis had already been told that the child would not be accepted, but he carried out his plans to make the attempt to enroll him in order that he may bring a test case challenging the dual school system in Washington.

In February the C. I. O. opened a canteen in Washington for service men and women. Immediately a storm of southern protest was sounded for it was unbelievable that newspaper accounts of the opening of the canteen could be true. However, these accounts did paint a true picture of the activities. On opening night there were some 200 service men and women present. There were about an equal number of white and Negro soldiers who attended and white girls and Negro girls served as hostesses to those soldiers in equal numbers. Can you picture such social affairs taking place in our Nation's Capital? In speaking of the opening of the canteen, Congressman MCKENZIE, of Louisiana, asked:

"How can anyone be a party to encouraging white girls into the arms of Negro soldiers at a canteen while singing Let Me Call You Sweetheart?"

The sponsors of this mingling of the whites and Negroes in social equality declared that the "plan was proving successful." And Joseph Phillips, president of the C. I. O. Washington Industrial Union Council, said that his organization was proud to sponsor the "first effective non-Jim Crow canteen in Washington." He added that "when people come to our dances they dance with whomever they choose."

Have we reached the place in this country when we are going to permit our white girls to attend social functions with Negro soldiers? If we do permit such, can we profess to be surprised at what the results may be? No possible good, but much harm, can come to both races by activities of this kind. Are our soldiers and sailors fighting to save this Nation, or are they fighting so that we may become a mongrelized people? Practicing social equality of the races is certainly the surest way to destroy the culture of the white race.

We condemn such activities as are being carried on at this canteen and we also condemn those in high authority who sponsor or attend or endorse such activities.

We in the Southland, being fully aware of the attempts to break down segregation and implant social equality of the races throughout the Nation are ready to do some plain talking. The Negro leaders have brought this issue of race relations before us in this time of war; they have stated their demands so we have no alternative but to tell them where we stand.

We in Mississippi are justly proud of the harmonious relations existing here among the races. Our population is almost equally divided and we are glad to have peaceful, law-abiding Negroes within our midst. We ask no Negro to leave our State; at the same time we ask no discontented Negro to remain.

Three-fourths of the Nation's 12,800,000 Negroes are living and earning a livelihood in the South. We have an established policy of segregation known and understood by the members of both races. We recognize the right of a Negro to hire Negroes in preference to white people and the white employer has the same right. The right of Southern white people to operate political associations and hold their primaries, excluding Negroes, is no more to be questioned than the right of Negroes to form political or social clubs, excluding white people. Certainly Negroes may own and conduct their own restaurants, hotels and shops exclusively for themselves just as white people may do likewise. The races shall have equal but separate accommodations on busses and trains; and separate public schools shall be maintained. Equal and exact justice shall be accorded both races under the law, but segregation of the races shall be enforced. Honest and intelligent Southern white and colored people agree with this policy. In commenting on the recent Detroit race riots, a Negro leader in Arkansas, Rev. Thomas J. Brown, editor of the Eastern Arkansas World, made the following statement:

"The only way to live peaceably and unmolested in the South, North, East, and West is for every kind to himself; whether it be race, clan, or tribe. Henry W. Longfellow wrote, 'Birds of a feather flock together.' 'Society, like water, seeks level,' says another writer.

"The average Negro is proud of his race and its achievement and would not care to undermine its solidarity by amalgamation or intermarriage with other races.

"No one needs to be uneasy about the Negro in the South wanting to associate with white folks. He does not even want to live in the same block with them. He does not care to even sit in his front room or eat with him at his table. We don't want to ride with him. We are contented to reside in a Negro section of our towns, go to our own church which is pastored by a black man; send our children to school where they can be under the loving care of Negro teachers.

"It seems that some of our best white friends of the South are becoming afraid of this southern Negro. Don't worry about us. You can continue to trust us with your banks, your stores, your farms, and even your homes."

The Negro race in the South is fortunate to have such a leader as Reverend Brown, and I think he would agree with me that it is difficult, if not impossible, to understand why any group or individual outside the Southland would want to destroy the harmonious race relations which exist here. Yet, we have only to look about us to see these attacks on southern segregation going on before our very eyes. The three reasons for the destruction of all racial barriers throughout the Nation are stated by the Militant Church Movement, 602 West Walnut Street, Louisville, Ky., in the following manner:

"The Militant Church Movement affirms:

"That color does not affect anything but the outer surface of the skin. * * *

"That every act of racial hatred or discrimination is in violation of the will of the founders of this Republic and the principles of Christianity upon which this Nation was built. Thomas Jefferson, who wrote the Declaration of Independence, freed his slaves to prove his sincerity in declaring that all men are born free and equal.

"That no church is Christian that is not built on the foundation laid down by its founder, Jesus Christ, namely, the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and the Golden Rule. And if we are not willing to accept those principles, we should change our name and abandon our leader."

Now, I propose to show the falsity of all three of these reasons. First, history and science both defy the statement that "color does not affect anything but the outer surface of the skin." Historical and scientific research has established three propositions beyond all controversy:

First. The white race has founded, developed, and maintained every civilization known to the human race.

Second. The white race, having founded, developed, and maintained a civilization, has never been known, in all history, to lose that civilization as long as the race was kept white.

Third. The white man has never kept unimpaired the civilization he has founded and developed after his blood stream has been adulterated by the blood stream of another race, more especially another race so widely diverse in all its inherent qualities as the black race.

The superior ability of the white race has been proven both craniologically and by 6,000 years of planet-wide experimentation. The dividing line may be small, but it is definitely there; and I am reminded of the words of Browning when he said:

"Oh, the little more, and how much it is.
"And the little less, and what worlds away."

The superior ability of the Caucasian man is evidenced by his endless creation of art, science, law, religion, literature, and every other form of activity known to man down through the ages. Against these achievements, what has the African to offer? What history? What art? What science? What morality? And who will deny the almightiness of heredity? Let the blood stream be corrupted and nothing can ever restore its purity. If you do not accept this as true, then you brand as false both history and biology. If you refuse such truths, then Spencer, Haeckel, Weismann, Mendel, and Pearson have lived and labored in vain.

In the second place, this group has tried to justify full equality of the races in this country in the name of democracy, the name of the founding fathers, and the teaching of Thomas Jefferson. I quote Jefferson's own words:

"Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate, than that these people are to be free; nor is it less certain that the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same government. Nature, habit, opinion have drawn indelible lines of distinction between them."

Jefferson, along with Clay, Madison, Monroe, and many others believed that Negroes in the United States should be colonized on the coast of Africa. This is the same movement to which Abraham Lincoln later gave his approval. President Grant spent the 8 years of his administration trying to resettle the American Negro in another country.

The founders of this Republic never dreamed of it being anything but a white nation. We owe an immeasurable debt to our forefathers who preserved us white through 300 years of race contact. They did not, as did many Latin Americans, barter their birthright for temporary gain. If our ancestors had possessed less courage, less foresight, less intelligence, and weaker morals, we would be today a mixbreed people.

Col. Earnest S. Cox has this to say in his book, White America:

"While the purity of the white race has been the national ideal throughout American history, it is not the Nation as a whole, but that part of the Nation in immediate contact with the Negro that has been submitted to a rigid test of this ideal. The South emerges from 300 years of immediate contact with the Negro and is white. This is the greatest miracle in the record of the contact of races. Faithful to race and institutions, the South now presents 25,000,000 Anglo-Saxon sons and daughters for the Nation's use in peace or war."

The third argument used by the Militant Church group, that of religion, to break down all racial barriers has been frequently used. It was used at one time by the British missionaries in South Africa, and we have before us the practical results of their teachings that all races are of one blood. The mixbreeds of the Cape of Good Hope are evidence of the influence of these ignorant, Negro-loving missionaries who brought disaster along with their teachings. The doctrines of the missionaries were soon changed and they ceased to teach social equality, but who could undo the damage which they had done? The present missionary teaches of the same God and the same Christ and tells the same story of redemption, but the social teaching has been changed.

In Africa, in China, in India, in parts of Asia, in Latin America, Christianity has been implanted by the white man and it has not survived after the departure of the white man. History clearly shows that the white race is the custodian of the gospel of Jesus Christ and that the white man is entrusted with the spreading of that gospel.

The gospel, of course, is universal; it is missionary in scope; and it is given to all men of all nations. Yet what can be more foreign to the ideals of the Christian religion than amalgamation and miscegenation? Anyone who would, in the name of Christianity, make us a negroid people betrays his religion and his race.

It should be the desire of both races to maintain racial integrity and have their blood remain pure. If religion teaches the destruction of the races and commits the error of preaching the mixture of all bloods, then what can the missionaries and ministers do to give to the unborn generations the racial heritage which is rightfully theirs? A. H. Shannon, author of Racial Integrity, poses this question: "Which is better, a mongrel race, whose origin is in sin, and which represents the worst of all races; or a race, whatever its limitations, yet true to its own racial peculiarities and striving to attain, intact, the best and highest of which it is capable?" To ask the question is to answer it.

Those who would teach us social equality of the races remind us of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Why place a fallacious interpretation on these two phrases? If we are to spiritualize "Fatherhood of God," then why must we literalize "Brotherhood of man"? Both the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man are spiritual, and anyone who would interpret the brotherhood of man in such a manner as to destroy the blood of the white race would destroy the race which has through the centuries proven itself to be the custodian of the gospel of Christ, of his spiritual and ethical teachings.

We in the South are sworn to uphold racial integrity. We condemn, we will not condone, the attempt on the part of any group, or individual, to destroy our ideals and principles in the name of history, or of science, or of democracy, or of religion.

One of the most pregnant sources of corrupting the minds of our people on the race question is the apostasy of ministers and preachers of practically every denomination expounding the theories of the Christian religion under the favorite texts of Brotherhood of Mankind, Fatherhood of God, and All of One Blood. Some of these negrophilistic preachers with their false interpretations of the real teachings of the Christian religion, pouring out a lot of maudlin sentiment and ecclesiastical rot, tend to make their followers, here in the South and in the North, believe that, under God, the white man is no better than the Negro and that, if you want to go to Heaven, you had better take the sons and daughters of Ethiopia into your fond embraces.

The time has come when we must draw the color line so tight that no man, whether he be sinner, saint, steward, elder, deacon, pastor, priest, or bishop, shall be permitted in the name of the church or the Bible to expound theories of God's teachings that would most certainly lead to sin, miscegenation, intermarriage, or social equality in any form between the Negro and the white man. Any preacher or minister who would take advantage of his divine calling to thus destroy the integrity of his race and contaminate and corrupt the blood of his fathers should by his own church be unfrocked and never permitted to smack his traitorous lips on another yellow-legged chicken.

Not only do we answer the attacks of those who would destroy our policy of segregation but we will go further and renew our faith and allegiance to the color line. Reduced to its simplest form and laid bare for all the world to judge, we declare that the South is justified in the absolute denial of social equality to the Negro regardless of what his abilities or accomplishments may be. This the South must do, in behalf of her blood, her essence, and the stock of her Caucasian race.

If we sit with Negroes at our tables, if we entertain them as our social equals, if we discard the color line in all other relations, is it possible to maintain it fixedly in the marriage of the South's Anglo-Saxon sons and daughters? The answer is an emphatic "No."

If the middle wall of social partition is ever broken down, then the tides of life will begin to mingle. It matters not that the process may be gradual; it would be nonetheless irresistible. The lower stratum of the white population would be affected first, but the invasion of the middle and uppermost would be in the foreseeable future. Then, as a race, the southern Caucasian would be irreversibly doomed. If the mingling ever starts, then there is no possible check for the process. When there are two streams which flow side by side and the barrier between is removed, they immediately begin to mingle their molecules. No power on earth could sift them out and restore the streams to their original purity. Should the barriers in the South which separate the blood streams of the two races be removed, then that moment the bloom of her spirit is blighted and the promise of her destiny is annulled forever. Dr. Benjamin Smith, in his book, The Color Line, has ably said:

"No other conceivable disaster that might befall the South could, for an instant, compare with such miscegenation within her borders. Flood and fire, fever and famine, and the sword—even ignorance, indolence, and carpetbaggery—she may endure and conquer while her blood remains pure, but once taint the well-spring of her life, and all is lost—even honor itself. It is this immediate jewel of her soul that the South watches with such a dragon eye, that she guards with more than vestal vigilance, with a circle of perpetual fire. The blood thereof is the life thereof; he who would defile it would stab her in her heart of heart; and she springs to repulse him with the fiercest instinct of self-preservation. It may not be that she is distinctly conscious of her roused antagonism; but the instinct itself is nonetheless just and true and the natural bulwark of her life."

Yet, there are those who would tear away this racial pride, knowing full well that it would plunge the Southland into hopeless depths of hybridization. Implant the doctrines of social equality below the Mason-Dixon line, and the result will be a mongrelized Southland. And if the transmitted germ plasma is destroyed, nothing shall ever restore it; neither wealth, nor culture, nor science, nor art, nor morality, nor religion itself.

To southerners this is not a question of individual morality or of self-respect or of individual accomplishments. Every child that is born is born not only of its immediate parents but of all its ancestry. Every child is a child of its race, and heredity plays its part upon it and upon all its descendants. However weak the white man, behind him stands Europe; however strong the black, behind him lies Africa.

Northerners may lightly dismiss instances of social equality practiced by them as insignificant and of no serious consequence. This the South cannot do. We congratulate our friends of the North that they seem to be able to play with fire without fear of burns, but with us the situation is totally different. Three-fourths of the Nation's Negroes live in our midst, and such incidents tolerated by the North will only cause southerners to bolt the door of social equality more firmly and guard the gates more narrowly.

And I am convinced that this is a question which we must settle for ourselves, and that the solutions to the problems as they arise must be our own. We have long listened for some just and fair consideration from other sections, but we have listened in vain. Instead of understanding and help, there is a systematic warfare being waged in many quarters against southern traditions and customs. We are outvoted in Congress; thus we cannot look for help from the Federal Government. We have in the past successfully handled the race problem and we will continue to do so in the future.

We people of the South must draw the color line tighter and tighter, and any white man or woman who dares to cross that color line should be promptly and forever ostracized. No compromise on this great question should be tolerated, no matter who the guilty parties are, whether in the church, in public office, or in the private walks of life. Ostracize them if they cross the color line and treat them as a Negro or as his equal should be treated.

And just as we will not tolerate attacks on the color line from the outside we will have no such attacks from within our own borders. I regret that I must tell you that a teacher in one of our southern colleges recently made a vicious attack on southern ideals and customs. I charge that Mrs. Louise Perry made, in substance, these statements:

The Negro has the equal ability of the white man, and if he were given the opportunity, he would accomplish just as much; that the Negro has not had the same chance as the white man because the Negro's civilization is not nearly as old as the white man's; that the Negro should be given equal education and equal labor opportunities; that we must educate the Negro politically, that is, how to vote intelligently, then we would not fear his vote; and further that the white man has nothing to be superior over, because it was just by accident that he was born white; also that it would be better to marry a high-class Negro rather than a man of poor white trash; and eventually the Nation would be of mixbreeds.

The teacher I have referred to is from North Carolina, but the school where she is teaching is a tax-supported college in Mississippi, the Delta State Teachers College at Cleveland. I have the proof for the charges which I have made and will supply such to Governor Bailey and the members of the Board of Trustees of the Institutions of Higher Learning. God help us if we do not prohibit such teachings in every white school as well as every Negro school in Mississippi.

I have exposed the above incident and have made this speech here today because I feel it is imperative that we face squarely and frankly the conditions which confront us. We must not sit idly by, but we must ever be on guard to protect the southern ideals, customs, and traditions that we love and believe in so firmly and completely. There are some issues that we may differ upon, but on racial integrity, white supremacy, and love for the Southland we will stand together until we pass on to another world.

Twenty-four years ago last January 6, I stood here and spoke to the Legislature as I left the Governor's office the first time. The closing words that I used then I now repeat with a feeling that has grown deeper with the years that have passed:

"* * * For I love the South with all my soul; I love her, and have long ago consecrated and dedicated my life and my services to her glory and welfare. When I think of what she is and what she shall be, I feel that no other words can more appropriately express her beauties, her matchless glory, her magnificence than the words of the poet who came from the North, and when his eyes first beheld the beauty, the charm, and the glory of this sunny clime, his heart burst forth in these beautiful lines:

"Oh Southland! loveliest land beneath the bright blue, bending skies!
Oh land most passionate this side of the gates of Paradise!
A sense of gladness unconfined was mine when first I set my foot upon thy flowery sod,
It lingers with me yet.

I love thy immemorial hills by humankind untrod,
The rose lights of their raptured heights, touched by the skies of God,
The crash and warble jubilant of the cataracts that flash and shimmer through the vines that trail from steep to steep.

I love thy waving woods
Where in the glooms of green the miracle magnolia flowers
Like fallen moons are seen.

Where the mock birds pipe and twitter through the long resplendent days,
Until every leaf and flower seem to dance in rhythm with their lays,
Where the wild ripe roses trail their scarlet mist of bloom
And sparkling sunlit lily bells with their amber hearts illume,
Where rivers roll and surge, proud, passionate, and free,
Through sweeps of glad savannah lands, to kiss the open sea.

Oh land of Calhoun, of Jefferson, and Davis,
Oh land of romance, and roses, of sunshine and song."

Ladies and gentlemen of the Mississippi Legislature, I bid you godspeed and pray that His divine mind will influence and direct your every act for the realization of such a government and civilization that will prepare this old world for the return of His Son and His kingdom upon the earth.

I thank you.

Americanism and Individual Opportunity Must Be Saved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following keynote address given by Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., of Massachusetts, Republican leader of the House of Representatives, at the Connecticut Republican State Convention held at Hartford, Conn., on Thursday, April 13, 1944:

This fine gathering of patriotic men and women is an inspiring and impressive demonstration of the functioning of free men and free women under a representative Republican form of government. We are assembled in convention in a historic city that you may select the delegates who will represent Connecticut in the great national party conclave to be held the latter part of June in Chicago.

The rights of American citizenship which we are exercising tonight are among those which inspire men and women to fight and die on many far-flung battlefields. It is the spirit of free men and women which assures victory in this war in which we are now engaged. Armies driven by the lash of a dictator never can defeat armies of free men and women, who fight for the holy cause of freedom. That is why we face the crucial months of war with full faith and confidence.

I come to Connecticut with full appreciation of your contribution to the preservation of the two-party system of government both in your efficient State government under the leadership of your outstanding Governor, Raymond Baldwin, and in the fine and capable Representatives you have sent to the National Congress.

Six years ago when the lights of Republicanism burned low, you elected Senator JOHN A. DANAHER. You made no mistake. In one term he has won the deserved reputation of being an outstanding statesman, one who ranks high among the brilliant men New England has sent to the United States Senate. Reelect him next fall, and you will have a strong guardian of your interests as we travel through the uncertain years ahead.

In 1942 Connecticut very wisely reelected JOE TALBOT and gave us five other excellent Republican Congressmen in CLARE LUCE, B. J. MONKIEWICZ, WILLIAM J. MILLER, JOHN D. MCWILLIAMS, and RANULF COMPTON.

These Representatives have been outstanding in the fight we have waged in Congress for the preservation of our constitutional government. They have aided in the battle to bring about a little sanity into the spending of the people's money; they have joined wholeheartedly in the fight to prevent a ruthless, arrogant, and power-lustful bureaucracy from fastening permanently its paralyzing grip upon the people.

In the early days of this country, when liberty was first budding in America, the people of Connecticut showed their devotion to constitutional government when they hid away for safety the charter of their liberties in the historic oak-tree here in Hartford. Ever since that day Connecticut has resolutely fought in defense of the Constitution and the rights of the States. And I am supremely confident as we go forward in the next 2 years to fight in Congress for the preservation of the Constitution and our American way of life, these able and conscientious Representatives I have commended will be sent back to join in this battle of the people.

We have reached a point in our national life when the Congress is the last remaining guardian of the Constitution and the last remaining bulwark of the people's liberties. This may appear to some of you as a bit fantastic; but let us review the past. It is only through the lamplight of experience that we can intelligently appraise the future.

Government by bureaucracy has grown by leaps and bounds since the present administration came into power on the solemn pledge to reduce expenditures and eliminate bureaus and commissions. Not only have new bureaus and commissions multiplied, but they have come under the complete domination of the Executive and his little group of "palace guards."

Expenditures of the public funds have reached a magnitude beyond human comprehension.

New bureaus have been created, consolidated, and shuffled about at the whim of the Executive and often in complete defiance of Congress. When Congress eliminated an agency, it was often kept going through the use of blank-check funds granted to the President. If a bureau was allowed to lapse because of popular sentiment against it, the political favorites therein were transferred to other snug berths. Frequently in the transfer they were given largely increased salaries. There is no Little Steel wage formula for the favorites of the New Deal.

The New Deal has fixed rigid control on the Government agencies. That control has extended even to quasi-judicial agencies. In creating some of the important industrial regulatory commissions, Congress provided for representation therein by members from both major political parties. It was the national conception that this arrangement would permit of one party acting as a check upon the other and no single group would dominate in carrying out congressional policies.

That wise check no longer exists. If new Republicans are named to these agencies, care is taken to make sure they lean to the philosophy and support of the New Deal. Jeffersonian Democrats fare no better than Republicans. Appointments are seldom made from this branch of the party. As a result, the New Deal clique has achieved absolute and complete control of the Government.

With complete control of all the executive agencies, the administration carefully planned complete domination of the judiciary. It was an old-fashioned idea that by selecting able jurists of both major parties the Federal courts could be kept out of politics and would function as tribunals whose decisions would be based on law and not the personal or political predilections of the judges. To free them of political influences the founding fathers provided life tenure for these judicial officers of the Government.

The movement toward control of the courts at first went rather slowly; so slowly the new dealers became impatient. Few died and none resigned. Consequently there was born the movement to pack the Supreme Court. The people were shocked at this arrogant attempt of the Executive to dominate the judiciary, which under our Constitution was intended to be one of the three coordinate and independent branches of the Government. A popular uprising on the part of the people prevented even a "rubber stamp" Congress from agreeing to this proposal. The new dealers were forced to wait. Time marched on, and human life is frail. Through the power of appointment, the courts were packed, until today no one questions the dominating philosophy of the Federal courts.

After achieving complete control of the independent agencies and with the New Deal judiciary, the new dealers turned their attention to Congress.

The people had begun to ask questions. The New Deal promises were still dreams that had not come true. Efficiency in government was conspicuous by its absence. Wanton waste of the people's substance was apparent everywhere. Taxes were skyrocketing. Under the cloak of emergency, the bureaucrats grabbed power, and in too many instances, exercised it arrogantly and unwisely.

The people decided they wanted a better balance in government, and in 1942, they sent a larger representation of Republicans to Congress.

This new complexion in Congress, I am happy to report to you tonight, ended the rubber-stamp era. No longer can the palace guard send bills to Congress and demand that they be passed by midnight without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." No longer can they telephone their orders with the certainty they will be carried out by a subservient Congress.

The blank checks are less plentiful, and today are confined chiefly to the war effort. If they are now used for other purposes it is a flagrant violation of the expressed intent of Congress. Wide powers have necessarily been voted for carrying on the war, but they are now carefully examined, and generally a date is fixed for their termination. And it is the firm resolution of us Republicans in Congress that these powers shall be canceled at the earliest possible moment. The New Deal hope of permanence of its bureaucratic powers and control will be rudely shattered.

Congress refused to give the Federal Government control over the elections under the false plea that this was the only method by which service men and women could vote. Everyone wanted to make it possible for the soldiers and sailors to enjoy this right of citizenship. But it was the position of a majority in Congress that the service people were entitled to the complete ballot like that of any other citizen. It is the proper function of the Federal Government to make certain these ballots are distributed to the soldiers and sailors and returned to the States to be counted in the local precincts where the service people have their homes.

Congress refused to abdicate its control over the taxing power and rebuked an attempt by the Executive to dictate the exercise of these powers. To give away its control over taxation and the spending of the people's money would reduce the legislative branch to a mere shell.

A close watch is being maintained over the New Deal technique of assuming legislative powers through bureaucratic directives rather than acts of Congress. We must guard against this habit of the bureaucrats, and we will not hesitate to intervene for the protection of the rights of the people.

Congress has given the fullest measure of cooperation for the winning of the war. We have and we shall continue to lean over backward in providing the fighting forces with all the money they say is necessary, but we will continually be on guard against extravagance, waste, and corruption in the spending of this money.

We are determined that Congress shall have a full voice in the making of the peace and in post-war planning. The sooner the bureaucrats awaken to that fact, the better it will be for all concerned.

Conferences are now being held and presumably the basis being laid for our cooperation with our allies in the post-war days. These conferences will determine the boundaries of the world; they will shape the plans of peace, and they will determine the kind of world we shall have in the days to come. It is not enough that these decisions shall be the exclusive judgment of the executive branch of the Government. They should be the result of the combined judgment of the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

The people are fighting this war; the people are paying for this war; and it will be the people who will be asked to stand behind any commitments that are made. And the Congress which represents the people must be given a voice in these commitments if they are to endure. That voice should be in evidence not only in the final peace conference, but in the preliminary gatherings.

Representation from Congress should include Republicans as well as Democrats. Then, and only then, will the people be satisfied their rights will be fully protected. Let us make the deliberations of these conferences open to all our people. Let us put an end to war-breeding secret agreements and understandings between nations, and let the American foreign policy be forged under the bright light of public opinion.

The new spirit of independence in Congress of late naturally stirred the new dealers to a determined effort to discredit and smear Congress. Over the air, in newspapers and pamphlets, and in the movies came the tirades of the faithful propagandists of the New Deal. It was one chant and one theme; all based on the hope that the people would lose faith in the popular branch of Government and permit the new dealers to complete the circle of absolute control of Government.

This fall there will be unleashed the full fury of the New Deal attack against Congress. The people must be prepared, and we can make certain we do not permit a complete monopoly in Government to rest with a little New Deal clique by electing a Republican Congress. Keep the Congress of America a free, independent body.

The delegates you elect tonight will select the next President of the United States. The man chosen faces a herculean task. He must cooperate with the military and naval leaders in the winning of the war; he must guide wisely the making of the peace; he must with courage face distressing post-war problems. Upon him will rest, with the Congress, the responsibility of preserving the American system of government and the American way of life.

Fortunately, the Republican Party is not a one-man party. Despite our years of adversity, we have a number of good men who possess the essential qualifications of leadership, the courage and the patriotism to meet the serious demands of the hour. I have every confidence the good judgment and the good sense of the convention will select a candidate who will be elected and who will lead our country out of the wilderness of confusion into the bower of peace.

Political straws, political trends, and popular sentiment, all indicate the next President will be a Republican. But this is not the only foundation upon which rest our hopes of next November.

The absorbing and dramatic events of war have obscured the fact that today, the Republicans are actually in a majority in this country. A majority of more than a million voted for Republican candidates for Congress in 1942 in preference to those on the Democratic ticket. Twenty-six of the 38 Governors in the States outside the 10 Southern States are Republican, the State legislatures in 27 States have Republican control to 9 controlled by the Democrats and 2 with a divided responsibility. Nearly 80 percent of the county governments in the 38 Northern and Western States have Republican officials. This is a foundation strong enough to give any party real hope of victory.

A well-planned campaign will be undertaken in the next few months to build up the myth of the indispensable man. It will be represented that without Mr. Roosevelt, the war will be lost or dragged out, that without him, there will be no one who can talk intimately and intelligently with the leaders of the other nations of the world.

This type of campaign will not succeed. The American people are not so gullible as to believe the war will be lost or delayed a single day by the presence of another man in the White House. Mr. Roosevelt's successor would do exactly what Mr. Roosevelt should do, if he uses good judgment, and that is to depend upon the professionally trained generals and admirals to plan the strategy and to direct the movements of war. No new Commander in Chief would dare hesitate for a moment to take full advantage of the ability and knowledge of our professional military men. The experienced military leadership and the zeal of our millions of fighting men and women will be fully supported by the new administration, and they will bring about the victory for which we all devoutly pray.

In planning the peace and the post-war reconstruction period, there exists a wealth of experience and ability in this country, which is not now tapped for service. It can be stated definitely that all the brains in America are not to be found in the New Deal.

Many fine, patriotic men and women who are opposed to the New Deal and who belong to either the Republican or the Democratic Parties are anxious to serve and would well serve the people of this country. They can help bring about an early victory. They should be given a chance. All the ability in America will be needed in the critical years ahead.

This great Republic has not reached the state where it must depend entirely upon one man. If this were so, it would be a strong indictment against a people's government. It would mean the end of the Republic. It would signify the end of the people's conception of America as a land of freedom and opportunity.

We will win the war, regardless of what happens to the political fortunes of any one individual, and through the good, sound common-sense characteristic of our people we will steer the world into a future blessed with peace, prosperity, security, and happiness.

In the last 12 years the New Deal has tried to make the people of this country believe that to achieve success was wrong; that thrift, economy, and hard work are old-fashioned and should be discarded; that a hand-out from the Government was preferable to a larger reward from honest endeavor.

It has brought into existence policies that have drastically reduced the revenue from savings-bank deposits, life-insurance reserves, and the general investments of millions of our thrifty and hard-working citizens.

There has been a deliberate and long-range attempt to crush the spirit of free enterprise. By legislation, by executive decrees and orders, and by threat of punishment, the campaign of the New Deal to subject enterprise, large and small, to its domination has been waged relentlessly and continuously.

Step by step, we have gone forward to Government control until we stand at the brink of some form of state socialism.

At this late hour, we see clearly now the path we have been traveling. It looked enchanting for a while, but the fog has cleared, and we are presented with a frightening picture.

We have willingly assumed new taxes, and today we find ourselves in a position where all individuals and business alike are being pretty thoroughly squeezed. We can do fairly well in a wartime economy with these high taxes in a period when the Government is putting up the cash, but it will be another story when we go back to the economy of peace. That is why we are asking for a thorough reexamination of our taxation system and a simplification of tax returns.

Carry the policies of the New Deal into the post-war days, and there is no hope of progress and prosperity for millions of our countrymen. There will be precious little opportunity of real jobs for the millions of veterans returning from the fighting fronts, for the war workers turned out of factories and shipyards, or for the tillers of the soil.

There is one way out of the morass, and that is to re-create opportunity, to restore initiative, to make profitable work and investment, to restore to all Americans the incentive of profit. Reward the inventive genius and the willingness of the American people to work.

To achieve this kind of an America we must bring about a revival of real Americanism. We must lay that foundation in these days of toil and sacrifice, and we must patiently move ahead in the days following the war.

The false lights of the New Deal must be extinguished. We must build the new America on the solid foundation of self-respect, self-confidence, and hard work. No success was ever achieved in any field of endeavor that did not represent years of hard work. Work is the price we have always paid for success, and no New Deal slogan will ever change that basic law.

To the Republican Party was given the task of rebuilding the country following the last World War. History will repeat itself.

Next November the people of America will once more turn to the Republican Party. We will work to hasten the delivery of the knockout blows against our enemies, and then we will bring our boys back to their own country and their own homes.

We will cooperate intelligently with other nations in bringing about peace and security. We will cooperate to bring about more friendly relations with other nations and to build a better world. But we will not fail either to protect the vital interests of the American people.

There is no room for defeatism in America. There are in this great land the brains and the resources and the will to achieve any objective we may seek. In order that the American people may achieve their objectives and have restored to them their constitutional, representative form of government, a huge task lies ahead of us. We must restore faith in ourselves; we must restore faith in our institutions and ideals; we must restore faith in our individual destiny and the destiny of our Nation; we must restore integrity in government office, and we must restore intelligence in administration.

To accomplish these aims we must first sweep the present administration from office and we must give our country an administration in which the President and Congress will cooperate intelligently and wisely, under the cardinal rules of American free government, to restore to the people the American way of living.

May God give us the wisdom and the strength to fulfill these sacred responsibilities to the people of America.

The Right of Negro Units To Participate As Units in Combat Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, racial discrimination in public service is never excusable, and if there is one place more than another where it should not be tolerated that place is the armed forces of our country in the midst of a desperate war when Negroes are freely and gallantly offering their lives to defend our precious institutions of freedom and to save civilization.

It was my privilege some years ago to offer the amendment which was adopted to prohibit racial discrimination in the administration of our military training programs. That was before we got into the war actively.

As the war has progressed I have heard, and I am still hearing reports to the effect that Negroes in the military service, are being assigned chiefly to menial duties, such as service at docks and supply dumps, and are not being given equal opportunities with other soldiers for the combat service which every true soldier covets. I have heard that Negro units are being broken up and their component members are being scattered to perform service duties instead of being allowed to go forth as units to battle in unit formation, the only exceptions being the Ninety-ninth Pursuit Squadron and a few antiaircraft units.

This appears to be in contrast with the policy of our allies, for whole units of French Senegalese and British divisions from India have been seeing active service in unbroken formations. It is also in contrast with our own policy in the First World War, when four separate colored regiments made gallant records of service.

I have felt it to be my duty to protest this discrimination and I have taken up the matter with Secretary of War Stimson in an effort to get a clear explanation of the War Department's policy in respect to assignment of Negro soldiers.

I present for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my letter to Secretary Stimson and his reply.

It will be noted that Secretary Stimson promises that additional Negro units will be utilized in combat in the future, though for security reasons he cannot reveal units, times, or places. The correspondence referred to is as follows:

MARCH 20, 1944.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am receiving inquiries from Negro constituents and from epresentative Negroes throughout the country indicating a good deal of anxiety over reports that Negroes are not being given a fair show in fighting the battles of our country. It is felt that this is especially to be deplored in view of the fact that Negroes have acquitted themselves with honor and credit in every war in which our country has engaged. Specifically, there is an undercurrent of dissatisfaction based on reports that Negroes are being preponderantly assigned to service the Army and are being deprived of the opportunity which every true soldier covets to engage in combat.

If there is no basis for these reports, I think it would be reassuring if I could so inform our colored people, and whatever the facts may be I think our colored friends, whose patriotism cannot be challenged, are entitled to have the facts.

It is in the hope, therefore, of allaying dissatisfaction, which certainly bodes no good, that I respectfully ask you to advise me on the following points:

1. How many Negroes and how many whites are there in the total military forces?

2. How many Negroes are assigned to service the Army?

3. How many Negroes are assigned to combat duty?

4. How many Negro units are engaged in combat and what are they?

5. How many Negro units are assigned to service duties and what are they?

6. Is it contemplated that additional Negro units are to be placed in combat, and if so, what are the units that are to be so assigned?

7. Finally, from your comprehensive overall knowledge of the military service, what in your opinion are the facts as to whether or not there is discrimination against Negroes in the service, and is it your intention in your position of high responsibility to see that such discrimination is not permitted to exist in the future?

If you can see your way clear to send me a reply covering the above points it will be helpful, I hope, in resolving doubts which must inevitably be injurious to morale.

With kind regards,

Very sincerely yours,

LOUIS LUDLOW.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 8, 1944.

Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LUDLOW: I have your letter of March 20th concerning the utilization of Negroes in the Army, and inquiring specifically whether the military service is following a policy of practiced discrimination against Negro soldiers.

Concerning War Department policies affecting Negro soldiers, I wish to invite your attention to the following paragraph which concluded my letter of February 19th to Congressman HAMILTON FISH.

"Permit me to emphasize, in conclusion, that any implication that the War Department is deliberately attempting to avoid sending overseas, or to keep out of combat, troops of the Negro or any other race, is entirely without foundation. Our personnel is distributed and employed as required, on duties individuals are qualified to perform, regardless of their racial derivations. Large number of Negro troops are overseas or en route and will be given every opportunity to win battle honors and demonstrate their worth in actual combat. The War Department has every intention of continuing its past efforts to make the best possible use of its available manpower in the prosecution of the war without regard to race, religion, color, or other unmilitary considerations."

I feel sure that the above statement, which has been and remains our policy, needs no elaboration.

With regard to your numbered questions requesting statistical data on various phases of Army Negro policy, unfortunately complete answers to most of them are precluded for security reasons, but I am more than glad to reply as comprehensively as military circumstances will permit.

As you perhaps know, the Army is accepting and absorbing Negro personnel corresponding to the registration ratio (10.4 percent) of its authorized male enlisted strength. At present approximately 9 percent of the total Army male enlisted strength is of the Negro race, but it is anticipated that the 10.4 percent ratio will be reached during the course of the current year. Our plans contemplate that of our total enlisted personnel 6,245,720 will be white, 709,280 Negro, and of the Negro personnel approximately 14 percent are scheduled for assignment to combat organizations. I believe this information responds to the first three of the numbered questions in your letter.

Concerning the utilization of Negro units in combat, obviously the details of the employment, locale, and disposition of overseas organizations, whether white or Negro, cannot be disclosed for security reasons. However, it may be stated that of the total Negro strength of the Army, approximately 50 percent are now overseas or en route. Moreover, 32 percent of the Negro contingent overseas are combat and combat support troops. I am sure you realize that, as is the case with many white combat units, a number of Negro combat units will not be employed in combat until concentrations are completed for projected major tactical operations scheduled for the future. Although publication of data on the number and type of units engaged in combat, whether white or Negro, would constitute a violation of security in that it would tend to reveal our deployment, I will state that Negro units, like white ones, are being shipped to combat areas as rapidly as their state of training and transportation facilities permit and that Negro units have participated and are participating in combat. It may also be stated that additional Negro units will be utilized in combat in the future, though, again for security reasons, it is not possible to reveal units, times, or places.

Permit me also to make this general observation with regard to the utilization of Negro soldiers in the military service. As you doubtless know, the Army has been faced with the fact that in civilian life large numbers of Negro inductees had inadequate educational opportunities. In a recent study of all men processed at reception centers from June through December 1943, 20 percent of the Negroes and 74 percent of the whites were rated in grades I, II, and III by Army general classification tests; 80 percent of the Negroes and 26 percent of the whites fell in grades IV and V. While these lower classifications certainly do not reflect either the intelligence of the men or their native abilities, they do indicate the nature and extent of the problem with which the Army must deal. To meet it, special training units for all men in class V, irrespective of race, have been established at several posts throughout the country. Courses of instruction are offered to give these men a basic education that will fit them for the proper performance of their Army duties. Very encouraging results have been obtained to date, for in the first 6 months of these courses, out of 29,000 Negro trainees approximately 90 percent were retained in the Army and assigned to more advanced training. Many excellent soldiers have been developed out of men who have initially made a low score in the Army general classification test.

In conclusion, permit me to reiterate and emphasize that all our military personnel is distributed and employed solely in conformance with military considerations which, of course, are entirely unrelated to racial derivations. I appreciate the spirit and purpose of your letter and hope this clarifies our position to your satisfaction.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

American Fascism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an interesting, illuminating, and timely article by our scholarly and distinguished Presiding Officer, the Vice President of the United States. The article is entitled "WALLACE Defines 'American Fascism,'" and was published in the New York Times magazine, of April 9, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WALLACE DEFINES "AMERICAN FASCISM"—THE VICE PRESIDENT SAYS IT POLLUTES PUBLIC OPINION, ENCOURAGES INTOLERANCE AND PRESENTS A CHALLENGE TO OUR DEMOCRATIC WAY OF LIFE

(By HENRY A. WALLACE, Vice President of the United States)

On returning from my trip to the West in February, I received a request from the New York Times to write a piece answering the following questions:

1. What is a Fascist?
2. How many Fascists have we?
3. How dangerous are they?

A Fascist is one whose lust for money or power is combined with such an intensity of intolerance toward those of other races, parties, classes, religions, cultures, regions, or nations as to make him ruthless in his use of deceit or violence to attain his ends. The supreme god of a Fascist to which his ends are directed may be money or power; may be a race or a class; may be a military clique or an economic group; or may be a culture, religion, or a political party.

The perfect type of Fascist throughout recent centuries has been the Prussian Junker, who developed such hatred for other races and such allegiance to a military clique as to make him willing at all times to engage in any degree of deceit and violence necessary to place his culture and race astride the world. In every big nation of the world are at least a few people who have the fascist temperament. Every Jew baiter, every Catholic hater is a Fascist at heart. The hoodlums who have been desecrating churches, cathedrals, and synagogues in some of our larger cities are ripe material for Fascist leadership.

The obvious types of American Fascists are dealt with on the air and in the press. These demagogs and stooges are fronts for others. Dangerous as these people may be, they are not so significant as thousands of other people who have never been mentioned. The really dangerous American Fascists are not those who are hooked up directly or indirectly with the Axis. The F. B. I. has its finger on those.

The dangerous American Fascist is the man who wants to do in the United States in an American way what Hitler did in Germany in a Prussian way. The American Fascist would prefer not to use violence. His method is to poison the channels of public information. With a Fascist the problem is never how best to present the truth to the public but how best to use the news to deceive the public into giving the Fascist and his group more money or more power.

If we define an American Fascist as one who in case of conflict puts money and power ahead of human beings, then there are undoubtedly several million Fascists in the United States. There are probably several hundred thousand if we narrow the definition to include only those who in their search for money and power are ruthless and deceitful.

Most American Fascists are enthusiastically supporting the war effort. They are doing this even in those cases where they hope to have profitable connections with German chemical firms after the war ends. They are patriotic in time of war because it is to their interest to be so, but in time of peace they follow power and the dollar wherever they may lead.

American fascism will not be really dangerous until there is a purposeful coalition between the cartelists, the deliberate poisoners of public information and those who stand for the K. K. K. type of demagog. Every year, however, the deliberate, systematic poisoning of the public channels of information is becoming more evident. At the moment the anti-Jewish, anti-Negro, anti-Catholic outbreaks are not too serious, but who can say what they will be if the poisoning of the public mind continues and we enter a period of serious depression?

The European brand of fascism will probably present its most serious post-war threat to us via Latin America. The effect of the war has been to raise the cost of living in most Latin-American countries much faster than the wages of labor. The Fascists in most Latin-American countries tell the people that the reason their wages won't buy as much in the way of goods is because of Yankee imperialism.

The Fascists in Latin America learn to speak and act like natives. Our chemical and other manufacturing concerns are all too often ready to let the Germans have Latin-American markets provided the American companies can work out an arrangement which will enable them to charge high prices to the consumer inside the United States. Following this war, technology will have reached such a point that it will be possible for Germans, using South America as a base, to cause us much more difficulty in World War No. 3 than they did in World War No. 2. The military and land-owning cliques in many South American countries will find it attractive financially to work with German Fascists concerns as well as expedient from the standpoint of temporary power politics.

Fascism is a world-wide disease. Its greatest threat to the United States will come after the war, either via Latin America or within the United States itself.

Still another danger is represented by those who, paying lip service to democracy and the common welfare, in their insatiable greed for money and the power which money gives, do not hesitate surreptitiously to evade the laws designed to safeguard the public from monopolistic extortion. American Fascists of this stamp were clandestinely alined with their German counterparts before the war and are even now preparing to resume where they left off, after "the present unpleasantness" ceases.

To the end of facilitating the reestablishment of these international cartels, these stuffed-shirt Fascists are presently engaged—not always covertly—in a campaign to subvert the distinctively democratic public policy founded on the principle of economic freedom. They seek nothing more, of course (and, incidentally, nothing less), than a license for an even more rigorous and more remorseless application of the principle of "charging what the traffic will bear," in league with their erstwhile Axis partners, than that which glorified the "new era" of the twenties—and prostrated the world economy in the thirties. They have a vain delusion that in this fashion they can again bring the common man to his knees and make of him this time a groveling suppliant who will "keep to his place." The susceptibility to hallucinations of this kind is one of the surest signs of the Fascist mentality.

The symptoms of Fascist thinking are colored by environment and adapted to immediate circumstances. But always and everywhere they can be identified by their appeal to prejudice and by the desire to play upon the fears and vanities of different groups in order to gain power. It is no coincidence that the growth of modern tyrants has in every case been heralded by the growth of prejudice. It may be shocking to some people in this country to realize that, without meaning to do so, they hold views in common with Hitler when they preach discrimination against other religious, racial, or economic groups. Likewise, many people whose patriotism is their proudest boast play Hitler's game by retailing distrust of our allies and by giving currency to snide suspicions without foundation in fact.

The American Fascists are most easily recognized by their deliberate perversion of truth and fact. Their newspapers and propaganda carefully cultivate every fissure of disunity, every crack in the common front against fascism. They use every opportunity to impugn democracy. They use isolationism as a slogan to conceal their own selfish imperialism.

They cultivate hate and distrust of both Britain and Russia. They claim to be superpatriots, but they would destroy every liberty guaranteed by the Constitution. They demand free enterprise, but are the spokesmen for monopoly and vested interest. Their final objective, toward which all their deceit is directed, is to capture political power so that using the power of the state and the power of the market simultaneously they may keep the common man in eternal subjection.

Several leaders of industry in this country who have gained a new vision of the meaning of opportunity through cooperation with government have warned the public openly that there are some selfish groups in industry who are willing to jeopardize the structure of American liberty to gain some temporary advantage. We all know the part that the cartels played in bringing Hitler to power and the rule the giant German trusts have played in Nazi conquests. Monopolists who fear competition and who distrust democracy because it stands for equal opportunity would like to secure their position against small and energetic enterprise. In an effort to eliminate the possibility of any rival growing up, some monopolists would sacrifice democracy itself.

The sincerity of monopolists and cartelists who deny that they have any Fascist tendencies is easily tested. Do they uphold, in their policies and practices, the genuine principles of free enterprise, granting to the newcomer, the little businessman, the inventor, a fair start in the game? To ask this question is to answer it. The monopolist wants no rivals. The cartelists want to regiment existing business, to eliminate all competition, and to prevent the emergence of new enterprise. In other words, the cartelist and the monopolist don't believe in economic democracy and if necessary are willing to see political democracy die in order to maintain their grip on economic life.

Very often big business gives unwitting aid to fascism. Many British businessmen would be incensed if they were branded as Fascists, yet by playing the cartel game they supported the policies that led to Munich and finally to the Duesseldorf agreement, signed the day following Hitler's seizure of Czechoslovakia. In this agreement they sanctioned the cartelization of industry in Germany and England, and stated that they intended to exert pressure on their governments to cartelize world trade. In the United States many industrialists whose personal patriotism is unquestioned placed themselves and their corporations in ambiguous positions because they had succumbed to the false security of cartel agreements with totalitarian German concerns.

It can be pointed out to such men that many of the German industrialists who financed Hitler found they had created a Frankenstein monster who did not hesitate to destroy them economically or personally if it suited his purpose. The ghost (and this may be literal) of Thyssen should haunt every American businessman so minded. Similarly, many thousands of businessmen who played ball with the Nazis found that the swastika stood for a double-cross, by which small industries were sold out to the giant combines, or to enrich favored members of the Nazi Party.

It has been claimed at times that our modern age of technology facilitates dictatorship. What we must understand is that the industries, processes, and inventions created by modern science can be used either to subjugate or liberate. The choice is up to us. The myth of Fascist efficiency has deluded many people. It was Mussolini's vaunted claim that he "made the trains run on time." In the end, however, he brought to the Italian people impoverishment and defeat. It was Hitler's claim that he eliminated all unemployment in Germany. Neither is there unemployment in a prison camp.

Democracy to crush fascism internally must demonstrate its capacity to "make the trains run on time." It must develop the ability to keep people fully employed and at the same time balance the Budget. It must put human beings first and dollars second. It must appeal to reason and decency and not to violence and deceit. We must not tolerate oppressive government or industrial oligarchy in the form of monopolies and cartels. As long as scientific research and inventive ingenuity outrun our ability to devise social mechanisms to raise the living standards of the people we may expect the liberal potential of the United States to increase. If this liberal potential is properly channeled we may expect the area of freedom of the United States to increase. The problem is to speed up our rate of social invention in the service of the welfare of all the people.

So long as private economic governments stifle initiative and attempt to control technological development, it is not possible for genuine advances to be made in economic and political democracy. As long as we falter in the solution of the unemployment problem, as long as monopoly chokes off the opportunities for investment and the development of an expanding economy, the specter of fascism will haunt our efforts to promote the general welfare.

The world-wide, age-long struggle between fascism and democracy will not stop when the fighting ends in Germany and Japan. Democracy can win the peace only if it does two things:

1. Speeds up the rate of political and economic inventions so that both production and, especially, distribution, can match in their power and practical effect on the daily life of the common man the immense and growing volume of scientific research, mechanical invention, and management technique.

2. Vivifies with the greatest intensity the spiritual processes which are both the foundation and the very essence of democracy.

The second of these two requirements is even more likely to be overlooked than the first. Our colleges, because of their preoccupation with science, history, economics, and athletics, stimulate too little serious questioning in the minds of the young Wall Streeters (and young La Salle Streeters) concerning that which is the essence of both democracy and religion—the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Democracy might well be called the religion of the general welfare in action. Against the international, imperialistic aspects of fascism and cartels it has its own type of internationalism—the good-neighbor policy. But the good-neighbor policy will be replaced by a new fascism if, after this war, we do as we did after the last war—insist on higher tariffs and the punitive payment of debts which foreign nations owe us.

The moral and spiritual aspects of both personal and international relationships have a practical bearing which so-called practical men deny. This dullness of vision regarding the importance of the general welfare to the individual is the measure of the failure of our schools and churches to teach the spiritual significance of genuine democracy. Until democracy in effective enthusiastic action fills the vacuum created by the power of modern inventions we may expect the Fascists to increase in power after the war, both in the United States and in the world.

Fascism in the post-war world inevitably will push steadily for Anglo-Saxon imperialism and eventually for war with Russia. Already American Fascists are talking and writing about this conflict and using it as an excuse for their internal hatreds and intolerances toward certain races, creeds, and classes.

It should also be evident from what has been said above that exhibitions of the native brand of fascism are not confined to any single section, class, or religion. Happily it can be said that as yet fascism has not captured a predominant place in the outlook of any American section, class, or religion. It may be encountered in Wall Street, Main Street, or Tobacco Road. Some even suspect that they can detect incipient traces of it along the Potomac. It is an infectious disease and we must all be on our guard against intolerance, bigotry, and the pretension of invidious distinction. But if we put our trust in the common sense of common men and "with malice toward none and charity for all" go forward on the great adventure of making political, economic, and social democracy a practical reality, we shall not fail.

A League of Sovereign Nations and Not a World State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "A League of Sovereign Nations and Not a World State," delivered by me on the Win-the-Peace Forum program at Youngstown, Ohio, April 15, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Ohioans, we debate tonight the policy which the United States is to pursue after the war in relation to other nations. While many other questions of foreign policy must be decided before we settle the form of an international organization, it is not too soon to debate this most important question which faces American statesmen after the war.

To decide this question intelligently, however, it is necessary to determine clearly in our minds what is the ultimate purpose of American foreign policy. Until that question is thought through, it is impossible to explain our past policy in time of peace, the reasons why we have gone to war, or the reasons for joining an organization of nations after the war.

The Revolutionary War was fought to secure the freedom of the people of the United States. The Constitution declares that the Government was established to "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." To me it is clear that the only purpose of American foreign policy is to insure freedom for the people of the United States by preventing invasion and threats of attack which might bring slavery to our people, and prevent their working out here at home the destiny of the American Republic.

The ultimate purpose of our foreign policy is not to bring peace into the world, but to secure our own freedom by preventing the rise of an aggressor who will cause another world war into which we may be drawn. World peace is a means to that end. We are interested in world peace because world war threatens our own security.

The ultimate purpose of our foreign policy is not to benefit other nations by spreading democracy or the "four freedoms" throughout the world. We desire to be good neighbors throughout the world. We are anxious to help other peoples, but only to the extent that this can be done without involving us in unnecessary war or endangering the future welfare of our own people. We did not enter the present war in order to crusade throughout the world for the Atlantic Charter. There is no intention on our part to insist on the freedom of India, or, apparently, even the freedom of the Baltic states, or eastern Poland. We are not fighting for democracy, except to protect our own. As a matter of fact, if we admit that a military crusade for an ideal, or a way of life, or a form of government, is justifiable against other nations for their supposed benefit, the world would be involved in perpetual turmoil.

We pursued a warlike course against Germany because our people were convinced, whether rightly or wrongly, that a German victory would threaten the peace and security of the United States. Our interest in the British Empire is not in maintaining the Empire, but because we feel that war between us is inconceivable, and the existence of Britain as a great sea power is a strong element in preventing any attack on this country from across the seas. Throughout our history our policy has been based on establishing and maintaining the freedom of every individual as guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, the freedom of our States, our cities, and our schools to manage their own local affairs, the freedom of our Nation to pursue those policies best designed to secure the liberty and happiness of our own people.

It is in the light of these purposes that we must examine the proposals for an international state, or a league of sovereign nations.

What is this federal world government which Mr. Nash proposes? It is a government to bear the same relation to existing nations which the Federal Government in Washington bears to the individual States. That is the parallel upon which Mr. Nash relies for every argument. There will be then a world government. At the head of that government will be a president, or a king, or a chairman of the council of people's commissars, or a generalissimo, according to the philosophy prevailing in the constitutional convention. In any event, he will be charged with the execution of the laws, and the command of the only army and navy which exists in the world.

There will be a legislature of one or two houses in which the American people may have perhaps 10 percent of the vote. That would be fairly liberal, since they only have 5 percent of the population of the world. This legislature would have power to make laws dealing with certain subjects. Presumably, they could regulate all international trade and prohibit tariffs, or perhaps sanction them if not forbidden as in our Constitution. This power would be the power of life or death over many American industries. Shipping would be controlled or might be internationalized and operated by the government. The same, of course, would be true of all aviation. Any one country which happened to be in a minority at the moment might be wholly deprived of opportunity to expand its industries or even use its shipping and air equipment.

The legislature would have power to levy taxes, and it is not inconceivable that, since the United States is the richest country in the world, the taxes might be so devised as to come almost entirely from this country. Coinage and money would be an international affair, and, together with the banks, would, of course, be subject to the control of the government. I don't know exactly what definition of interstate commerce might be written into the new constitution, but if we follow the American Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court, the legislature under its power to control foreign trade could make laws which practically controlled labor organizations and farm organizations as well as all processors and manufacturers, if the products extended in any degree into foreign commerce.

It is somewhat difficult to guess just what individual bill of rights would be written into the new constitution, but, whatever it might be, it would be construed by an international court. This court, of course, would be made up of representatives of many nations, most of which have a rudimentary idea of individual rights. Even the rather rough, treatment which the Bill of Rights has been receiving in this country would be mild compared to what might happen if individual rights were construed by a court of which a majority happened to be made up of Frenchmen, Russians, Chinese, and East Indians. In the modern world with the strong tendency to centralization of power and the regimented state, it is hard to see how we can protect either nation or individual against a centralized world state controlling the only police force permitted to exist in the world.

We may question how there can be in this world constitution, anything like the provision of our own Constitution, guaranteeing to every nation a republican form of government. Apparently, this would be impossible, for neither Russia, China, nor even Great Britain, has that form of government today. But was that guaranty an essential feature of the Union of the Thirteen Colonies?

This whole project appears to me to be fantastic, dangerous, and impractical for a number of reasons.

First. It would destroy the very purpose of our foreign policy, the freedom of the people of the United States. Our people could not be free under a government controlled by foreign peoples, many of whom do not understand what freedom means. The liberty for which we fought in 1776 has made this Nation the greatest power in the world. It has set an example of individual progress and improvement of standards of living unequaled by any other nation. That result has been due primarily to the fact that we have been a free and unfettered people. We are asked to scrap a tried plan, which up to this time has successfully maintained our liberty; a plan which has afforded to this country the very protection against invasion and interference which is the alleged purpose of all these international plans.

Our future freedom will depend entirely upon the manner in which the new government chooses to operate through its legislature and the executive. Unquestionably, the legislature will be controlled by a block of nations constituting a majority. We may be a member of that bloc, or we may belong to the minority. In the latter case there is no way in which we can prevent the rest of the world from dominating our industries, our trade, our currency, our agriculture, and levying taxes which fall upon us with the greatest severity. This is not liberty as Americans understand it.

Second. A world state could not be truly democratic. When we consider this question we see clearly that the analogy between a world state and the union of the Thirteen Colonies is completely false. Those colonies were made up of men of similar origin, similar methods of thought, similar ideals, and similar forms of government. They lived approximately the same kind of life, with similar standards of living. They all looked back to the English common law and a free parliament. Here we would be attempting to unite peoples who do not understand even how their new fellow citizens begin to think. We would join democracies with dictatorships, Moslem states with Christian states, the Brahman with the Rotarian, men who talk and think only Japanese with men who talk and think only English. We would attempt to unite the most highly civilized with the aborigines, the workman who earns $20 a day with the coolie who earns 20 cents a day.

Surely we would only join a world state if it were democratic, but such a huge conglomeration certainly would not remain democratic—if a state including dictatorships like Russia, China, Brazil, and Greece could ever have been considered democratic. True democracy depends upon effective access of the people to their central government. Sometimes I question whether the United States has not reached the limit of size, under which the people of the Nation can have a real voice in its government. Certainly a world government at Geneva or Panama would listen more closely to the voice of the world theorists and the world cranks and the world pressure groups, all camped on their doorsteps, than they ever would to the voice of the far-distant American people. Democracy depends on the freedom of local self-government. I have shown why that freedom would not exist in the United States, and even less, would it exist in many other nations throughout the world. It is significant that the British Empire, because of its size, has moved toward decentralization of government in order to insure freedom and democracy. It has today no over-all legislative body, no over-all executive, and no over-all police force. If Canada and Australia and New Zealand and South Africa and Eire are regarded as too diverse to be consolidated into one government, what about China, Japan, Russia, and Ethiopia?

Third. A world state would fall to pieces in 10 years. Even in the case of the Thirteen Colonies a difference in one matter, that of Negro slavery, brought about a war 75 years later which almost destroyed the Union. The differences of religion, philosophy, form of government, and economic resources in a world state would be a hundred times as disrupting as was slavery. The first time a majority attempts to impose its will upon a substantial minority it will be faced with revolution and war, the very dangers which we are seeking to avoid.

It is said that diverse peoples have been held together in single nations, but this is not substantially true. Except for Switzerland, the nations which have successfully amalgamated divergent peoples have had the problem of reconciling the views of only two different peoples, recognizing each other as equals. This is the case of Austro-Hungary, English and French Canada, and South Africa. The history of these states is a constant history of adjustment between the two divergent peoples and a constant threat of disruption. Furthermore the people united have lived close together and been forced to recognize common problems. Switzerland is a small state, historically a refuge from larger states, which cannot possibly be compared to a federation of the world. A world state would dissolve in a few years in World War No. 3 because it would be constantly interfering in the internal affairs of other nations.

Fourth. From the point of view of practical politics we are simply wasting our time to discuss a world state. No one is going to join it. The American people would reject it by an overwhelming majority. I don't believe our allies, England and Russia, would agree for a moment to submit themselves to an international state and have their seaports and airports run by an international bureaucrat. Remember that this would involve the scrapping of all national armament for an international police force, controlled by some international executive, selected by a body the control of which would rest in a combination of member nations impossible to predict. If you can see Winston Churchill liquidating the British Fleet, or Joe Stalin dismissing the Russian Army, or either of them turning over their forces to President Whoozis, of Worlditania, you are more clairvoyant than I.

This condition, of course, is recognized by the action of the various responsible parties and statesmen in this country. Secretary

Hull's speeches all point clearly away from an international state to a league of sovereign nations. The Mackinac declaration of foreign policy adopted by the Republican Party provides for "responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to attain permanent peace with organized justice in a free world." The Moscow Declaration of the four United Nations, as well as the Connally resolution, recognize "the necessity of their being established, at the earliest practicable date, a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states." Neither party would consider endorsing in its platform any plan for subjecting the sovereignty of this country to a world state.

In short, a world government in my opinion, would do far more harm than good. It would bring about war rather than prevent it, and would destroy in America the very freedom which is the purpose of our foreign policy.

I am further convinced that a military alliance with England, or with England and Russia, would inevitably produce a counter-alliance, which in the end would make war more likely. In effect it would destroy freedom throughout the rest of the world, and we could not destroy that freedom without in the end threatening that of the people of the United States.

I do believe that a league of sovereign nations agreeing upon a rule of law and order throughout the world has today a real chance of success. The fact that similar efforts have failed in the past, is by no means conclusive against another attempt. Its success depends upon proper organization, and upon a substantial majority of the nations of the world keeping their promises. If those promises are clearly understood, and subject to further definition by a court, I believe they will be performed. The utter destruction which would be produced by another war is so obvious to every people, that the determination to keep the peace will be overwhelming if it can be properly organized.

The first step in any league is to write an international law by which the sovereign nations shall agree to be governed. That law should prohibit any nation from making war without international sanction. It should provide a set of rules dealing with the relations between nations, and provide for the submission of all disputes involving such laws to an international court. It should provide for the submission of other disputes to arbitration. The nations should agree to abide by the decisions rendered.

Most of the argument of the theorists has been on the method by which this international law shall be enforced, but the first step is to determine what the law shall be, and with what international relations it shall deal. It must be written clearly, and in accord with principles generally accepted by civilized peoples. Force will never succeed unless it is backed up by the public opinion of the world, and it is only possible to mobilize that opinion behind a law or court decision which is clear and obviously just. In the case of the prohibition amendment we saw that even within a nation laws may be so unpopular or so incapable of enforcement as to bring about violence and lawbreaking.

If we attempt to prescribe laws dealing with the internal affairs of the member nations or others, I believe it is more likely to cause wars than to prevent them. Furthermore, we must not impose on any nation obligations which seem unreasonable to those people, or obligations which we ourselves are unwilling to assume, nor should we force them to take part in disputes where they cannot see any interest whatsoever.

I suggest, therefore, that the permanent law which we write deal only with the action of nations outside of their territorial boundaries, with one exception as to limitation of armament. Temporary internal restraints may have to be imposed upon the Axis nations, but it should be understood that the time will come when they will be removed. I would prefer to build the association on the old League of Nations, although the covenant will require such extensive revisions that it may be simpler as an administrative matter to begin over again. There should be subordinate organizations, such as a council of Europe, a council of America, and a council of the Far East, with courts to consider the questions which involve those areas alone. Special laws may be written, applicable to any given area, but not applicable throughout the world. When the law has been defined, I believe all nations should enter into an obligation to join, and use economic sanctions and force if necessary, to prevent law violation which is defined as aggression and found to be aggression by an international court or council.

This is the respect in which we are asked to depart from our traditional policy. We will no longer have a free hand because we will have agreed to make war under circumstances found to exist by an international body in which we do not have a majority voice. I see no infringement of sovereignty in undertaking that obligation. However, I think the obligation should be carefully defined. The types of law violation constituting aggression should be clear and definite, and the method of finding the action of any nation to be aggression should be equally clear. I do not believe a nation in one area should be called upon to furnish forces to prevent aggression in another area until the nations of that area have made every effort to settle their own problems. We certainly should not go into Europe unless we are invited to do so by a substantial majority of the people of that continent, who have shown their willingness to cooperate with us when we do so. Otherwise we will not only make ourselves exceedingly unpopular, but we shall probably fail in our objective.

Under the regional plan, our forces could be compared to a suburban fire department, called in only on a three-alarm fire. It would be necessary for us to maintain an Army, Navy, and Air Force specially trained for operations in all parts of the world. I believe such a force need not be extraordinarily large or expensive, probably no greater than the American people will insist on maintaining in any event after the war. It will require no conscription. If adequate pay is given the men, it should be an attractive profession.

I would be inclined to oppose an international police force. If such a force were large enough to overcome the forces of every other nation, it would subject the entire world to the rule of some international body, and would have the same dangers as an international state. Someone would have to be chief of police, and the executive or council which directed him, or he himself, would rule the world. If the force were a small one, merely designed to interfere with small nations, it would still be controlled predominantly by one or two powerful nations, and would always be a threat to the freedom of all smaller nations.

It would be necessary to prescribe a definite limitation of armaments for each nation, and the covenants between them must provide that they shall not exceed this limitation, and must permit inspection by the council to determine from time to time whether they are complying with their covenant. A violation of this covenant would be defined as aggression. In this one field of arms limitation it seems to me necessary for the league to interfere with action going on within the boundaries of individual nations, for I see no other way in which to prevent the competitive growth of armaments, which would certainly destroy the hope of peace.

Can such an organization as I have described succeed? Frankly, no one can be certain. Every detail must be worked out to eliminate as much friction as possible. The machinery must operate smoothly without offense to the reasonable desire of all peoples to be free and determine their own future. A league is not likely to succeed if it contains in its basic law, or in the structure of nations on which it is built, any fundamental wrong. It is not likely to succeed if peoples earnestly desiring freedom are subjected to the arbitrary rule of other nations. It is not likely to succeed unless economic arrangements are made so that every nation shall have means available to obtain necessary raw materials and pay for them.

There has been too much emphasis on the question whether we are willing to agree to use force, and too little on the basic nature of the league and the law which it is attempting to impose upon the world. There should be no rushing into a new organization. Plenty of time ought to be taken after hostilities cease, to build up the foundations of peace before we attempt to place upon them a permanent structure. If we finally complete a league of nations 2 years after the end of the war, there will be more chance of success than if we rush into it the day after the armistice under the pressure of some emotional propaganda.

No peace organization will be a success unless the people of this country, including the men who have served abroad, are persuaded in their hearts that the organization is necessary and appropriate to maintain future freedom and peace. Those who try to force the people into an organization now, on the theory that later they may not be so agreeable to the idea, endanger the success of the whole project. I am confident that the people can be permanently persuaded. I am determined that some such effort as I have outlined shall be made.

First Things Should Be Done First

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COSTELLO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of the Members of the House the radio address which was delivered by Mr. Millard W. Rice, who is the national service director of the Disabled American Veterans, on Tuesday, April 11, 1944, over station WWDC in Washington.

Mr. Rice has definitely called attention to the real problem concerning veterans' legislation, namely, the need for adequate compensation to those who are disabled during the period of their war service. The able-bodied veteran who returns to this country from his war service does not have the demand upon the Government for aid and assistance which the disabled veteran definitely has. In considering the present legislation before the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee, I trust that the entire question of veterans legislation will be carefully weighed before reporting any particular bill. We cannot afford to be lavish in gifts to the able-bodied and subsequently find that we must curtail our discharge of the obligations to the disabled.

In order to emphasize this problem, I am happy to present to my colleagues the speech of Mr. Rice in this regard.

I am delighted that I have this opportunity to tell the radio audience something about the Disabled American Veterans, its service activities, and its interest in various pending legislative bills, for I am sure that your audience includes many fathers and mothers and wives of those now serving in the armed forces, many war veterans, and many service disabled veterans, and their dependents.

Every American citizen is surely interested in, and will inevitably be affected by, whatever Congress may decide to do in providing post-war adjustments for America's veterans.

Incidentally, may I state that the Disabled American Veterans is a congressionally chartered organization, formed back in 1920 to render service to, for, and by America's disabled war veterans. The D. A. V., speaking alphabetically, is the most exclusive of the major veteran organizations, for it will grant membership only to those American citizens who have been wounded, gassed, injured, or disabled by reason of active service in the armed forces during time of war. Its members, therefore, include wounded and disabled veterans ranging from the Civil War through the Spanish American War and World War No. 1, up to and including an increasing number of disabled dischargees from World War No. 2.

Although the D. A. V. is naturally the smallest in membership of the three major veteran organizations, it has the largest staff of nationally paid national service officers, located in most of the 52 regional offices of the Veterans' Administration. These full-time national service officers, together with the part-time and volunteer service officers of our some 900 local chapters, specialize in assisting deserving disabled veterans as to how to comply with governmental technicalities in establishing legal entitlement to benefits to which they may be equitably entitled from the Veterans' Administration or from some other governmental agency. They also counsel and assist disabled veterans to locate suitable, gainful, useful employment.

Being composed exclusively of American war-disabled veterans, the D. A. V. specializes in their problems. It is especially interested in protecting and promoting their welfare.

Americans generally have complacently assumed that America's disabled veterans and their dependents are being adequately cared for by the Government. Such an assumption is definitely not in accordance with the facts.

Many legislative corrections and liberalizations are still needed to eliminate the many existing inadequacies, inequities, and inequalities as to the Nation's service disabled and their dependents and for the dependents of those who have died while serving in the armed forces or because of having so served—too numerous for me here to explain.

I shall cite only a few examples of what I mean. Most Americans do not realize that their Federal Government has, in effect, been discouraging its disabled veterans from getting married and, after marriage, from having children. Rather ironic, is it not, that those who have sacrificed their youth, their joy of living, and their health, by reason of active service in the armed forces of the country in fighting to preserve our American way of living should thereby have lost the opportunity to pursue happiness and to live according to American standards? That's definitely what does happen as to those who become totally disabled, and therefore unemployable, by reason of wounds, injuries, or ailments incurred by serving in the armed forces.

If a veteran of this war becomes so disabled as to become unemployable, then he may be awarded a total rating, in which event he would be entitled to a pension of $100 per month but with no dependency allowances whatsoever. To cure this, the D. A. V. has sponsored the introduction of companion bills in the Congress, S. 1733, on the Senate side, by Senator BENNETT CHAMP CLARK, and H. R. 4280, on the House side, by Representative JOHN E. RANKIN, whereby America's disabled veterans would be entitled to the same dependency allowances as Canada has long provided for its service-connected disabled veterans.

Even though its cost of living is considerably less than in this country, Canada provides higher rates of pension for the widows and orphans of men who have been killed in action or who have died by reason of service-incurred disabilities than does our own rich country. Bills to increase our rates are still resting in congressional committees.

Since 1921 Canada has reimbursed its Provinces for payments made, on the basis of the operation of their workmen's compensation acts, to service-connected disabled veterans, or, in the event of their death, to their next of kin.

The D. A. V. has insisted that the natural fear, on the part of employers, that they might increase their State workmen's compensation costs, by their employment of disabled veterans, should be removed by requiring the Veterans' Administration to reimburse all such costs as to all service-connected disabled veteran employees, or, in the event of their death, to their next of kin. H. R. 2950 to accomplish this is still reposing before the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

The D. A. V. has been insisting that the present rates of compensation and pension to disabled veterans should be increased, in part, to meet the substantial increase in the cost of living. Precedents were established nearly 2 years ago by authorizing time-and-a-half pay for overtime work for governmental employees, and for unionized labor.

Disabled veterans, however, who, because of their disabilities, are unable to secure employment, and therefore have no other source of income than their pension payments, have been unable to relieve the situation as to themselves and their dependents. Their only recourse has been to reduce their standard of living. Partial increases to meet the increased cost of living would be provided for by the enactment of H. R. 3356 and H. R. 3377, which, after passing the House of Representatives without objection last November, have been left in the files of the Senate Committee on Finance without any action so far.

Many more deficiencies as to America's provisions for its disabled veterans, and their dependents, could also be cited, but these are enough to indicate that those who have served and sacrificed a part of their bodies or health, have good reason, in many instances, to become disappointed, disgusted, and disillusioned.

Bills to provide badly needed benefits for war-disabled veterans and their dependents have, in effect, been shoved to one side to give the right-of-way, in response to the pressure of numbers, to the so-called G. I. bill of rights.

The continued existence of these situations is particularly distressing when one notes the undue haste with which consideration and action has been given to the so-called G. I. bill of rights, designed to provide post-war education, unemployment compensation benefits, and $1,000 loans to buy or improve a farm or a home or a business, under certain conditions, primarily to benefit able-bodied veterans. As a matter of fact, very little would thereby be provided for service-disabled veterans, and their dependents, which is not already available to them under existing laws or Executive orders.

In view of the existing manpower shortage, there are no such emergency needs as to discharged able-bodied veterans as necessitate the speedy enactment of such proposed legislation, without all of its implications and possible after-effects, being first carefully considered in connection with other proposals for post-war adjustments for veterans. Surely, while Congress is considering this very important question, it should consider all proposals to provide for the post-war needs of veterans of this war, and then adopt the best method, rather than the proposals behind which the best advance "pressure of numbers" campaign may have been organized.

We, of the D. A. V., are very apprehensive about the probable after-effects, if the so-called G. I. bill of rights should be enacted into law, "as is." It proposes that such new types of benefits, primarily for able-bodied veterans, should be made the responsibility of the Veterans' Administration, which, heretofore, has been regarded as the Federal agency primarily to take care of the responsibilities of the Nation's disabled, and which, in our opinion, should continue to specialize in their problems.

The Veterans' Administration ought not to be converted into an administrative monstrosity by overloading it with new types of benefits for which its officials have had no adequate background of experience. Its facilities and personnel are already being taxed to take care of the fast expanding problems of disabled veterans and their dependents, and of the widows and orphans of those who will be with us no more.

If the Veterans Administration is also to be required to administer complicated laws for able-bodied veterans, then we of the Disabled American Veterans fear that the even tougher problems of disabled veterans and their dependents will get less attention than they deserve. Moreover we do not think it fair that the appropriations of the Veterans' Administration should be further increased to provide benefits primarily for able-bodied veterans, thus aggravating the false impression of the public that adequate governmental provisions have been made for the Nation's disabled and their dependents.

The D. A. V. is in favor of adequate post-war adjustments for able-bodied veterans, but not by any method which unnecessarily jeopardizes existing and badly needed proposed legislation for war-disabled veterans and their dependents. Post-war adjustments as to able-bodied veterans should be assigned to governmental agencies other than the Veterans' Administration.

The economy of America should not be divided up between veterans and nonveterans.

Post-war education for able-bodied veterans should come under the United States Office of Education or delegated directly to State governments. Unemployment compensation should come under the Social Security Board, or more directly under the several State boards of unemployment compensation. Loans for agricultural purposes should come under the Department of Agriculture, for business purposes under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or the Department of Commerce, and for homes under the Federal Housing Administration.

It is very doubtful that the unemployment compensation benefits for unemployed veterans—at much higher rates than provided for in most States—as proposed in the so-called G. I. bill of rights, would, in the final analysis, prove beneficial to veterans. Such higher Federal rates of unemployment compensation would actually encourage employers to employ nonveterans, so that the higher unemployment compensation benefits thus to be available to veterans would then come into the community.

These higher Federal rates of unemployment compensation to unemployed veterans will probably also cause many difficulties as to various segments of our population. The veterans, too, will not understand when, under the technical provisions of this bill, their Federal benefits are discontinued, probably then giving rise to further demands for additional legislation to straighten out the inequalities that would thereby arise.

A much better method of providing postwar adjustments would be to give every dischargee an adjusted-service certificate or bond, the amount of which would be computed on the basis of length and place of service, on an earned-rights basis, to be redeemable in installments, when needed, during unemployment, or while attending school, or, in larger amounts, to improve or buy a home, farm, or business, thus accomplishing the same objectives in a much more equitable way, and, in the final analysis, by a less costly method, without any interference with State standards or State rights.

An adjusted service-pay method would not require any vast Federal bureaucracy, and, best of all, would not interfere with existing and proposed benefits for disabled veterans. Moreover, such adjusted-service pay would also go to wounded and disabled veterans, whereas the G. I. bill of rights would grant its benefits only primarily to those able-bodied veterans who might be smart enough or "chisely" enough, or "needy" enough, to insist upon them.

If this so-called G. I. bill of rights is enacted into law as is, I prophesy that it would, sooner or later, engender many misunderstandings and much bitterness, and would eventually arouse a demand for another economy act, which would then prove harmful to disabled veterans.

Congress should give very careful consideration to all of the various proposals for postwar adjustments, before deciding upon any method. First of all, however, Congress ought to meet the crying need of those who have earned the first concern of the Nation—its war disabled and their dependents, and the widows and orphans of those who have sacrificed their lives.

First things should be done first.

Jefferson Day Dinner Address by Robert E. Hannegan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an excellent address delivered by the Honorable Robert E. Hannegan, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, at the Jefferson Day dinner held at the Book-Cadillac Hotel, Detroit, Mich., on Thursday, April 13, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On this day I like to think of a mighty spirit looking down upon the struggle in which our country is engaged, recognizing the objectives that are at stake, and then going its way peacefully back into eternity, content that the heritage of man's freedom is entrusted into good hands, is being ably defended, and is certain to endure.

That spirit is Thomas Jefferson, who was born on this day 201 years ago.

If Jefferson were to walk among us now, I do not think he would be surprised that we must still fight, that the blood of Americans must still be shed for the principles of liberty and democracy that were given to the world in 1776 by him and his little band of fellow-statemen. Those principles are not cheaply won. Neither are they cheaply saved.

I think it is quite natural to envisage the spirit of Jefferson walking among us today. For in that which he said and did there is ingrained the quality of timelessness. He wears immortality not as a mantle thrown over him out of the memories of other men, but as a garment fashioned by his own hand, spun out of the raw fabric of a great Nation, and woven to withstand the centuries. His is a living greatness that confuses and confounds the lesser in spirit, a quality that does not lend itself well to those who traffic in empty platitudes.

For example, those who today are crying aloud in agonized tones about a "government of men" as opposed to a "government of laws" cannot look for much comfort in the authority of Thomas Jefferson, greatest lawgiver in our history. For, said Jefferson, and I quote:

"Strict observance of the written laws doubtless is one of the high duties of a good citizen, but it is not the highest. The laws of necessity, of self-preservation, of saving our country when in danger, are of a higher obligation."

That counsel has held good in every great crisis, every great war, which our country has fought. It holds good in this time of crisis, in this mighty struggle of World War No. 2.

When the time comes for writing the history of World War No. 2, I would like to be there, looking over the historian's shoulder. And when he makes out his list of the wrong guesses of Adolf Hitler, I would like to check it over and see that all the grade A, class I wrong guesses are down on that list.

First, I think, among these wrong guesses, would be the toughness of democracy as a people's and a nation's way of life—the toughness of our own American democracy.

I would put that down as wrong guess No. one because the paperhanger of Austria never got further out on the bias in all his career than he did with this one.

As wrong guess No. 2 I would have the historian of this war set down the ability of the peace-loving peoples of the world to join hands—and keep hands joined—against the aggressor.

I think we have it well depicted right here at home, in the unity of the people of the United States. Of course, we have our political differences. There is a rumor afloat that one of them is going to be ironed out again next November; and something more than a rumor that it is going to be settled in much the same way, partywise, that it was 4 years ago. Only more so.

But we in America have never differed about the ultimate fate of Corporal Hitler. There is no argument among us about what will happen to the Japs. Even the isolationists who talk of a negotiated peace do not like Hitler or his allies. They would as soon see him dead. On that score the only difference is on the timing and the cause. We Democrats are united in our preference to end the Fuehrer's career with something more appropriate, by some cause which he better deserves, than old age.

Third in magnitude of Hitler's wrong guesses concerns the leadership of this Nation, the foresight that kept us out of any fatal attempt to appease the aggressor and that armed us in time so that rather than being forced to do business with Hitler, on his terms, we retained our prerogative to do battle with Hitler, on our own terms.

Outstanding in that leadership is the record of one man—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

How very wrong the German Fuehrer was about this man. How sadly misinformed. And how heavily that mistake has cost him.

Wrong guess No. 4 of the Berlin Government may be symbolized, it seems to me, by the city of Coventry, in England. You all know what happened there, and you also know what the people of Coventry refused to let happen there.

As the symbol of wrong guess No. 5, I give you the city of Stalingrad, in Russia.

As the symbol of wrong guess No. 6, the city of Chungking, in China.

And as the symbol of wrong guess No. 7—and as something more than a symbol, for already, to many thousands of Germans and Japs it has spelled death and destruction in letters of cold steel, I give you the city of Detroit in the United States of America.

Yes; the paperhanger of Austria was looking at the wrong blueprints when he dreamed of gumming up the works in Detroit.

He knew we had vast manufacturing industries here. He knew we had brilliant technicians, men of science who have pointed the way for the whole world to follow. He knew we had management that could operate those plants with an efficiency that other nations had studied for years. And he knew, too, that we had labor here, hundreds of thousands of skilled workers, with other thousands who could be brought in from many parts of the country.

What Hitler did not know, what his advisers could not get through their heads, was the fact that under a free democratic system all these resources—plant, technique, management, and labor—could be brought together, almost overnight, at the call and under the direction of a democratic administration, and swung over from the making of automobiles and refrigerators into the greatest machine for producing the tools of war this world has ever known.

What he did not know was that shipments out of your city in time of peace could be doubled and redoubled for war, that from turning out $4,000,000,000 worth of the manufactures of peace in 1939, Detroit could reach the staggering figure of $12,000,000,000 worth of the manufactures of war in 1943.

That is where Adolf Hitler miscalculated on Detroit. That is where the ideas in Hermann Goering's head got in the way of the gray matter. That is where Joseph Goebbels found out that you don't wipe freedom off the earth merely by burning up the books about it.

Well, what is the point they missed about Detroit? Principally, I would say, in one great word—labor. American labor, labor that has won the right to organize, the right of collective bargaining, the right to speak its mind, the right to worship its God, the right to vote leadership into office that will keep it free from want and free from fear.

You see, in Nazi Germany, and over in Japan, they don't have that kind of labor. Their workers are not held in the public respect that American labor has long enjoyed. Their common people, their workers and fighters, have none of the rights that American labor has gained in the 12 years since our last Republican President called out the troops to break up a bonus march.

So the Nazis and the Japs figured that labor with such rights as we have here would not deliver. And if a nation's labor did not deliver, that nation was licked. War, as the rulers of those two countries saw it, was a business of holding a gun at your enemy's people and a whip over your own. Instead of the lash, this Democratic administration gave our workers the Wagner Labor Relations Act, the Wage and Hour Act, and many other legal rights of labor that became the law of this land under the leadership of Franklin D Roosevelt.

And American labor did deliver. It delivered on a magnificent scale. And it is delivering today.

We know that from time to time there have been difficulties. There have been some strikes. Those strikes made headlines, and they also served as ammunition for labor-baiters, some of whom have placed a higher value on the opportunity to make political capital for themselves than on the unity that exists among the great majority of our people.

Strikes in time of war are serious. But if we are reviewing the loyalty of American labor, then let us review the whole picture, and let us review these strikes against that true picture, against the record of labor as a whole.

When we do that we find that man-hours lost on account of strikes, taken altogether, are an almost infinitesimal fraction of the total of man-hours worked in war industries. The Truman committee of the United States Senate, for example, reported recently that strikes in mining, manufacturing, and construction in the year 1943 resulted in a loss of manpower of less than one-fourth of 1 percent of the manpower actually used. In that same year—1943—the total manpower contributed by labor exceeded that which was used in 1939 by 76 percent.

Those who have tried to distort this magnificent record remind me of the man who was attending a lecture on astronomy. The speaker made the statement that the sun was gradually losing its heat, and that this would mean the end of the world inside of 300,000,000,000 years.

The gentleman in the audience fainted. When they brought him to and asked him what was the trouble he said he was terribly frightened. This business of the world coming to an end—why, it was terrifying. But, they told him, that was to be in 300,000,000,000 years.

"Oh!" he said, letting out a big sigh of relief. "I thought he said 3,000,000,000 years."

Well, now that American-made bombs from American-made planes are exploding right in der Fuehrer's face, now that American-made shells from American-made guns are ripping the heart out of the German armies on the Russian front, Hitler and Tojo realize—too late—that defeating America was not quite so simple. They did not know America. They did not know Detroit. And they did not know the loyalty of labor.

They must write off that mistake to a lack of experience.

Lack of experience is a dangerous thing in any government. It can lose a war. And it can lose a peace.

But we, too, in America have some people, some would-be leaders, who also lack experience. The difference over here—for which we may all thank God—is that they have not been at the head of our Government.

Now, to lack experience is not a crime. Of itself, it is not even a mistake, nor an accusation that may be fairly held against a man. Experience takes time, and to profit by experience takes a special ability—the kind of ability that makes a statesman.

It is no reflection on a man to admit that he is not a great statesman. It is no very harsh criticism of a man to point out that he does not qualify for the office of President of the United States.

Quite the contrary, if he has little or nothing in his record to show that he has had either the time in which to gain experience or the ability to turn that experience into statesmanship, then I would not blame such a man for keeping silent on those great questions that are distinctly in the realm of statesmanship, those issues of today on which the future of our people and our country depends in this period of world crisis.

Of course, when such a man is offered to us in all seriousness by a political party as the best that party can produce for the Presidency of the United States, that is another matter. Then a question at once arises.

It is the same question that I once heard an old trapper ask when he was offered a rather doubtful-looking dog in return for cash money. The owner of the dog said he was full grown and in his prime, and he hadn't learned much yet, but there was still a chance that he might turn out to be a fine hunting dog. It wouldn't surprise him if that dog could learn to outpoint, outrun, and outhunt any other dog in the whole State of Michigan. He might even turn out to be a champion. In that case he would be worth many times the price. There was a chance that he might. You couldn't tell, and certainly there was nothing about the dog to prove that he couldn't do it. But after a great deal more of this kind of enthusiasm about what the dog might do, and what it wouldn't surprise the owner if he did do, the old trapper turned to him and asked "Well, do he or don't he?"

Now, when the Republican Party works up a similar enthusiasm over the things a candidate might do to win the war and win the peace, the people of America may well borrow the simple query of that Michigan trapper: "Do he or don't he?"

Of course, when our people want to know whether the Republican Party's candidate is going to offer this Nation its chance to help in realizing the hope of all humanity—the hope of finally joining hands with other nations to rule out future aggressions and future wars—it may be a little embarrassing to be confronted with that same question, "Do he or don't he?"

And, of course, at a time like this, when the workers of America are thinking about the jobs they hold in a war economy, and about the future of those jobs in a post-war economy, when they are wondering whether the Republican Party's candidate will be as determined and as able to protect those jobs as the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt, then the same old question arises, "Do he or don't he?"

Oh, yes, the Republican candidate will tell you he wants you and your family to be secure after this war. He will assure you that he knows the way to keep you safe. Well, do he or don't he?

The last Republican administration we had in this country did not know of a way to keep our people safe. And the Republican Party has recently expressed itself once more in a very significant manner when, a few days ago, in Wisconsin it struck off the last half-hearted pretense of progressive principle from its political future.

By that act the Republican Party showed its hand. It showed that it wants to go back, back to the closed-bank credo of Herbert Hoover. It wants you, American labor, to announce today, in advance, your unconditional surrender to whatever the wheel of chance or the whim of vested economic interest may bring in the critical times to come. Yes, the Republican Party seems to be homesick for Hooverville.

Oh, you will hear much vague promising about the work you would get, the security your family would have after this war, if a Republican candidate were to be elected. You will hear much about what that candidate hopes to do for you. But you will not hear much in direct answer if you happen to ask now, "Do he or don't he?"

From that party you will also hear many complaints while you yourself go on working in a job and helping your country to win this war.

From that party you will hear whispers that there must be something wrong with this picture of your earnings, which averaged $21.23 a week here in Detroit when the Republicans were in power—and when you had a job at all—and today averages $56.94 a week.

You will hear vague warnings that there must be something wrong with free enterprise when your wages get that high. Republican rumors buzz about your ears today, and the woods are full of them. But let me ask you, ladies and gentlemen, who is sawing the wood?

Are you interested in knowing what the Republican Party's ideas about your employment after this war really are—as expressed by a certain group which may be in a position to dictate the economic policy of that party?

Then let me tell you now of the kind of language some are using when they talk to you of your job and your future. They have a little phrase, this group, only four words long, but to you—to the working people of America—that phrase speaks volumes. They are talking of a "normal backlog of unemployment."

Now, just consider that a moment. Let it percolate. A normal backlog of unemployment. And if that isn't quite clear, let me add another statement of this same group: "Full employment would be incompatible with the free-enterprise system which carries with it the right to a normal float of unemployed."

The right? Whose right? Is that the right of the employing interest to keep you out of your job? What is a "normal float" of unemployed? Is your life normal, is the lot of your children normal, when you have no job, when you happen to be one of those who make up this "normal float of unemployed"?

Well, such is normalcy—the old normalcy for which the Republican Party has developed a bad case of homesickness. That is what the leaders of that party have in mind for you when this war is finished.

That is the untold story behind the scenes. That is the idea of free enterprise which the Republican Party pledges itself to bring back to this country.

And so, when you hear the promises which that party's candidates will make to American labor between now and November, when you hear the Republican nominee for President tell you what he can do to keep your job safe, and what he wants to do, and what he believes in doing, remember that old question, "Do he or don't he?"

The Lawyer and the Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject The Lawyer and the Peace, by G. L. DeLacy, president of the Nebraska Bar Association, delivered at the Lincoln Bar Association dinner, held at Lincoln, Nebr., on March 27, 1944. The manuscript slightly exceeds the limit with respect to matters to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. I have received from the Public Printer an estimate that the printing of the address will require three and one-fifth pages of the RECORD, at a cost of $144.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On August 21, 1789, President Washington informed the Senate that on the following day he would meet to advise with them regarding the negotiation of a treaty with the Cherokee Indians.

Article II of the Constitution of the United States provides that the President shall have power, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

It will be noted that the Constitution uses the words, "with the advice and consent of the Senate." President Washington attended the Senate and was given the chair of John Adams, the Vice President. He expected the Senate to debate the treaty, while he answered questions and explained his views, and either accept or reject it. Robert Morris, however, moved that the question of the treaty be referred to a committee. Washington rose and angrily said:

"This defeats every purpose of my coming here." An embarrassing pause ensued and then President Washington left.

William H. Crawford, in relating the incident many years later, said that after his cool reception by the Senate, Washington declared that he would be damned if he ever went there again. This ended the attempts of the Executive to advise with the Senators as a body in an attempt to consummate treaties.

From time immemorial treaties have had rough sailing in the Senate. John Hay, America's most brilliant Secretary of State, is purported to have said:

"A treaty entering the Senate is like a bull going into the arena. No one can say just how or when the final blow will fall, but one thing is certain, it will never leave the arena alive."

As can be seen, under the Constitution the House of Representatives has no vote on the question of whether a treaty should be adopted. The ratification of a treaty is reposed in the Senate, the requirement being a concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present. It is extremely rare for a treaty to be approved by a two-thirds majority consisting entirely of the President's party.

Generally, the opposing party occupies more than one-third of the seats in the Senate. Likewise, as politicians, many Senators find that they have more to gain by embarrassing the President than by considering the interests of the people. In speaking on this point, Secretary of State Hay said:

"The fact that a treaty gives to this country a great and lasting advantage seems to weigh nothing whatever in the minds of about half the Senators, personal interests, personal spites, and a contingent chance of a petty political advantage are the only motives that cut any ice at present."

Our history records from the very beginning constant strife between the Executive and the Senate, growing out of the consideration of treaties. In 1824, a treaty negotiated with Great Britain for the suppression of the slave trade, although ratified by the Senate, was so amended that it resulted in the British Government justifiably refusing to accept the amendments and the treaty was abandoned. This treaty was negotiated by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State. He was likewise a candidate for the Presidency. The opposition of the Senators seemed to be dictated entirely by partisanship and politics.

In 1844, a treaty was negotiated by John C. Calhoun, Secretary of State, which provided for the almost inevitable union of Texas with the United States. As it turned out afterward, the treaty had the support of a large majority of the people. Its discussion arose during a Presidential campaign, and the treaty was rejected by a vote of 16 to 35. Later on, President Tyler deliberately circumvented the Senate by proposing to annex Texas, by a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress. In the House, the resolution was carried by a vote of 132 to 76. In the Senate the resolution carried by a bare majority of 27 to 25, a plurality of 2 votes, rather than two-thirds. If you now believe that it was a good thing to admit Texas to our Union, you are invited to ponder this history.

In 1897 President McKinley submitted to the Senate a treaty with the Republic of Hawaii, providing for annexation. Once again, a two-thirds majority in favor of the treaty could not be mustered in the Senate. Democrats opposed the treaty as a Rpublican measure, and a few isolationist Republicans stood with them. Again the Senate was circumvented by a joint resolution providing for the annexation of Hawaii. If you now feel grateful for our great stronghold of Pearl Harbor, without which the west coast might have been bombed, you are invited to ponder this history.

In 1904 and 1905 Secretary of State Hay had negotiated a series of arbitration treaties with France, Switzerland, Germany, Portugal, Britain, Spain, Austria-Hungary, Mexico, Norway, and Sweden. In these treaties all questions of vital interest, independence, and national honor were exempted from arbitration. The Senate, however, was so hostile that President Theodore Roosevelt finally withdrew the arbitration treaties, saying:

"The individual Senators evidently consider the prerogative of the Senate as far more important than the welfare of the country."

For years public opinion demanded American entry into a world court. Presidents Harding and Coolidge urged this step. In 1925 the House of Representatives supported the proposal by a vote of 302 to 28. In 1926 the Senate accepted the protocol, but with certain amendments. The other 57 signatory powers of the protocol demurred. A compromise was originated and proposed by Elihu Root, conceding almost every demand of the Senate, but the Senate rejected it. The world court died aborning.

It is thus apparent that from the very beginning of the Nation, a minority in the Senate has been able to thwart the wishes of the majority in most instances, and an examination of the historical background surrounding these occasions indicates invariably that party politics and the pleasure of embarrassing the President motivated a sufficient number of Senators, rather than the consideration of the interests of the Nation.

President Woodrow Wilson spoke of what he termed the "treaty-marring powers of the Senate."

Attorney General Wickersham, in the Taft Cabinet, said:

"A body of 96 men of such diverse characteristics and opinions as compose the Senate is almost hopeless as an executive force, and it is ideal for the purposes of obstruction."

John W. Davis, a one-time candidate for the Presidency, said in an address to the American Bar Association:

"It did not contribute to national influence or prestige or safety that the processes of ratifying or rejecting treaties should degenerate to an effort to discover some qualified formula acceptable to a minority."

There are at the present time 96 Members of the Senate, representing 48 States. New York, having a population of 13,479,000 plus, is represented by 43 Representatives and 2 Senators. Nevada, with a population of only 110,000, is represented by 1 Representative and 2 Senators. The negative vote of 1 Senator from Nevada, representing only 110,247 people, carries as much weight, when voting on treaties, as the affirmative vote of the 2 Senators from New York, representing 13,000,000 plus.

If 2 Senators from Pennsylvania, representing 9,900,000 people, approve a treaty, while the second Senator from Nevada opposes it, the 2 Nevada votes cancel out the 4 votes of New York and Pennsylvania. In other words, the will of 110,247 persons, as represented by 2 Senators, successfully overrides the will of 23,279,322. If the votes of the Senators of 17 States are sufficient to wreck a treaty, and if all the votes should come from the smaller States, the Senators representing 10,000,000 people plus would be able to block the will of more than 121,000,000 who live in the larger 31 States. In other words, it has been figured out that one-twelfth of the American people can prevent eleven-twelfths of the American people from following a course of action in foreign relations.

It is thus apparent that in the making of treaties the will of the majority of the people of this country can be thwarted by a minority—and that by a small minority.

I have laid this historical background as a basis for a discussion of the League of Nations fiasco which occurred after World War No. 1, and for a discussion of what we may expect from the Senate when the time comes to write a treaty following the present war.

With your permission, therefore, I shall, at this time proceed to give you one man's views and ideas on certain subjects which I believe pertinent.

We are living during the greatest military crisis since Napoleon. We are living during the greatest economic crisis since Adam Smith. We are living during the greatest social crisis since the fall of the Roman Empire.

It is apparent that there must have been a profound fault in the economic, social, and political structure of the world to have caused this crisis, and that such fault cannot be eradicated unless we remove, in part, old attitudes, old notions and old valuations.

You will remember that World War No. 1 was fought to make the world safe for democracy. The defeat of the world's aspirations in this regard, after that war, resulted in sordid materialism, a skepticism and sense of frustration which always result when human ideals are thwarted, because they are not implemented with appropriate action.

You will remember that your country entered into this First World War with great reluctance; that President Wilson exercised the greatest patience and forbearance toward the Central Powers, but the same arrogance on the part of the same German military machine which ordered the invasion of Belgium and thus forced in Great Britain, also, by ruthless disregard of our country's rights, compelled action on our part.

Your country was not actuated by selfish motives; it coveted no nation's power or territory.

Then we were led by a great idealist and a great humanitarian, who had compassion for the small nations of this world. President Wilson saw the youth of the world sacrificed to the god of war and believed and hoped that some plan might be evolved which would prevent such holocausts in the future. With only the loftiest motives, he took part in evolving a League of Nations.

But even from the beginning it appeared that the time was not ripe for such a league. While the President was in France, 39 Members of the Senate signed a round robin, saying that they would have no League of Nations. When the proposed treaty with the Central Powers, which included the League of Nations, was presented to the Senate for a two-thirds ratification, the objecting Senators were able to prevent its adoption by 7 votes. The League was supported by ex-President Taft, Charles E. Hughes, Elihu Root, President Lowell, and ex-President Eliot, of Harvard, and many other high-ranking members of the opposite political party.

There was a long and bitter debate. The League became a political issue. The President determined to make an appeal to the people. This necessitated a coast-to-coast tour. Because of his extreme physical condition he was advised to refrain from so arduous a task, but brushing aside those objecting, said:

"I know I am at the end of my tether, but the trip is necessary to save the treaty. No decent man can count his own personal fortune."

Day after day the President carried on, making speeches throughout the land, until his ultimate collapse. His adversaries in the Senate likewise journeyed across the country and appeared and spoke in the same cities, following his appearance, making savage attacks upon him and violently opposing the ratification of the proposed treaty.

At Pueblo the President broke into tears while delivering an address, to so slender a store of nervous stamina had he come. That night he became seriously ill; one side of his face had fallen; his left arm and leg refused to function.

His secretary, Mr. Tumulty, proposed canceling the trip. Pleadingly, the President said:

"Don't you see, if you cancel this trip Senator Lodge and his friends will say I am a quitter, and that the western trip was a failure, and the treaty will be lost?"

However, it was necessary to cancel the trip.

The Covenant was eventually beaten by seven votes, and the United States did not become a member of it. Without this country's support the League was ineffective.

Thus, in my judgment, passed a great opportunity. It may be that the time was not propitious. It may be that the world was not ready for it.

But, however that may be, in my judgment, narrow and short-sighted attitudes prevented this Nation for attempting, at least, to get together with other nations and to work together for the prevention of these cruel wars.

Mark Sullivan, in his work entitled "Our Times," very vividly portrays the last months of Mr. Wilson's administration. He was very ill and confined to his bed; he was heartbroken because of the failure of the Senate to ratify his League of Nations. On some of the White House windows there were iron bars, put there years before when Theodore Roosevelt's children, playing ball, broke the window panes; the bars were now pointed to with whispers—there was a madman in the White House. In the Senate there was a discussion whether the technical condition of the President had not arisen that called for action: "In case of the * * * inability of the President to discharge the duties of said office. * * *"

The Senate sent a committee to find out if the President of the United States was capable of carrying on the public business. Ostensibly they put their visit on the ground of a wish to discuss our Mexican policy; actually, they were, as universal comment at that time put it, a "smelling committee."

Mrs. Wilson and Dr. Grayson demurred about admitting them. The leader (a sinister person, later publicly discredited), Senator Albert W. Fall, of New Mexico, persisted, said it was a matter of public importance. Mr. Sullivan states that on the second trip the President pulled himself together, exerted and employed what little strength there was left in his frail body, and through almost superhuman effort, remained courteous and calm toward the Senators, knowing full well the real object of their visit.

It is reported by Mr. Sullivan that this same Senator Fall (who later was convicted of having accepted a bribe while Secretary of the Interior) in leaving, said:

"I want you to know, Mr. President, that I am praying for you."

After Mr. Wilson's retirement his home in Washington was a shrine, visited by liberals from all over the world. On one occasion when a group of adherents paraded before his home, the band played the old hymn, How Firm a Foundation. Mr. Wilson then, as if moved by the spirit of the hymn, said:

"Just one word more: I have seen fools resist Providence before, and I have seen their destruction, and there will come upon these again utter destruction and contempt; that we shall prevail is as sure as that God reigns."

I believe his words were truly prophetic.

In my judgment, it is not written in the stars that there must always be wars; that every 25 years or so the youth of the world must be lined up in battle array against each other. It will be remembered that not so long ago disputes between individuals were settled by trial by battle or legal duel. This practice was, as you will remember, changed by an all-powerful and universal church, which established courts or tribunals which adjudicated men's individual rights. I suspect that at that time certain elements of the population branded as radical the idea of doing away with trial by battle or by duel. Men, I suspect, were characterized as crackpots and weaklings who advanced the idea that men's rights could be determined in a court or a tribunal presided over by a disinterested person, or that the guilt or innocence of accused persons could be determined by a hearing before such a distinterested individual rather than by the cruel and savage system then in force.

It is the considered opinion of many scholars and students of international affairs that one of the great tragedies of our age was the failure of this country to become a member of the League of Nations following the last war. Many men wonder whether this present tragedy would have come to pass if we had followed Woodrow Wilson's ideal of "a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free." The League, of course, was not perfect; it had its faults, but at least it was a start. Had we lent the influence of this country to it, this present conflict might have been averted.

It is only in times of great upheavals that revolutionary advances can and may be accomplished. The First World War was truly such an upheaval and the world was presented with its first opportunity to evolve and formulate some practical plan for the abolition of wars.

Another great upheaval has occurred—even greater than the first. Again the youth of the world is pitted against each other in mortal combat. Again we are approaching the writing of a peace; again we are approaching the moment when it is possible to attempt to do something constructive. In my judgment, history of tomorrow will never forgive the men of today if we fail to understand or to measure up to that which must be done. The finish of a total war should be a total peace. The price of victory does not cover the price of peace. It has been said that we pay billions for victory. Shall we offer nothing for the one great good that this victory makes possible—an abiding peace?

When this war is over there will be a great desire to return to normalcy. The country and the world will be war-weary. There will be, however, leaders who believe that the establishment of an abiding peace demands that nations should contribute something of their sovereignty in order that there may arise in the world a supranational system, implemented with the necessary police and judicial powers to make it, in the nucleus of the universal community, the supreme court of last appeal in international affairs.

At such time there will appear again short-sighted ones who peer at their own narrow interests and will not raise their eyes to the stars. There will appear intolerant persons who make their own group or their own nation the standard of humanity. There will appear the stupid ones who cannot think beyond the old traditions or the old catch words. These will all oppose the world's attempt to establish an international association or an international court. They will characterize those who advocate it as idealists, as dreamers, and as stargazers.

It is true that they may be idealists and dreamers, but idealists and dreamers are the ones who carry the torch of civilization ahead; they are the ones who set the stakes in advance—farther ahead, ofttimes, than the times will permit us to follow—but they set the stakes forward and onward. They are as necessary in a civilization as those practical souls who counsel against too much progress.

It has been said that the moral law of Hebrew faith, the idealism of Grecian thought, the universality of Roman law, the highest aspirations of the classical age, the spiritual conception of a common God, and one great family, of all men as brothers and sons of God, the persistent, Christian hope of human brotherhood, nurtured in the hearts of men for over 2,000 years, cry out and impel us at this time of great opportunity, to insist that some practical and workable organization of nations be formed which will at least start the development of procedures which will prevent the settlement of international disputes by resort to arms.

It is my hope that whatever plan is proposed it be not known as a Republican, Democratic, or New Deal plan, and be thus characterized. I hope that it is some plan worked out by representatives of all factions and representatives of the United Nations. Only in such an event will it have a chance of adoption.

From the history of Senate actions in the past it is apparent that it will not be an easy task. A majority of the people at the close of the last war were undoubtedly in favor of some international association or tribunal. But, as I have heretofore pointed out, willful men in the Senate were determined that there should be none. In opposing it, this vociferous minority went up and down the country, appealing to prejudice against Mr. Wilson, constantly reminding communities of alien voters that Mr. Wilson, at the peace table, had treated their homelands badly. They constantly drove in the wedges of discord along the lines of racial cleavage. They effectively jeered and ridiculed his lofty ideals and aims.

It will be so again. After this war the people will be again, for the most part, interested in their private affairs; they will lose the crusading sprit born of the war and will recede from the high moral and spiritual reactions arising out of their sufferings. There will be those who will again appeal to national, racial, and sectional prejudices.

You will again hear the cry "America first!" and "Let's take care of Uncle Sam!" There will be pressure groups, led by eloquent leaders, who will oppose such a proposal because of its claimed effect upon their particular groups. The defects or insufficiencies in any plan proposed will be magnified. There will be those who will advocate that we withdraw to ourselves; that we become practically an armed camp and that we let the rest of the civilized world shift for itself. You can recognize the beginning of such resistance in the opposition occuring in the Congress of the United States to the bill having to do with Mr. Hull's reciprocal agreements.

It is easier to frustrate the accomplishment of high purposes and ideals than to successfully carry them through. It is easier to be passive and do nothing than to move forward, especially when it is necessary to be at the head of the column.

I am of the opinion that the American people have accepted the necessity for American participation in the creation of a peace system in the post-war world.

In May 1943, the Gallup poll posed this question:

"Should the countries fighting the Axis set up an international police force after the war is over, to try to keep peace throughout the world?"

From the replies it appeared that 74 percent of the people favored this policy; 14 percent opposed it, and 12 percent expressed no opinion. In June 1943, the following question was posed:

"Should America play an active part in post-war affairs?"

The result was as follows:

	Take active part	Stay out	Undecided
	Percent	Percent	Percent
New England	81	9	10
Pacific Coast	80	12	8
Mountain States	79	11	10
Western States	78	13	9
South	76	11	13
Middle Atlantic	76	15	9
Eastern Central	71	18	11

Two surveys were conducted by Fortune magazine in December 1941. The question was asked: "After the war, do you think the United States should play (1) a larger part, (2) about the same part, or (3) a smaller part in world affairs?"

Of the replies received 58.4 demanded that this country play a larger part in world affairs. The same question was asked in June 1943 and resulted in a demand that the United States play a larger part, by 76.6 percent.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there appear addresses of Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, of Ohio, Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY, of Kentucky, Senator HARRY S. TRUMAN, of Missouri, and Senator BALL, of Minnesota. These addresses were given January 17, 1944, at a United Nations Forum, wherein world peace was discussed. In speaking of the League of Nations, Senator TAFT said:

"The refusal to enter the League of Nations was based on the theory that our association with the quarrels of Europe would be more likely to produce war than to prevent it. I never agreed that such an argument justified a refusal to join in an attempt to outlaw war.

"The question we have to face today is whether conditions in the world have so changed, or may so change during the next decade, that the policy of the free hand is no longer the best method of preventing aggression against the United States. In my opinion the conditions which we face after the war are substantially different, and do require a departure from our traditional policy. I, myself believe that those conditions had changed 25 years ago. It had become apparent then that any major war between great nations was likely to involve the rest of the world, and grow into a war which might threaten the peace and freedom of the United States. We had, therefore, acquired an interest in preventing the development of a major war. If by agreeing to join with other nations in preventing aggression we could discourage the beginning of war, or if by joining in a minor war we could prevent a world conflagration, I always thought we should have been prepared to make definite commitments in advance."

Senator BARKLEY, in his address, in speaking of post-war collaboration with other nations, said:

"As already suggested, I cannot here dogmatically determine, even for myself, the form which such an international arrangement shall take. But I feel very strongly that it must come about, and that the harrassed and overburdened people of the world will demand it, and that statesmanship will be bankrupt unless it can respond without fear and without self-seeking quibbles and technicalities."

Senator TRUMAN, in his address, used the following language:

"Many Americans today are being led down false paths and enticed by negative un-American brands of thought to fight each other over secondary issues. We need to emblazon across the life of this country the cardinal truths of nationhood—that the real issue is not between group and group within our own country who seem to have conflicting interests. The real issue today is whether we are going to sacrifice personal and group selfishness for the sake of the Nation, or whether we are going to sacrifice our Nation for the sake of our selfishness. The issue also is whether we are going to sacrifice our national selfishness for the sake of the world or insure World War No. 3 by sacrificing the world for the sake of our national selfishness.

"Americans must fight on the real issues. The real issue is whether we as a Nation of strong-minded men and women are going to have the courage to sink our differences which arise out of selfish interests and pour everything we have into the Nation's interest. This is crucial if the great lessons of this war are to be mobilized for the building of a united America and a new world."

Senator BALL, of Minnesota, attending the same meeting, spoke as follows:

"So our first and basic tep in the United Nations should be to agree on the machinery to implement our common objective of a peaceful, stable world in which justice rather than force prevails. That means that as soon as possible the United Nations should agree on a few common rules of conduct among nations, including the requirement that all international disputes that threaten war be settled by peaceful means and that future attempts at military aggression be stopped by the collective force of the world community. Senator TAFT has developed more fully the concept of international law and peaceful settlement of disputes, so I will not dwell on it except to state that I believe all of us recognize that peaceful means for settling disputes, in the justice and fairness of which all nations have confidence, must go hand in hand with the use of military force to stop and punish future attempts at aggression. Otherwise, the use of force would be all too likely to degenerate into the type of oppression against which we are now fighting.

"There is, I believe, general agreement in the United States now that if we hope to have a world in which law and order and peace rather than chaos and war prevail there must be somewhere in the picture military force available to stop and punish violations of the international code of conduct."

These are the expressions of two outstanding Republican and two outstanding Democratic Senators.

The Senators whose speeches I have quoted from take, in my judgment, a fair-minded and constructive view as to the extent to which this country should participate in post-war planning to preserve future peace.

We still have, however, a number of extreme and persistent isolationists in the Senate. These men, I am fearful, will use all their efforts to lead us back to isolationism and to thwart this country's participation in any plan opposing any treaty including any plan. These, and other opponents, will seek to recruit adherents from the agricultural or Midwestern States.

It is the fear that they may be successful that prompts me to thus speak to you tonight. I have the fear that we will not recognize their real purpose; that they will divide us and chill our enthusiasms and that enterprises of great pith and moment in this regard will turn awry and lose the name of action. Some of these men may give lip service to the people's wishes, as did Candidate Harding, and others, after the First World War, but will raise subtle objections to any plan proposed. They will not make a frontal attack upon the broad principle of participation. They will wage a war of attrition, sniping at this or that particular of the final plan. They will urge that the British Empire will have too many votes; that the Soviet Union will have too many votes; that the ideology of the Russians is impossible; that they are demanding a certain boundary line in Poland; that India is still not free; and will urge all such controversial issues. They will appeal to our selfishness, urging against any commitments.

In the past, arguments of this character have been effective, especially in the Middle West.

For more than a century great wars have led to great hopes for a system of permanent peace. So it was when Napoleon's empire was overthrown, in 1815. So again, in the last war, when President Wilson proposed and the rest of the world assented to the plan of the League of Nations. And so it is today; even before the victory is won plain people everywhere search for the hope that peace, when it comes, may be just and lasting.

It has now been realized that permanent peace is not to be had for the wishing.

Ambassador Litvinov remarked that peace is indivisible, and Secretary Hull observed, only recently, that "all of the United Nations have a common interest in national security, in world order under law, in peace"; and he added "the future of these indispensable common interests depends absolutely upon international cooperation."

I believe that in the struggle to see to it that the victory shall also bring hope of permanent peace to the world, there are no parties—there are only Americans, seeking for our people, and for all peoples of the world, this advancement on the road of civilization.

The choice is before us whether we shall allow pressure groups, extreme isolationists, die-hard conservatives, petty politicians seeking to curry favor with various nationalities and sectional and industrial groups, to combine together to thwart the accomplishment of a noble purpose, or whether we, as important citizens of this Republic, shall assert our opinions and demand of our Congress that they put aside politics, jealousies, and hates and that they lend their aid to accomplishing some practical plan of collaboration with other nations to prevent these awful wars, and to prevent the necessity of our grandchildren being sacrificed to the god of war.

To me, the two important questions that our generation should handle are the winning of this war and the evolving of some plan for permanent peace upon this earth. If we fail to do both, then we shall have failed the future. To me, the incessant and unseemingly wranglings constantly going on in Congress, and the jockeying for political advantage, ever present, are extremely discouraging.

I have called attention to the foregoing to awaken a present consideration of what course our country should pursue after the victory shall have been won; to suggest that after the last war the will of the majority of the people was thwarted in the matter of a league of nations, and to suggest that it will be so again, unless the people know what they want, make their wishes known, and demand of their Executive and of their Senators that their wishes be carried out.

At this time, while we are carrying on a terrible conflict, nearly everyone will accept the broad principle of participation in some plan which offers hope of escape from future wars, but the day I am concerned about is the day when vague generalities must be translated into commitments.

Will Americans then be willing to bind their country to specific obligations and even to some limitation on national sovereignty? Will Americans stand together for participation with other nations in some practical plan, or will they be split apart by clever reactionaries and self-seeking pettifoggers?

We must know that temporarily submerged rifts, doubts, and personal enmities will then come to the surface; that there will arise a certain amount of disillusionment and distrust of our allies, that there will be many, many difficulties. At such times, in my opinion, it will be the duty of the lawyer, throwing all politics aside, to patriotically advise and lead the people.

In my judgment, he should urge upon the people that American participation is more than a dream of idealists; that it is a practical necessity if we are to live in decency and reasonable security.

It has been said, "Here is today's challenge to American lawyers, individually and collectively. History has given us no greater opportunity to improve somewhat man's rough road."

Our own chief justice, Robert G. Simmons, plotted our course when he said:

"We should help to so crystallize America's public opinion that, when the time comes for the peace to be written, the men who speak for us in high places can know without question the will of America's people, and knowing that will speak with the confidence of the power of a great nation.

"In forming that public sentiment lawyers trained in principles of government, the thing with which they deal, can and must furnish a sound public leadership in this country."

In the Old Meetinghouse in Boston hangs a picture of Samuel Adams, and underneath it are some lines by William Roscoe Thayer, that might well be pondered by us of the present generation:

"You hurry by—what errands call?
Service to heart, or head, or purse?
Shed you a freeman's boon on all,
Or shape a subtler tyrant's curse?
We numbered but a little clan
Beside your million-teeming press,
Yet wrought the general good of man—
Woe be your meed, if you do less."

Making International Relations Attractive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Making International Relations Attractive," delivered by former Gov. Alf M. Landon, at Kansas City, Mo., on April 16, at the Pan American Day observances held in the First Christian Church.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Secretary of State Hull made a new, and on the whole, constructive start last Sunday toward laying a sound foundation of a national policy for a workable peace. It is true that the Secretary was not very explicit. He really cannot be expected to lay down a complete blueprint now. However, there must soon be a definite forceful direction in our foreign policies. Unless we have that, we are nothing but water boys bringing up the rear.

So far as he is concerned, Mr. Hull attempted to correct the faults that have disrupted successful agreement on the President's personally conducted foreign policies. It is hoped that he will be permitted to prepare the stage for better collaborations at home by his recognition of the Congress bipartisan membership and by his sane general approach to hitherto ignored fundamentals.

In Mr. Hull's speech Sunday he showed no inclination to give away any of the fundamental strength of America. He aroused no false hopes, as other administrative representatives have done, in foreign land, or fears at home, that Uncle Sam was to be a "sugar daddy." Mr. Hull takes the Congress in on our foreign policy as it must be, when he announced that bipartisan committee of the Congress would participate in planning the American policy.

That does not mean that there will be complete agreement on all the important and vital details as men and women attempt to look beyond the war and deal with a lasting political order. But the anticongressional campaign of the President gave no hope of reaching any accord on even basic general principles of our foreign policy.

The Secretary's frank recognition that the Atlantic Charter does not justify the hitherto extravagant claims made for it by the administration, even if a plea of confession and avoidance is a welcome contrast to the excess of enthusiasm that surrounded the disastrous claims of great accomplishments at Moscow and Tehran.

Secretary Hull, Sunday, did not repeat the mistake of so many sincere and zealous advocates in the unending fight for world freedom and decent behavior, of placing the responsibility on our own United States, for what happens in the post-war world.

Mr. Hull frankly recognized the basic truth that if war is to be driven from the world, it does not depend on us alone, but also on many other great peoples—Slavs, Asiatics, as well as Anglo-Saxons. I would personally add Teutons and Latins, if you please.

It is no longer a matter of the world being uncertain as to our position. We have made it plain that the bulk of Americans are desperately anxious to participate in the organization of the world on a basis that gives the most hope for a durable peace. It seems to me that the best service that can be rendered the cause of peace now, is to make it equally plain to our allies that the extent of that participation depends on their course of action.

In other words, the potentiality for American participation in collective security is at hand—but our actual participation depends on its just and fair application. We Americans are not interested in substituting one tyranny for another. That's a basic principle which no plan for world collaboration can ignore.

Broadly speaking, perhaps Secretary Hull's greatest contribution toward a national policy, was the recognition of the need of bringing bipartisan committees of both Houses of the Congress into international post-war discussions. I urged that long ago as one of the means essential to developing a sound international peace structure, and further, that at least one member of the proper congressional committee be appointed as a member of all executive committees on post-war planning.

An English historian says, "There is no great mystery attached to negotiation between governments. They proceed on the same fundamental principles that affect other business dealings where the object is to reconcile a conflict of interest." Of course, in a republic all the people are entitled to know what the negotiators are saying and thinking and doing.

In the end the people must decide what agreements we will have with other nations, for they must pay the price for the failure of statesmen.

The crux of the business lies in acting with sincerity, energy, faithfulness, and shrewd appreciation of the needs, not only of America, but of the rest of the world, in preventing another holocaust.

The huge productive mechanism of our country cannot find adequate markets at home or on the North American Continent.

There are three solutions for that situation. One, for the United States to get political control over large undeveloped areas, from which we can have a monopoly of trade. Two, a regimented society that might work for awhile. Three, for both American political parties to reverse their tariff policies. The last will give the world a different kind of goal to aim at than it now has. It would be an energizing force. Prospective markets the world over would encourage banks to finance a round trip where previously they were not justified in financing even a one-way passage.

So let's consider reorganizing ourselves, in order to help and aid—not supervise or dictate—the life of the others in order to help ours.

There is no such thing as one world, politically. There can be economically, if private enterprise is free to trade in all countries. Flourishing commerce and prosperity for all peoples, means economic progress and hygienic progress. Only when a healthy competition between all peoples can be brought about, can we have any semblance to world order or unity, or whatever it is that causes people to eat regularly, and laugh occasionally.

A growing mutual understanding and respect for each other's ways among the peoples of the world will do more to restore, build, and maintain peace in the world, than all the police forces of Christiandom. It means making peace so attractive to all nations that they will not want to risk breaking away from it.

Such meetings as this fulfill the function of the peoples as citizens of a republic. We meet to discuss in particular, our relations with the other great countries of this hemisphere. That relation is both economic, political, and cultural.

The policies of our Government and the attitude of our people to these questions is of tremendous importance. That is a normal situation. So it was a great mistake to think of our relations with the great countries to the south of us as a temporary concern, born of the critical times.

We are far behind other nations in our appreciation of the political, economic, and cultural trends in our neighbors of this hemisphere.

No government center, however efficient, can adequately shoulder the job of changing that. It can help, but the proper interest can only be created by our own desires.

We must realize that we will not gain the enduring friendship and respect of the other great peoples of this hemisphere by organized economic, political, and cultural drives on them. The kind of relations we want with the countries to the South of us are not gained that way.

Yet that is precisely what we have been doing. All the people of this Western Hemisphere are naturally friendly peoples. We do not have the age-old hates of the Old World born of burning homes and starving and slaying men, women and children. Natural friendships do not thrive on organized drives, designed to force a hothouse growth.

Thus so far, our relations with our fellow Americans on this hemisphere have alternated between indifference or positive attempts in cultivations, lacking much semblance of the approach on which lasting friendships are based.

Our recent sudden attempts at buying this friendship through the greatest money spending splurge in all history are not successful.

We cannot buy the respect and the liking of the people of the other great nations on this hemisphere. We have got to be as understanding of their ways as they are of ours, and that is the why of such meetings as this.

In December 1889, delegates from 18 American republics met in Washington for the first pan-American conference. The following April 14, they carried a resolution to found a permanent organization which later became the Pan American Union. Consequently April 14 is now observed as pan-American Day.

After 54 years pan-Americanism still needs promoting. We have to work for its ideal objective, and guard carefully lest the gains of a half century should be lost. Why is this so?

First, our interest in pan-Americanism for a long time was overshadowed by the problems of our own security. This led us to exercise controlling influence in some Latin American countries, which in turn aroused antagonism.

Second. Latin America had close economic and cultural ties to European nations, and the latter often encouraged the feeling of antagonism towards us.

Third. Inferior communications hindered the north-south exchange of ideas. Not until recently have the radio and airplane and study of languages helped to overcome this.

Fourth. We were absorbed in the development of our own country. It was in this past 50 years that we completed the conquest of our land frontier and built much of our present industrial plant.

Fifth. We did not need seriously the products and cooperation of Latin America until recently. Although many Latin Americans have long felt the need for closer bonds with us, their entreaties fell on a deaf ear and it took a world crisis to awaken us to the advantages of inter-American cooperation.

Nevertheless, there have been through the years many advocates of inter-American friendship, among them Henry Clay, James G. Blaine, Elihu Root, Woodrow Wilson, and Herbert Hoover. Until the late 1920's their voice represented our minority opinion, but finally under President Hoover we began to respond to the need of the times. The results of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull's relations with the other great peoples of the hemisphere have been very successful until the doubtful handling of lease-lend.

Now this new inter-American movement has grown greatly, and in the present wave of interest I hail one very significant trend: Friendship with Latin America is becoming an absorbing interest and responsibility of the citizens of our country, and the Latin Americans are reciprocating in full measure. In other words, a responsibility which we once erroneously left chiefly to Government agencies is now becoming local and spontaneous. Given a continuation of this trend, those American governments which truly represent their people will naturally respond and work in harmony. You will think of many illustrations of this popularization of hemispheric cooperation, and I shall cite one. Here in the Midwest our leaders in business and education have founded the Midwest Inter-American Center. Under the stimulation of coordinated regional action the response in this area has been gratifying, even beyond expectations. Hundreds of adults are taking up the study of Spanish and Portuguese. Thousands of copies of published materials have been made available for use in the schools, more and more visitors from Latin America are being brought into our midst, and from them we are learning to know our neighbors much better; agencies of information, like the radio and press, are giving more attention to inter-American affairs; our industrialists are beginning to look south, and our airlines are leading the way in making better connections for us.

If you were to ask me to interpret this, to say what is back of this awakening, I would sum it up as the result of two problems and two opportunities.

The first problem is that of establishing a truly sound policy toward Latin America—one based on interchange instead of spending or exploitation, on respect instead of condescension. Moreover, we and the Latin Americans want assurance that a sound policy once established shall continue. The only way to meet these needs, we believe, is to take over in our own region the management of our relations with Latin America and put them on the basis of personal acquaintance, friendship, and mutually beneficial economic relations.

The second problem is that of lack of our knowledge about Latin America. As Americans are brought into contact with each other, we discover that the Latin Americans are educated, refined, and informed, and that our ignorance about them is appalling and embarrassing. Some of us do not know whether Honduras is in South America or Central America, whether they speak Spanish, French, or Portuguese in Brazil. Most of us are not aware that Latin America had recognized universities, a great literature, thriving cities, and leaders in science, long before we could boast of similar achievements, in fact, in some cases, before our ancestors had even put ashore in North America. Most of us do not even know the name of one great scholar of Latin America, and they have many such scholars who have long been recognized in Spain, Portugal, France, and Germany. As long as this state of affairs continues, little wonder our neighbors would rather fraternize with people from Europe instead of with us. If we are to win the respect of our good friends to the south, we must overcome this great handicap. Therefore, we must devote ourselves to intensive study of Latin American geography, history, literature, and languages, and we are now rising to meet this problem.

Two opportunities also give us encouragement. One is the certainty that there will be a great development of inter-American trade after this war. Latin America is accumulating great reserves of dollar credits with which to buy from us. Those countries are developing industries and transportation lines which will help supply our growing markets here, and here we will have the greatest industrial capacity we have ever had, and for its products we shall look to Latin markets. There are along with this opportunity, we realize, some responsibilities. We shall be responsible to maintain full employment after the war, and to do this we are making preparations now. In addition, we must see that our economic relations with Latin America are on a partnership basis, and not aimed at exploitation of either party.

The second opportunity is that of travel. With the opening of airways and the destruction of Europe, we are looking forward to vacations in the lands to the south. Their attractions are abundant, we have learned only recently. But here we again face a responsibility and that is that we must be prepared to carry with us a spirit of respect, leisure, curiosity, and admiration, and not the traditional bullying, spendthrift, patronizing of our pre-war tourists. No one can effect this change for us; we have to do it ourselves, and we are striving to do so.

These things, then, inspire our present interest in Americans, and our observance more seriously than heretofore of Pan-American Day. Now, however, we are determined that this shall not be a mere annual holiday to which we render lip service, for now a great majority of us are moved by the spirit of inter-Americanism the year round. We recognize and accept the challenge of the new trend. Our foreign relations shall no longer be left exclusively to the agencies of diplomacy, to the pressure of powerful economic interests, or to the exigencies of a crisis in Europe. We are going to carry the responsibility ourselves on the basis of trade, travel, friendship, and mutual respect. This, I conclude, can and will shape anew the destiny of the Americas.

But without the moral and spiritual decisions to make this a just and Christian peace, they will be as tinkling cymbals and sounding brass.

We must life our eyes to the living principles of international peace and justice not in terms of a fixed and rigid structure, but as a forward step in man's age-long struggle to free himself from war.

I distrust anyone who believes he has the only blueprint as to just how it must be done and who malevolently attacks all who disagree with it as lacking in intelligence or patriotism.

The foundations of world peace, like the house of freedom, must be rebuilt time and time again and are subject to change in growth.

The important principle is our determination to stick with the problem, despite discouragement, until it is comprehensibly settled.

To quote from the Reconstruction of Europe: "It appears," Ferrero says, "that the moment is at hand when the order of influence may be changed and the United States be called upon to exert a decisive political influence. If the United States will understand the problem and make an effort to help the great powers in Europe rediscover the path of order and peace, she will render a tremendous service to herself and to the world.

"When I visited the United States for the first time in 1909 I was impressed—as I said in the book which I wrote on my return, Between the Old World and the New—by the enormous effort the United States was putting forth to 'translate quantity into quality'—that is, to draw from the immense wealth which she was producing something fine, noble, and beautiful. A magnificent purpose, but the task which might tomorrow be given the United States would be more important than any she has accomplished up till now, and that is to help that part of the western world which has lost itself in revolution and has become incapable of governing itself according to old political principles or according to new ones, to find its bearings and restore peace and order to the world by rediscovering either the one or the other for itself."

The influence of America in these far-reaching events depends on friendship on this hemisphere and abroad.

There must be a give-and-take policy based on a mutual understanding and appreciation of each other's rights, needs, convictions, and contributions.

I do not believe a nation can live for itself alone any more than man can live by bread alone.

Tribute to Senator Truman and the Truman Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Senator TRUMAN Diligent in Task of Watchdog of War Effort," by Paul W. Kearney, which appeared in the Washington Star yesterday.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR TRUMAN DILIGENT IN TASK OF WATCHDOG OF WAR EFFORT

(By Paul W. Kearney)

Senator HARRY S. TRUMAN was giving a dinner party downstairs in my hotel in Washington as this was being written. The guests included Secretary Knox, General Marshall, Admiral King, a half-dozen Senators and other notables. Also among those present were Beulah Mason and Eddie Martin.

In case you don't place the last two names, Beulah is a file clerk on the Truman committee staff, and Eddie is a 16-year-old messenger. They, and every other committee employee from top to bottom were invited to this staff party. But I couldn't get in—reporters were not invited.

Right there is as sharp a little snapshot of the junior Senator from Missouri as you'll ever see in type. Inherently democratic, congenial and affiable, scrupulously fair—and none of it slapped on like make-up for an interviewer's camera.

There isn't the slightest trace of horns on the graying head of this ace inquisitor, whose activities as chairman of the Senate Committee Investigating the Defense Program have won him the enmity of many of those he has investigated and the gratitude of multitudes of taxpayers. Rather, you are surprised to meet an exceedingly friendly, easy-laughing, unassuming farmer from Jackson County, Mo. No flowing tie, no pomposity, no meaningless eloquence; just a regular guy by any standard. But the finest investment the taxpayers have in Washington today.

In 3 years his renowned committee, composed of Senators from both parties, has been allotted $400,000, of which $100,000 is still unspent. On its first major investigation this group of hustling junior Senators saved the country at least $250,000,000 by its disclosures of waste and blundering in the pell-mell construction of new Army camps. Since then the direct savings in war operations attributed to this committee's work have been variously estimated at from $1,000,000,000 on up to astronomical figures.

Such achievements are dramatic, but they are really secondary results. The big idea which first prompted Senator TRUMAN to propose the committee 3 years ago was to get on with the war with the greatest dispatch. As it functions, it is not so much the "billion-dollar watchdog" as it is often called, but the epitomization of democracy at work. It has no power power, no authority to enforce any decision. Its sole weapon is a simple, three-letter word: Why? But instead of waiting until the war is over—as we did last time—the gentleman from Missouri figured it would be smarter to start as soon as the war did and keep right on asking, "Why are you doing that?"

The results of this foresight have been fabulous in tangible accomplishments and even greater in performances which can't be put on paper: The prevention of abuses. Early in the game, for example, the committee did masterful work in its studies of the critical situations in aluminum, copper, zinc, rubber, at a time when everybody else was blissfully coasting along on an opium-pipe dream. Indeed, if you care to compare the widely hailed Baruch rubber report with the Truman committee's recommendations made 3 months earlier, you will be astonished at the similarity.

Without pausing for breath, the committee has sailed into one situation after another: Gas rationing, war housing, priorities in scarce materials, farm machinery, essential civilian goods, shipbuilding, magnesium, corporate cartels that are linked with Nazi trusts, the Canol oil project, and so on down a lengthy list.

To date, Senator TRUMAN'S group, consisting of 6 Democrats and 4 Republicans, has filed 31 reports, some running 600 pages. All 31 have been unanimous.

Thumb through the most recent annual report, or its two predecessors, and you are struck with one fact. That is that no matter who is involved—Government agencies or big business, labor groups or the Army or Navy, Cabinet members, admirals, generals, or obscure subordinates—all are fair game for Senator TRUMAN'S hustlers.

"We just dig out the facts, all the facts," says Senator TRUMAN. "Naturally, the conclusions take care of themselves. Our sole function is to promote the war effort. A political report has never come from our committee. If one ever should, it would be our last, for the committee would then have committed suicide."

TRUMAN is soft-spoken, unassuming, easy to meet, but not at all effusive. He was born in Independence, Mo., 60 years ago this May 8. After high school he tried for West Point but was rejected because of poor eyesight. Discarding the idea of college, he went to work, moving up from a $3-a-week bottle washer in a drug store to a bank clerk. Later he spent 2 years in Kansas City Law School.

At 21 he enlisted as a private in the National Guard, drilling in time spared from helping his father operate the family's 600-acre farm; and he was no "gentleman farmer." When World War No. 1 broke out, he had organized the Second Missouri Field Artillery, served with the unit through St. Mihiel and the Argonne as a captain. On the way home on the transport the men in his command took a cut out of every poker game on the ship and with the proceeds bought him a loving cup 4 feet high. That gives an idea of what sort of commanding officer he was.

During the next several years he tried his hand at various business enterprises before entering politics. He was elected county judge, then presiding judge for two terms. He went to the Senate in 1934 and was re-elected in 1940.

For 25 years he has been married to Bess Wallace, a childhood sweetheart. Their 18-year-old daughter, Mary Margaret, recently christened the U. S. S. Missouri.

A diligent worker, he gets up voluntarily at 6 a. m., hops a bus to the Senate Office Building around 7:30, generally gets back to his Connecticut Avenue apartment with a bundle of home work at 7:30 p. m.

Through all the bouquets and brickbats the gentleman from Missouri and his 10 Republican and Democratic associates blandly pursue their chosen course of getting on with the war with dispatch. Lately his subcommittees have been very busy with rent gouging of servicemen's families in Miami, crack-ups of Liberty ships, foreign air bases, and lend-lease. And, of course, the renegotiation of war contracts.

"Renegotiation is a poor word," says Senator TRUMAN. "We should call it repricing. For all it amounts to is sitting down calmly and refiguring the costs of war contracts on a mass-production basis. Many of the things we needed in vast quantities had never been made that way before; nobody could know what they should cost. All that counted was getting them. No one objects to a fair profit. But now we have the leisure to recheck and it is our duty to do so to protect the patriotic majority of war contractors against the stigma of profiteering generated by the self-seeking minority. We intend to see that no man or corporate group of men shall profit inordinately on the blood of the boys in the fox holes."

It has been said that there is no other country where such a committee could work along its chosen lines without fear or favor. If that be so, we should put up a sign outside the office door of the gentleman from Missouri and of members of his committee. It should read, "Caution—democracy at work."

The School-Lunch Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very excellent radio address on the school-lunch program, which was delivered by Dorothy Thompson over the blue network on March 26, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Tonight I am going to talk about the most important long-range question in America. That is the American child.

Today's children are tomorrow's America. America 20 years from now will be exactly as intelligent, ethical, and self-controlled, as the men and women are, who are today's boys and girls.

All wars are terribly costly. We are accustomed to reckon costs in terms of the national debt; of money taken away for taxes; in casualties of fighting youth; of support and retraining that must be given to the injured; of pensions for veterans.

But the casualties of this war, and in all countries, do not include merely the fighting men of our armies. Among the casualties must be counted thousands and thousands of their little brothers and sisters. I am not here referring to the children who have been killed by bombs from the air. I refer to children, like our own, who are safe from such attacks. But they are not safe from the effects of the home-front effort which disorganizes homes, by moving workers from one part of the country to another, by creating housing shortages, and overcrowding, and above all by drawing mothers into factories, leaving the children to feed themselves.

Neither are they safe from the sensationalisms that war instigates—from the films that continually display blood and slaughter; from the newspapers with their fearsome headlines; from the crimes they publicize; from the feverish atmosphere of recklessness and waste that always attends war booms, or from the nervous tiredness that make their parents irritable. You who have children know that they are like little receiving stations. When the atmosphere of the home is tense, the child knows it—with his nerves, even though his mind does not take it in. The children of unhappy homes are likely to be naughty children, because they are unconsciously subjected to strained emotional atmospheres, and in war, emotional strain is everywhere.

All these things, physical and emotional, are playing upon the American child, especially among the children of workers, many of whom are on night shifts, so that the home never becomes normally organized, and among the children of working mothers, who are all but utterly neglected.

Juvenile delinquency is terrible. It is the most alarming product of the war. Our clinics have as patients little girls, children of 14 and 15, infected with veneral diseases. Girls of 14 and 15 are mothers. Children, getting out of school at 3 o'clock have nowhere to go. Perhaps at home they must be quiet because their father is asleep since his work begins at 7 p. m. Or the mother is not there. Perhaps the apartment is empty, and they gather in it without any supervision. Or they haunt the streets in gangs, picking up acquaintances, or wander through department stores, picking up a little notion here and there, when the understaffed personnel are not watching.

Their physical condition is neglected. The mother coming home from the factory is too tired to cook a decent meal. Something is scrambled together, or set upon the table out of the icebox. Their clothing is neglected, or they are left to buy it themselves, little girls picking out garments unsuited to their years to make them appear older than they are, and more attractive to soldiers. They either take a cold lunch to school, or use the lunch period to haunt the streets, because there is no lunch waiting for them at home.

This is the condition in which the war has put millions of America's greatest assets, our children. And thus we are rearing the social and physical misfits of tomorrow.

Nevertheless, this week the Appropriation Committee of Congress chose to turn down a $50,000,000 appropriation with which to continue Federal grants to public schools to provide school children with cheap, nourishing lunches.

About two-thirds of our schools have lunch programs. Under the Federal grants, which are only given to such schools as decide there is need for it and apply, 6,000,000 children have been given a good lunch in the school every day. That is only one-fifth of America's 30,000,000 school children under the age of 16. Many of them paid for the lunch, but mass buying made it cheap. An excellent lunch could be served for 17 cents. But the House Appropriation Committee has decided it costs too much, and we must save.

Actually, of course, nothing whatever is being saved by the American people. Children must eat. I do not think there is a living American who would deny the right of a growing American child to 3,000 calories of nourishing, bone-building, body-building food per day. He'd get it in all orphan asylums. Nobody can give his child at home a decent meal for 17 cents. So the withdrawal will either mean that the children go without, get worse food, or that it will cost more, not less.

Boys of 18 are drafted. The reports of the Selective Service show nothing of which we should be very proud, considering the wealth of this country. Hundreds of thousands are rejected because they have never seen a dentist. Bad eyes, bad teeth, nervous disorders, and defects caused by malnutrition are startlingly prevalent. Malnutrition does not necessarily mean under-feeding. It means wrong feeding.

When these lads get into the Army in order to prepare them to fight and maybe die, the Army feeds them as they have never been fed in most of their young lives. And it costs the Government to do that just 62 cents a day.

A high caloric, appetizing diet, is possible at that price because of mass buying and collective distribution. You or I could not feed our children the same food at three times the cost. Yet, the Appropriations Committee feels that we cannot take care of our little ones, not even the poorest and weakest of them in their growing years, which from a nutritional standpoint are much the most important.

Fellow Americans, the little state of Norway, when it was free, had a sufficient sense of social obligation to its children to give every single school child, rich or poor, a hot breakfast with which to begin every school day. Norway is a poor country. But we, apparently are even poorer.

People always ask, when a necessary and valuable social measure is projected; Who is going to pay for this? But the American people must pay for feeding their children. Nor do I see the slightest reason why the childless should not also help. Ought not a nation as great and rich as ours guarantee at least one thing that every American child shall be decently nourished? Some families are too poor; some are too shiftless or ignorant; some are too overworked, to properly feed their children. But the responsibility of society cannot be avoided, if society does not want to reap the evil results.

Do you know that at Army costs every single one of our 30,000,000 school children could be given breakfast and lunch, balanced and nourishing, every school day, at a cost for actual food that would be less than half of what this Nation spent last year for alcoholic beverages? The children are now drinking those too.

Every single child could be given two hot meals every school day at the cost for actual food of 10 days of conducting this war.

If we could open the imaginations of our Government representatives, we would take hold of this problem of the American child in a big, worthy, American way. We would make the public school a real extension of the home. We would see to it that Hollywood made and distributed entertaining but appropriate films just for children and teen-age boys and girls, and that special theaters were opened, where parents could always safely send their children. We would have such films shown in schools. We would extend the educational budgets by Federal grants in aid, so that schools could be open until 6, and every school child have supervised home work and indoor and outdoor recreation until the time his parents got home from work.

We would save food, labor, and utilities by collectively and scientifically feeding the already collectively educated children. Does anyone think it is a saving in precious labor and gas and food, to feed 30,000,000 children in almost as many separate kitchens? Feeding all school children would also take immense amounts of food off the black market, it would be the most effective check on inflationary prices. The Army is not paying black markets for food. Neither would the schools. But millions of their parents are. Feeding the children would give priorities to those Americans who have first claim on them among all civilians—the children.

Now that the Appropriations Committee of Congress has taken from the mouths of the smallest and neediest the little they have, can't we pursuade our Congressmen and Senators not to put that back, but to open public hearings on the whole subject of the welfare of the American child, an design a big, intelligent, comprehensive program to deal with the whole problem? England, under bombs, and with great food shortages, is doing better by her children than we. That thought fills my heart with bitter shame. The Bible says, "Suffer the little children to come unto me." It doesn't say to turn them loose to shift for themselves in a time of war and social upset. Clergymen are preaching and deploring; club women are noting with alarm. But won't someone—can't we all—do something about it?

Manpower in the Production of Cheese in Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on April 13, I issued a release which related to manpower in Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, together with an editorial printed in the Sheboygan (Wis.) Press, under date of April 14, 1944.

There being no objection, the release and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY (Republican, Wisconsin) stated to Food Administrator Marvin Jones today that the omission of cheese manufacturing from the list of essential activities would result in the paralysis of the cheese industry of Wisconsin. He said every skilled cheesemaker was working over 70 hours, 7 days per week with no extra pay for overtime. Over 60 percent of the Nation's cheese is made by 1,700 Wisconsin factories.

The Senator said further that drafting 1 man under 26 would take 30 to 75 percent skilled help from the individual factory affected, and 100 percent in about 150 factories, and many factories would be forced to close. Others would have to reduce milk receipts within physical possibility for proper handling of the milk.

The Senator stated that the pasture season would soon open and the flush production of milk is just around the corner. The closing of the factories would disrupt the handling of the surplus milk. Therefore, the Senator insisted that because selective service is speeding the induction of these men, relief must be granted at once if cheese production is to continue.

The Senator said that 1 pound of cheese was the equivalent of about 5 quarts of whole milk and that about 1,000 men would be affected. These 1,000 men would produce 600,000,000 pounds of cheese.

The Senator called Marvin Jones' attention to the fact that the State representatives of selective service say they are powerless to grant relief and that relief must come direct from Washington

Senator WILEY wrote to Marvin Jones and wired George L. Mooney, executive secretary of the Wisconsin Cheesemakers Association, Plymouth, Wis., as follows:

"DEAR JUDGE JONES: I issued the enclosed release to the papers. This is in accordance with talk I had with Mr. McNutt's office and Colonel Bruton of your office some weeks ago.

"After talking with you today, I called Colonel Keesling of the Selective Service and informed him of your promise that you would recommend to the committee that necessary cheesemakers be listed as 'critical.'

"I don't want to accuse anyone of the old army game of 'passing the buck.' I am satisfied that if your recommendation goes to the committee, Hershey's office will see the advisability of at least deferring these men until an investigation can be made.

"The situation is very serious. I don't want to see a paralysis of the Wisconsin cheese industry and something must be done about it at once.

"I am making this record, and if the Government fails, I am going to make sure that the responsibility falls on the shoulders of those who do not adequately handle this situation.

"Yours for victory,

"ALEXANDER WILEY."

"GEORGE L. MOONEY,

"Plymouth, Wis.:

"I contacted Marvin Jones personally and Colonel Keesling of the Selective Service. Jones assured me he will recommend to the committee that skilled cheesemakers be classified as critical. Keesling agreed to take the matter up immediately with Hershey and promises to get Jones and Hershey together. I expect definite action at once.

"ALEXANDER WILEY."

[From the Sheboygan Press of April 14, 1944]

MANPOWER GREATEST NEED

In the recent order issued by the Government relative to essential industries, the manufacture of cheese was omitted, and at a time when the labor shortage in that field is most critical.

Last evening George L. Mooney, executive secretary of the Wisconsin Cheese Makers' Association, wired Marvin Jones, War Food Administrator, as follows:

"Omitting cheese from list of essential activities indicates that we have either failed to make proper presentation of Wisconsin's critical labor situation in cheese industry we have been misled by reported essentiality of cheese for nutritional needs for military and civilian use and desired by Government. Every skilled cheese-maker is working over 70 hours 7 days per week rendering combined technical skill and manual labor with no extra for overtime. What other industry can match that war-labor record? Over 60 percent Nation's cheese made by 1,700 Wisconsin factories. Drafting one man under 26 takes 30 to 75 percent skilled help from individual factory affected and 100 percent in about 150 factories. Many factories forced to close and others must reduce milk receipts within physical possibility for proper handling. Just entering pasture season and flush production. Closed factories threaten economic handling surplus milk. Selective Service speeding induction compels immediate relief if maintaining cheese production is desired. Nutritional value of dairy products admitted. One pound cheese equivalent to 5 quarts whole milk. About 1,000 men affected in State producing about 600,000,000 pounds of cheese. State Selective Service and W. F. A. State representative powerless. Relief must come direct from Washington."

The Wisconsin Cheese Makers' Association has a grievance. We exempt farm labor which produces the milk from which cheese is made, and then deny the same consideration to the cheesemaker who may be the only one operating a corner cheese factory. Milk that is hauled to the factory must go into the vats the same day or it spoils. As Mr. Mooney says: "The labor situation in the cheese industry is critical," and he calls attention to skilled cheesemakers working over 70 hours 7 days per week, combining technical skill and manual labor with no extra pay for overtime, and then points out that 60 percent of the Nation's cheese is made by the 1,700 Wisconsin factories. Just 1 man under 26 years of age out of a factory would in many instances cripple production and make it impossible to handle the patrons' milk. It must also be borne in mind that now is the high production period as we are coming into pasture time, and if we fail to produce cheese in the next 60 or 90 days to the maximum amount of production the food program will be jeopardized both here at home, in the lend-lease program, and in furnishing cheese to the fighting forces in our own armies.

We would ask that Selective Service Director Lewis B. Hershey give immediate attention to a problem that confronts no other State to the extent that Wisconsin will be penalized if expert help is drafted from the cheese factories. Unless a remedy is applied for Wisconsin, and this remedy must come from Washington, the cheese industry will be seriously affected and milk produced on the farm in even greater quantities will find a bottleneck at the factory where milk is delivered and cheese is produced.

Elimination of Slums and Provision for Low-Rent Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the housing problem is extremely complex, and there are several committees of the Senate and of the House working on it now. I have a release issued by the National Association of Home Builders of the United States and because of the public interest in the release, I ask that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUILDERS READY TO ELIMINATE SLUMS AND PROVIDE LOW-RENT HOUSING

Evidence received from scores of cities throughout the country shows that immediately after the war, private home builders will start their programs providing adequate housing for families of low income at costs from 20 to 35 percent less than the same dwelling units could be provided by public housing agencies, according to a statement made today by Robert P. Gerholz, president of the National Association of Home Builders.

"There is good reason to believe that the tremendous savings of taxpayers' money to be realized by turning full responsibility for rehousing slum families over to private builders is fully recognized by the leaders in Congress who are preparing to legislate in this important field," Gerholz said. "The next step is for the builders to demonstrate clearly to their communities that they are willing to devote a large part of their efforts to this important segment of the residential construction field.

"Experience gained in building low-cost, low-rent housing during the war construction program has shown many private builders for the first time that they can well afford to construct and rent these properties, provided they are built in sufficient quantities to permit the narrow margin of profit and operating expense which such ventures involve.

"In Washington, D. C., conceded by many to have the worst slums in the Nation, a group of more than 50 of the Capital's most prominent home builders appeared before a Senate subcommittee and pledged their willingness and demonstrated their ability to build in the brief period of 6 years enough low-cost, low-rent housing to accommodate every family now living there in substandard and slum dwellings. Similar commitments have been received from other groups of builders in every section of the country.

"Private enterprise can build better and at considerably less cost than Government-housing agencies principally because of their much lower operating and overhead charges and because the profit motive has trained private builders to operate efficiently and take full advantage of all possible economies in construction," Gerholz added. "Governmental red tape, overlapping authority, and inefficiency add enormously to the cost of building and there seems to be no way to prevent the waste," he said.

"In the past, private builders have been unable to help to the extent they desired in ridding the Nation's cities of slums because they have not been able to exercise the power of eminent domain, needed to clear existing slum areas. Congress now recognizes this handicap and undoubtedly will attempt to remove this obstacle so that the job of rehousing families now residing in slums or substandard dwellings can be speeded up.

"Performance records also indicate that the low-cost housing program will get under way far faster when the job is entrusted to private enterprise. Public-housing agencies often require 6 months to a year to reach the stage where construction actually starts; private builders, with their own funds tied up in the projects, start work quickly as they cannot afford to have their working capital tied up during a prolonged period of construction.

"Builders everywhere are completing plans for a huge post-war program of residential construction, with the result that a large volume of home building will get under way as soon as materials and manpower are available. Although low-cost housing undoubtedly will constitute a large share of the total housing constructed, there also will be an unprecedented number of fine homes placed under construction soon after the war ends and restrictions are removed." Gerholz concluded, "In terms of employment the home-building industry will play a dominant and vital role in the Nation's post-war adjustment period."

Consumption of Gasoline by Mrs. Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from a constituent of mine in Arrow Rock, Mo., inquiring into the consumption of gasoline by Mrs. Roosevelt, and a reply from the head usher at the White House setting forth just how much gasoline Mrs. Roosevelt has actually used.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARROW ROCK, MO., March 5, 1944.

Hon. HARRY TRUMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN TRUMAN: The man who farms our land, Mr. John Madden, has just been in our drug store and made the statement that he read in the Kansas City Star some time back that Mrs. Roosevelt had four cars and had a gasoline rationing of 2,000 gallons per month. Now, I am not questioning her possessing four cars, but I do question her having a ration of 2,000 gallons per month, and told Mr. Madden so. Will you please put this letter in the hands of the proper person who could find out if this is true and let me know.

I do not seem to know the proper authority in Washington to ask, and I am anxious to correct this falsehood (if such it be, and I think it is).

We are very proud of the record you are making in cutting profits in war contracts. Thank you.

Your well-wisher,

MRS. W. R. HUBBARD.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 31, 1944.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR TRUMAN: The letter of Mrs. W. R. Hubbard, of Arrow Rock, Mo., dated March 5, 1944, addressed to you has come to me for reply.

Mrs. Hubbard states that a gentleman of her acquaintance has made the statement that he had read in a newspaper that Mrs. Roosevelt "had four cars and had a gasoline rationing of 2,000 gallons per month." I am glad to give you the facts as you requested.

Mrs. Roosevelt personally owns one automobile, which is kept at her home in Hyde Park, N. Y. For this car she has an A gasoline ration book.

For her use in Washington, only one White House car has been assigned to her; and no other White House car is used by her. Accurate records are kept at the White House garage of the mileage of each car. Mrs. Roosevelt has spent most of the month of March 1944 on her Caribbean trip, and therefore I have taken the figures for the month of February 1944. Her car was driven a total of 168 miles during that month. During the same month a year ago her car was driven 184 miles.

Very truly yours,

H. G. CRIM, Head Usher.

Naval Oil Leases

REMARKS

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under the guise of contribution to the war emergency some peculiar things have happened. I had occasion some months ago to discuss the Canol project of the Army, which has had and will have as little to do with the final victory as the earlier dancing phase of the civilian defense planning.

We had a new manifestation of waste of effort. The Navy, not to be outdone by the Army in adventures in the Arctic region, has been granted in a naval appropriation bill recently passed an appropriation of $1,000,000 to search for oil on the north coast of Alaska, on the naval reserve that was created some years ago.

Concerning the execution of the plan of exploration, Admiral Stuart said to the House subcommittee on Navy Department appropriations on March 22:

> We hope to do it with Seabee personnel. We have a large number of Seabee personnel who are experienced in all phases of the oil industry and we hope, that is, we intend to do it if allowed, with Seabee personnel.

I think the Congress should see to it that it is not allowed. The Seabee personnel entered the service pursuant to the call of their country, to help with their respective skills in fighting the war. They were willing to go anywhere and do anything required for the war effort. But this proposal is one that just doesn't make sense, so far as getting on with the war is concerned.

The Navy makes no claim at all that this is related to the war, or that it is essential at this time. It is merely an exploratory program to see whether there is any oil on this Arctic reserve. Ocean navigation to the region, the only way there is of getting any oil out should any be found, is limited to the months of August and September, according to Admiral Stuart. He said that the transportation of the oil would be a question to be settled later, if oil is found.

So, according to the admiral and according to Secretary Knox, there is no thought of making any use of whatever is found—no plan. Secretary Knox told the same subcommittee that "if we do explore and find there is a considerable body of oil, we will probably keep it there for a long time."

The oil problem in which the American people are interested is the one which exists here at home. The O. P. A., which has kept its head buried in the sand for 2 years on the oil situation, is now screaming loudly about the black market in gasoline and is urging the prosecution of the motorist who is suspected of having an extra gallon. That seems to be the extent of the Government's domestic oil program today.

Men, materials, and money have been denied the domestic producers. All have been exported freely. Now Navy proposes to send more men with oil experience away from here.

If Navy really wants to do something about oil supply, something that will be of direct help in this war, let the Navy release the surplus of Seabees they seem to have and the oil industry will gladly offer them employment at industry rates of pay. Manpower has been drained away from the oil industry by the processes of enlistment and selective service.

The Arctic venture can wait. It should not be undertaken at this time. There is a war to be won and naval reserve No. 4 in Alaska will contribute nothing to the victory.

The American oil industry will take care of petroleum if the Government will keep out of the way and end its several forms of interference. The Navy's job is to run the Navy, not to get into the oil business.

I do not believe the Congress in any of the legislation authorizing increases in Navy strength and in appropriating the billions of dollars to enable the Navy to fight a war ever had any thought that the Navy intended to use personnel recruited from an industry essential to the whole war effort for such purposes as the announced venture in the Arctic. I do not think the men who went into the Navy thought for one moment that they were to be used on such nonessential business. There will be plenty of time after we win this war to explore northern Alaska—and do it with men whose employment on that job will not affect the welfare of the Nation.

The Milk Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a front-page article from the Detroit Free Press carrying the headline "Milk gluts sewers as city goes without—W. F. A. rule keeps supply curtailed." The opening sentence of the article, which follows, is—

> While thousands of Detroit families were continuing on reduced milk rations, dairies here Thursday still were dumping milk down the sewers because of War Food Administration policies.

And so on.

Mr. President, when there is a shortage of milk for children and invalids in this country, together with a lack of butter and other dairy commodities, I think it is a disgraceful condition that any policy of any Federal department is such as to cause the dumping of milk down the sewers of a city.

I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Detroit Free Press be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILK GLUTS SEWERS AS CITY GOES WITHOUT—W. F. A. RULE KEEPS SUPPLY CURTAILED—CREAMERIES ALSO DENIED RIGHT TO MAKE OTHER FOODS OF SURPLUS

While thousands of Detroit families were continuing on reduced milk rations, dairies here Thursday still were dumping milk down the sewers because of War Food Administration policies.

Excess milk available now is not reaching the public because dealers are limited by the W. F. A. regulations to 90 percent of their sales last June. Detroiters—many with children—not only were prevented from getting their milk supply restored to meet their needs, but dairies were prevented from converting the surplus into such shortage foods as cheese, powdered milk, buttermilk, chocolate milk, or ice cream because of a limit on sales.

The charge that an artificial shortage was being preserved in Detroit in the midst of plenty was directed at Marvin Jones, National

W. F. A. Chairman, Wednesday by Charles C. Lockwood, Consumers' Council leader.

Lockwood told Jones that although Detroiters could use every drop of milk available, the creameries, "with more milk than they know what to do with," were forced to dump it into the drains.

"It is an intolerable situation," Lockwood said Thursday. "Even the schools are short of milk. The milk is available, but the people can't have it."

Dairies here, suffering heavy losses, have threatened to drop part of their dairy farmers, Lockwood said, and several delegations of farmers have visited his office fearing that they will be cut off from the Detroit market.

DUMPING CONFIRMED

Confirming the report that thousands of pounds of milk were going down the sewers, the Golden Valley Creamery, 14007 Wyoming, was checked Thursday. Harry Greenstein, its president, said that 12,000 pounds of skim milk were being dumped every week.

"What can I do?" he said. "I call the W. F. A. and they tell me to make butter out of it. That milk costs me $3.78 a hundred and the best I can get out of it is $1.45 a hundred by making the butter."

One dairy head declared, "The W. F. A. office here collects $20,000 from the Detroit dairies to keep Detroiters from getting the milk they need. It doesn't make sense."

At the State Parkview Creamery, 3878 Hendricks, George W. Genematas, the owner, estimated that he was forced to dump between 100 and 150 cans of milk a day.

"I don't know what the Government talks about when it speaks of a controlled market and you've got people needing milk. We've got plenty on hand and it has to go down the sewer," he said.

Postmasters, Supervisors, Etc., Are Entitled to Overtime Pay for Overtime Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the Post Office and Post Roads Committee began hearings on H. R. 2928 on June 24, 1943. This bill was introduced by Congressman FAY, of New York, upon the recommendation of the Post Office Department. When the Post Office Department recommends legislation to our committee, it has always proved to be worthy of real consideration. It is usually to provide legislation to meet a definite administrative need. Constantly changing conditions in our mail service cause previous legislation to become inadequate or outmoded. H. R. 2928 falls definitely into this classification.

It provides legislative authority permitting the Postmaster General, in cases where exigencies occur, to permit certain classes of employees who have not been covered by such legislation, to work overtime on Saturday and to pay them for their work instead of being obliged to give compensatory time later on in the following week. This legislation affects primarily, postmasters of the "first, second, and third classes, supervisory employees, special clerks, clerks, laborers, watchmen, and messengers, in first- and second-class post offices, and employees of the motor-vehicle and pneumatic-tube services, and carriers in the City Delivery Service and in the Village Delivery Service, and employees of the Railway Mail Service, post-office inspectors and the clerks in their offices, employees of the stamped envelope agency and employees of the mail equipment shops, cleaners, janitors, telephone operators, elevator conductors—paid from the appropriation of the First Assistant Postmaster General—employees of the Air Mail Service; cost ascertaining employees; employees upon the field roll of the Division of Equipment and Supplies, and all employees of the custodial service except charwoman and charmen, and those working part time."

Now it is obvious that this legislation is sorely needed. It corrects a situation that has grown worse with each succeeding year. Fifteen or twenty years ago there was little need for overtime. The burden of work and service has grown over the years to a much greater degree per man than was true in the past. Particularly is this the case during these emergency years of the war.

The duties of all types of post office employees have increased. The Post Office Department has contributed a goodly percentage of its members to the armed forces. Others discouraged by the comparatively low wages they received have been forced by the rising cost of living to find better paying jobs in private industry. Thus we see the situation of increased work and duties with decreased personnel.

By the passage of H. R. 1366 we increased the pay by 15 percent to many of the Post Office employees. This partially compensated for the increased cost of living, although, in my opinion, it ignored undeniable statistics which prove that the cost of living has increased 25 percent plus. But H. R. 1366 did not cover the overtime phase which H. R. 2928 seeks to cover.

The principle of overtime pay for extra hours worked is so eminently fair, is such an accepted principle of the American system of wage compensation in private industry, that it would seem unnecessary to even present arguments in its behalf. Apparently, however, our Government lags behind private industry in many of its social relations. We are all proud of our Government Post Office Department. It has a record of service and efficiency superior, in my opinion, to any department of Government. Its personnel is comprised of the highest type of dependable, loyal American citizens. They depend upon the Members of Congress for legislation that will recognize and reward their service to the people in our Nation. It is the solemn duty of every Member of Congress to legislate fairly in their behalf.

H. R. 2928 is an effort to correct this custom of overtime duty without compensation and would give the Post Office employees in unprotected classifications the same treatment given employees in private business. It would seem that no opposition would develop against this equitable approach to this problem. The Post Office Department has approved it. Mr. Purdum, Second Assistant Postmaster General, in his testimony on this bill before the Post Office Committee said, among other things:

> The bill conserves manpower and gives you (the Post Office Department) the benefit of the continued help of experienced employees.

The Bureau of the Budget has approved it with one exception, by asking that overtime pay be denied all those above the $2,900 salary bracket. I think this objection is most discriminatory. Not only would it deny recognition to postmasters, postal supervisors, and post office inspectors, and so forth, for their important part in the success of the postal service, but it would actually reduce their compensation below that of existing overtime provisions.

One point I wish to emphasize at this time is that such overtime as is now credited to these employees is credited at the regular hourly rate of remuneration. It does not provide for the usual time and one-half hourly rate as paid by most private industries for extra time worked, and I might add that many other Government departments pay overtime at the rate of time and one-half. I, therefore, strongly resent this discriminatory objection by the Bureau of the Budget and I am glad that the House Post Office Committee rejected it. I think that the bill, H. R. 2928, as reported by the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and passed by the House on July 5, 1943, was a good bill and it certainly met the approval of the Post Office Department and answered a growing need of the employees concerned.

Unfortunately, certain changes were made in this bill by the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and passed the Senate, amended on March 30, 1944. The Senate committee followed the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget in regard to the $2,900 salary ceiling and eliminated from participation in the overtime provisions all postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, post office inspectors and cost ascertainment employees. I sincerely hope that the conferees will be appointed by the respective chairmen of the House and Senate Post Office and Post Roads Committees who will agree on the reinclusion of these classifications under the benefit of the overtime provision extended to the lower wage classification. If we fail to include the postmasters and inspectors, and so forth, in this legislation, it is my opinion that we have unjustifiably discriminated against the very keymen in our postal service. I believe it would cause them to lose faith in our fairness as legislators. At a time when their duties are multiplied by cooperation with bond drives, war-stamp sales, and personnel problems, we would seriously impair the morale of these fine public servants.

I, therefore, urge that all postmasters, post office inspectors, and cost ascertainment employees be reincluded in the bill by the conferees and final action be taken as soon as possible for the good of the Postal Service.

Europe's Starving Youth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter, which I wrote to the New York Herald Tribune, on relief for the starving children of the German-occupied countries of Europe, and which appeared in that newspaper on April 16:

EUROPE'S STARVING YOUTH

To the New York Herald Tribune:

There is a new Pied Piper in Europe today, not the wry-mouthed, gay, tatterdemalion Pied Piper of the familiar legend, but the grim, gaunt, tight-lipped piper of death—death by famine and disease. But he, too, is leading the children away and leaving, as the original piper left, only crippled and deformed youngsters to tell what happened to their playmates.

It is in our administration's power to choke off this piper's tune, to silence the dismal dirge which is killing democratic Europe's new generations.

And yet we are letting the piper play on, we are letting the children die. We are doing this because men in authority have said that it would be strategically inadvisable to save them. These officials who oppose, and by their opposition block any effort to save the children from starvation, have not yet given one incontrovertible reason why such a program of relief would be prejudicial to our victory over Germany. They have not been able to give an incontrovertible reason because today no reason exists. Today, if not yesterday, when victory seemed less certain, the children of Europe are being led away by the piper of death through the same ageless blundering which doomed the children of Hamelin—official inertia.

The State Department does not, and cannot, answer persons who point out that the relief program in Greece has worked with great success, and a similar program in unoccupied France was equally successful until it was closed down. Not even the officials responsible for the blockade of European children argue their case from a humanitarian angle. No human being with anything but a mechanical heart would want to see any child starve to death in Belgium, in Norway, in Holland, in Poland, in France, or in any nation anywhere in the world. All the horrors of this decade of horrors have not hardened us yet to the suffering of small children.

From the humanitarian side, feeding the children is not and never will be a debatable question. The case is wholly argued in terms of "military and political expediency." And I agree that this is a time when military and political considerations must have priority over humane views for long-range objectives.

So let us look at it from a purely patriotic—that is to say a realistic—attitude.

What does it mean to us as Americans if millions of European children, the children of countries allied with us, the children of countries which have been throughout our history good friends, starve or go down from disease brought about by famine?

It has been said that no man can be a patriot on an empty stomach. Whether or not this is true, can any man be wholly devoted to the cause of the Allies when a blockade instituted by one of his allies and indorsed with silence by another is helping to starve his children to death? Can any man be expected to believe with all his mind and heart in the Four Freedoms when he sees the sponsors of these freedoms, the spokesmen for freedom from fear and freedom from want, depriving his children of bread? Can any man, however passionate his belief in democracy and his faith in a democratic victory, remain steadfast to the democratic cause—so steadfast that he is willing to die for it in a revolt timed with the opening of a second front—when his children are dying needlessly because they will not spare them a few crumbs?

Can any man who is daily bombarded by German propaganda to the effect that the British, with American consent, are countenancing the starvation of his children, and who knows that in this case Dr. Goebbels is speaking the bitter truth, preserve his devotion to the Allied cause and his conviction that it represents a more enlightened, more humane world order?

And what about the children, the children who never know for one day a moment's peace from the pangs of hunger, who haven't the strength to attend a full session of school, who see their playmates fall from malnutrition or cough out their lives with tuberculosis—that dread shadow of famine? What about the crippled children, the ones who have been deformed by starvation which began at birth, the weak, sickly, rickett-twisted youngsters of Belgium, France, Holland, Poland, and Norway and the other countries which have been crushed under the Nazi heel?

What, for instance, about the children of Belgium, 80 percent of whom, according to an authoritative source, are said to be in the pretubercular stage? What about the children of Poland, whose diet is said to be about 85 percent short of the required calories? What about the French, who are getting a maximum of 1,200 calories, 400 less than the amount the Germans themselves consider the frontier of famine?

What sort of citizens will all these youngsters make for the post-war world? How will their warped minds feel toward the so-called Christian democracies whose blockade warped their bodies? How will this generation of starvlings regard England and the United States in the year 1956? At best as liberators who came too late, at not-impossible worst as nations whose un-Christian military expediences equaled in evil effect the pagan, studied brutality of the Nazis. (Is there any doubt in any Christian's mind how Christ would have stood on the question of feeding the Christian children of Europe?)

Who will have won the war, as we now know wars are won, if the adequately fed youngsters of Germany face, 20 years from now, a thin line of crippled, stunted Norwegians, Belgians, Frenchmen, Hollanders, and Poles, with many gaps in the ranks to mark those who perished under the Nazi occupation and British blockade of the forties? Won't the last laugh, the final victory be the next Hitler's? What is in the minds of authorities who talk in one breath of wiping out Germans, and who in the next endorse a blockade which is effectively wiping out the next generation of their allies?

Would sending the proposed 51,000 tons of food a month to save 10,000,000 children and expectant mothers in occupied Europe lengthen the war by 1 day? The officials who mumble "strategically inadvisable" have not said that it would, and they cannot say that it would. Could such a program in any way benefit the Germans? Its worst enemies have admitted that exactly the same plan has enabled at least 3,000,000 Greeks to survive and has in no way aided the war effort of the Nazis.

Would it be an intolerable burden on the people of the United States? No, because many of the governments of countries which would receive aid have funds in this country to pay for all the cost of this relief work and are eager, terribly eager, to do so. They would rather spend their own money now to feed their starving children now than spend, under U. N. R. R. A., the American taxpayers' after those children are dead. Would the program divert valuable shipping from our war effort? No; neutral vessels, now idle, would be employed to ship the food. Would the program dip into the rations of our fighting men or our civilian population? It has been estimated that enough food is wasted in this country each year to feed 20,000,000 people. Scarce foods would not be sent, only those of which we have an abundance, supplemented by supplies from South Africa and South America which we do not have sufficient shipping to move for our own uses.

The plan does not call for the complete feeding of these children, but only for the supplying of additional nourishment necessary to maintain their health. They would continue to consume as much food from their own countries as Nazi rations and the available supplies permit. The effect of the blockade on Germany would in no way be lessened; it would only be less oppressive to our allies.

Senate Resolution 100, introduced by Senator GUY M. GILLETTE for himself and Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, has been reported out by the Committee on Foreign Relations and passed unanimously by the Senate. It states that the Senate "does express the conviction that immediate steps should be taken to extend the Greek experiment" by "the setting up of systematic and definite relief for all stricken and hungry countries." House Resolution 221, a resolution with the same purpose, introduced by Representative HAMILTON FISH, has been unanimously reported out of the Foreign Affairs Committee in the House of Representatives.

These resolutions express only the opinion and wish of the Congress. They do not have the effect of legislation. When passed, to be effective, they must have the backing of public opinion, outspoken and positive, and action, forceful action, by the administration. If the people of the United States insist that the children of Europe be fed, that they will not take an unexplained and unsupported statement that it is "strategically inadvisable," the relief ships will soon be sailing.

Sending food to these children cannot possibly jeopardize our certain victory over Germany. To fail the children now is, in the end, to fail ourselves and our fighting men, to write down our war aim of a democratic Europe. Each day we delay sending the food we are betraying more children—children who would have lived to be our friends and allies—to the Pied Piper of Death.

And one last question: Why, if it makes sense to feed as we do our Norwegian, Polish, French, Belgian, Dutch prisoners of war in Germany, is it wrong to feed the wives and children of those same prisoners outside of Germany?

In the name of a merciful God, I urge every one in this great and strong and Christian Nation of ours to plead with the administration for these innocent children of our allies.

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE.

The Hungry Horse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 3570, a bill to authorize the construction of the Hungry Horse Dam in northwestern Montana should come up within the next 10 days. Because of the importance of this measure to the people of Montana I am inserting in the RECORD material which will make more understandable the reasons for our concern over our water resources. It is our greatest resource and we are asking the Congress to give our plea its most serious and earnest consideration. The Hungry Horse Dam, if authorized, will give us security and allow us to build for a better and a greater Montana.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I offer the following newspaper article which appeared in the Montana Standard on April 7, 1944. It illustrates, on the basis of stream-flow studies, what our water resources are and how much of it is not being put to use but is allowed to go to waste.

MONTANA LOSES ENOUGH WATER EACH HOUR TO IRRIGATE ENTIRE SECTION

HELENA, April 6.— Enough water flows out of Montana every hour to irrigate a section of land throughout a normal irrigating season, Fred Buck, State engineer, said Thursday in a summary of stream-flow studies completed recently by the State water conservation board

"If all the water that escapes from Montana each year could be stored and used for irrigation," Buck said, "we could irrigate an additional 5,000,000 acres per year. That would be more than twice our present 2,000,000 irrigated acres."

Buck said tabulations of stream flow show that 56 percent of the State's total drainage in acre-feet is carried in the Columbia river tributary channels, which drain considerably less than half the State's total area. He said th Kootenai River, which rises in Canada and cuts across only a small northwestern corner of Lincoln County, carries 8,250,000-acre-feet of water annually, while the Clark's fork of the Columbia carries an additional 15,250,000 acre-feet, both emptying into the Columbia.

The combined flow of the Missouri and Yellowstone Rivers at the junction just across the border in North Dakota is 17,480,000 acre-feet annually, or 47 percent of the State total. Of this total, the Yellowstone carries 8,330,000 acre-feet and the Missouri 9,250,000 acre-feet.

Only a tiny portion, 710,080 feet annually, flows neither into the Columbia nor Missouri channels. This is carried by the St. Mary River, which rises in Glacier National Park and eventually empties into Hudson Bay.

Buck said a total of only 6,000,000 acre-feet out of the grand total of more than 32,000,000 acre-feet which annually leaves the State now is retained for irrigation purposes. He said recent snow surveys show the stored water supply in mountain snow piles is 81.2 percent of normal.

Robert Morss Lovett

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, many former neighbors and associates of Prof. Robert Morss Lovett in the Second Congressional District of Illinois heartily subscribe to the sentiments concerning him expressed in an editorial printed in the Washington Post on April 15, 1944, from which the following excerpts were taken. Likewise the appraisal of the character and service of Mr. Lovett as portrayed in the scroll presented to him by the citizens' organizations of the Virgin Islands coincides with their estimate of him as a public-spirited resident of the city of Chicago. I know those friends and admirers of Prof. Robert Morss Lovett heartily approve of the inclusion of this tribute of the citizens of the Virgin Islands in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

FOR THE RECORD

There appears to have been a difference of opinion respecting the character of Robert Morss Lovett between the Congress of the United States and the people of the Virgin Islands. Since the Virgin Islanders, whom he served and among whom he lived for 4½ years knew him rather better than the Members of Congress, their judgment of him seems worth recording. The united citizens' organizations of the islands presented to him and to Mrs. Lovett a scroll which read as follows:

"It having been our great pleasure and blessing to have you in our midst for nearly 5 years, it is with a deep sense of gratitude that on the eve of your departure from our shores we, the people of the Virgin Islands, tender to you this expression of our esteem.

"Our island home, our community, and, in no small measure, our own lives have been enriched by your faithful and devoted service and by your shining example of citizenship. Your zealous concern for the well-being of even the poorest citizen, your firm and unrelenting demands for justice to the humblest; your vigorous fight for the blessings of the 'four freedoms' for us, the people whom you chose to serve, will ever remain amongst our treasured memories.

"We are proud to have known you, to have worked with you, to have shared your dreams of a better Virgin Islands; proud to have your friendship; proud to have had the rare privilege of association with a lady and a gentleman.

"It is our earnest hope that you will find happiness wherever you may go and we know, sad though the loss of your presence may be, that you will still be with us in the many good and noble causes you championed and in those deeds of kindness which neither man nor time can efface.

"On behalf of a grateful people, reluctant to let you go, we subscribe ourselves."

The Tennessee Valley Authority

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up the cudgels just wielded by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] with reference to Republican candidates for President.

I have just seen one of them, Mr. Wendel L. Willkie, start out with great ballyhoo, with a world-wide "one world" background, and gradually retreat from the wilds of Wisconsin, as Gov. Bob Taylor, of Tennessee, once said: "With a hole in his vanity and his pride in a sling." Under the circumstances, I propose to leave the selection of a Republican candidate for President to the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle.

I want to speak for a moment on the McKellar amendment that was adopted by the Senate with reference to the Tennessee Valley Authority. The people I represent are very much concerned over that amendment. They feel that it would adversely affect the activities of the T. V. A. just at a time when it is doing the greatest job of any governmental agency that has ever been established. Twelve years ago, in 1932, the local power company was paying less than 2 mills a kilowatt-hour for electricity, wholesale, at Muscle Shoals and was selling it to the people I represent, that is to the domestic users, at an average of 10 cents a kilowatt hour.

Now we are paying 4.8 mills a k. w. h. wholesale for it, and last year the residential consumers of my home city paid an average of 1 cent per kilowatt-hour.

It is the greatest agency of its kind on earth; and I do not want to see it handicapped, injured, or destroyed.

Under permission to extend my remarks, I am inserting a resolution adopted by the city of Tupelo and one adopted by the city of Columbus:

RESOLUTION BY THE CITY OF TUPELO, MISS.

Whereas it has come to the attention of the mayor and Board of Aldermen of the City of Tupelo, Miss., that there is now pending in Congress a bill which, if enacted, would change the operation of the Tennessee Valley Authority; and

Whereas it is the opinion of this Board that this legislation would cripple the operation of the Tennessee Valley Authority and would vitally affect its usefulness, not only in this territory, but to the entire Nation; and

Whereas the great contribution that the Tennessee Valley Authority is now making to the war effort would be seriously endangered; and

Whereas under the original act, as passed by Congress, the Tennessee Valley Authority was ready when war came, and has met all the demands required of it by reason of the fact that the law gave them the right to make quick decisions and to conduct its program in a businesslike manner; and

Whereas this board has had considerable experience with the Tennessee Valley Authority and has found it to be one of the best conducted governmental agencies it has ever dealt with: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this board petition Members of Congress to vote against the McKellar amendments to the independent offices appropriation bill, which directly affect the Tennessee Valley Authority; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN with the expressed hope that he will use his influence to defeat this dangerous legislation.

This the 4th day of April 1944.

J. P. NANNEY,
Mayor of Tupelo, Miss.

Attest:

J. H. MERRITT, Clerk.

RESOLUTION BY THE CITY OF COLUMBUS, MISS.

Whereas the independent offices appropriation bill, as passed by the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States and amended by the Senate, provides that all of the revenues of the Tennessee Valley Authority shall be placed in the general fund of the Treasury Department, and that all funds expended by the Authority shall first be appropriated by Congress; and

Whereas the operations of the Tennessee Valley Authority have been very successful and of very great benefit to the territory served by the Authority, and it appears to the mayor and City Council of the City of Columbus, Miss., that the effect of the proposed change in the method of handling the Authority's funds will inevitably handicap the Authority in its operations and make it unable to act quickly in emergencies, which will result in inferior service to the many municipalities and cooperatives in its territory: Therefore be it

Resolved by the mayor and city council, That they go on record as believing that adoption of the amendment changing the method of handling the Authority's funds will not be for the best interests of the country as a whole, the Authority itself, or the customers served by the Authority, and may result in great hardship to the Authority and its customers; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each member of the conference committees considering the independent offices appropriation bill and to each Senator and Member of Congress from Mississippi.

The above is a true copy of a resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Columbus, Miss., at a meeting on April 11, 1944.

Mayor of Columbus, Miss.

Announcement of War Casualties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL R. LEWIS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention recently that telegrams from the War and Navy Departments announcing the death or serious wounding of boys in the armed forces are, in many places, delivered by taxicab services under contract with the telegraph companies. This practice has become so well known that relatives are stricken with fear and dread when they see uncalled taxicabs stopping in front of their homes.

One can readily imagine the feelings of a mother on seeing a taxicab stop in front of her home and the driver approach with a telegram. I am told by the owner of one of the taxicab services delivering these death messages in the county of my residence, Belmont County, Ohio, that it is not uncommon for mothers to faint or go into hysterics upon the receipt of such a telegram. The shock induced by the unannounced visit of the taxicab and the blunt conveyance of the death message in this manner is too much for the average person to stand.

It would seem entirely feasible for the War and Navy Departments to convey the sad news to shocked parents in some more humane manner, and I should like to suggest that, before a message announcing the death or serious wounding of a boy in the armed services is delivered to his parents they should be prepared gradually to receive the same; and I further suggest that this preparation should be made by the visit of a minister of the gospel, a preacher, a priest, or a rabbi to the home for the purpose of mentally preparing the relatives to receive the sad news. I understand that in some places ministers, priests, and rabbis have volunteered their services for such missions, and I am sure if a call were issued for this sort of service there is not a religious leader of the Christian or Jewish faiths who would not gladly welcome the opportunity to perform this humanitarian and patriotic service. I suggest that the War and Navy Departments use the services of preachers, priests, and rabbis for this purpose.

Mr. Bowles Has Made, and Is Making, Other Changes in the Administration of the Price Control Act by Simplifying and Reducing Paper Work To Aid Businessmen and the Public

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, improvement in the administration of the Emergency Price Control Act is making substantial headway under the management of Administrator Chester Bowles. A law of this type without any previous experience or guide to follow naturally would bring on misconceptions and errors of omission and commission of policy under the best administrations. With college professors having no practical business experiences, the errors of omission and commission would naturally be intensified.

Credit should be given to Administrator Bowles for his earnest endeavors to improve administration of the law and eliminate the complicated regulations, language which has been difficult even for lawyers to interpret. The numerous regulations, reports, and forms required of business have created no end of adverse reaction in face of the shortage of help. What has been available has been in many instances inefficient because of lack of experience.

It has naturally taken time to thoroughly digest the needs and survey all phases to bring relief to the businessman. Mr. Bowles has made some radical changes by bringing into his organization businessmen with practical experience. Moreover, he is proving a genuine sincerity in weeding out superfluous and cumbersome reports and forms which businessmen have been required to fill out. It is understandable, of course, how these have proved irksome with all the other problems of business incident to war conditions.

BANS 296 REPORTS AND FORMS

In 1 week in the recent past, for illustration, Mr. Bowles announced the discarding of 296 forms and reports of various kinds. These eliminations will materially simplify conditions under which businessmen have been operating in the past. This will take a load from their shoulders and reduce the amount of paper work to that extent. It shows tangible progress in the direction of relief to men engaged in business and affected by the operations of the Price Control Act.

It has required time and patient study by the O. P. A. personnel to make these changes as well as an appreciation on the part of Mr. Bowles that something is necessary to relieve businessmen already affected with many trying problems aside from complying with the Price Control Act.

Another illustration of the progress that is being made in curtailing paper work for business concerns is indicated in a letter from Howard D. Williams, treasurer of the Washington Mills Abrasive Co., of North Grafton, Mass. This letter is addressed to Mr. Edwin F. McConnell, of the Norton Co., of Worcester, Mass., chairman of the advisory committee, who helped to revise O. P. A. form on which business concerns all over the country make their financial operation costs each year:

"I thought you might be interested to know that we have just submitted our O. P. A. Form A for our year ending December 31, 1943," writes Mr. Williams to Mr. Norton.

SAVES DAYS OF WORK

Completion of this form from our records took just 1 hour. The data called for by O. P. A. in their previous requirements gave them no more significant information, but were called for in form that obliged us to spend days, not minutes, in their preparation.

As I believe you were a member of the committee which worked out and recommended the changed form, we want to congratulate you on the job done, and incidentally to add personal thanks.

Now will you start in on the income-tax mess.

Probably the severest critics of O. P. A. regulations, red tape, complex orders, amendments, inability to understand their meaning and because of the extra work forced on them trying to keep abreast of what was required of them, have been the retail grocers. Being a business operated by men almost exclusively they have been severely handicapped as their help has either gone to war or into defense work. This necessitated the employment of green help without any experience as a general rule.

TO SIMPLIFY RETAIL OPERATIONS

The Office of Price Administration has just announced what will be a radical change in policy affecting the explanation and enforcement of food price ceilings at retail which is now in the making. Through this policy it is planned to more thoroughly sell the retailers the idea of price control through an educational program showing the need for these regulations.

Any amendment that is issued which affects retail pricing will be accompanied by what O. P. A. terms a "retailer bulletin" which will explain the action to the retailer. Under this plan to be instituted at once after the lawyer drafts an amendment, the price specialist will explain in writing just what the action means to retailers. Following this an O P. A. staff writer will put that explanation into a retailer bulletin. This will be prepared before the amendment is cleared for announcement. When these bulletins are printed they will be distributed to regional and district O. P. A. offices for further distribution to the trade.

The resulting effect of this is that retailers, and especially those in classes 1 and 2 representing merchants doing the smallest volume of business, will obtain information in language they can readily understand in place of copies of legal orders. The reasons behind this drastic move are threefold:

First. Simple understandable regulations;

Second. Perform a careful and intelligent job of educating the retailer; and Third. Enforce regulations strictly when necessary.

RECOGNIZES NEED OF BETTER JOB

The O. P. A. recognizes that the better job that is done on the first and second, the trouble encountered with the third will be reduced in proportion, and better results accomplished. The effect is simple regulations, give the retailer a simple and easy method of following price controls, community ceilings will be easier for the retailers, consumers and O. P. A. examiners will know what top prices are, price panels will be better able to correct errors through friendly education rather than an enforcement threat, with an index of price controls the retailer can tell at a glance what mark-up or price may be charged, what regulation applies, and which retailer bulletin explains it.

Another innovation that reduces work for retailers is the issuance of tokens as change for ration stamps. This plan speeds up buying by the housewife and reduces the time involved for retailers in waiting on their customers.

Still another change that has just been instituted for the good and convenience of both store patrons and merchants is the abandonment of expiration dates for ration stamps. Under the former plan, housewives were much concerned about expiration dates of red and blue stamps. They frequently lost track of the dates or the type of stamps whether for processed foods or meats. In addition, there was always a rush to redeem stamps at the last minute which caused confusion in stores and delay in serving patrons. Moreover, this eases up the strain on retailers with limited help.

AID TO FARMERS

A further move is in the direction of helping farmers and those who patronize farmers in the purchase of meats. To enable such buyers to purchase in larger quantities they are now permitted to use two series of ration stamps for each ration book instead of one to obtain meat from the farmers.

Here, Mr. Speaker, we have a number of illustrations to show the improvements that have taken place in the efforts of Administrator Bowles to adopt more practical ways to administer the Emergency Price Control Act to relieve the strain upon business, to recognize their difficulties due to the war, and also to assist consumers in doing their marketing.

Life Line to Victory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

RE POPE EDITORIAL

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include editorial entitled "Life Line to Victory," which appeared in Il Progresso Italo-Americano on January 18, 1944, at the beginning of the Fourth War Loan drive. Il Progresso Italo-Americano is one of the most influential newspapers in the city of New York, and has a very large circulation throughout the city and area.

LIFE LINE TO VICTORY—APPEAL TO ITALO-AMERICANS

As chairman of the Italian section of the New York State War bond drive, I am taking this occasion to address myself to all Americans of Italian origin. To us this War bond campaign is not a matter of merely lending some unspent money, some idle dollars, to our Government. We will be throwing ourselves into this War bond drive even more enthusiastically and energetically than we have done in any of the previous campaigns. We are now on one of the last laps of the race to overtake and overwhelm the mortal enemy of all that is decent and humane, the savage foe of all that we cherish and value as civilization. In the preceding War loan campaign our efforts and results won the admiration and commendation of our Government authorities and national leaders. Nearly $50,000,000 of War bonds were bought by Americans of Italian extraction throughout the State of New York.

Nearly a million Americans of Italian extraction are now fighting side by side with many of their kinsmen living in Italy. In closed ranks, these heroic sons of Italian lineage are today battling against a common enemy—the Teutonic barbarians inside Italy, the hordes of Hirohito in the Pacific. The soil of the Roman peninsula is now being hallowed with the blood of our beloved sons, brothers, and fathers in American uniform and with the blood of the inhabitants of Italy itself. In the infernal heat of battle there are being welded the forces which will bring victory to both peoples and cement their lasting friendship.

In the Fourth War Loan drive, we Americans of Italian descent have a twofold inspiration. Every dollar we lend our Government helps our cherished land of adoption, the United States, to preserve and expand its democratic institutions. It is these institutions which have meant so much to us in opportunity to fulfill our hopes and live a better and fuller life. At the same time, every War bond we now buy hastens the day of full independence for Italy, insures the revival of freedom for the Italian people and their restoration to a place of dignity and honor among the great nations of the world. What nobler ideals, what higher goals, could inspire us than to serve at one and the same time America and liberated Italy? America, land of realized promises, the land of dreams come true, and hopes attained for curselves and our offspring. And Italy, the land of our forefathers, the soil that has nursed and nurtured so many illustrious sons of all mankind.

In this vein I speak to my fellow Italo-Americans. I know I am telling them only what they feel deep down in their hearts. All of us aspire to ever greater happiness. In fighting for the preservation of this right to the pursuit of happiness, every one of us is inspired and guided by Mazzini, that stalwart champion of Italian freedom and human welfare, when he told the world: "The sole origin of every right is in a duty fulfilled." I might well add: And the greater the right, the higher the duty. It is in this spirit that I appeal to all Italo-Americans to show the way and buy more War bonds today. In this plea I am only translating into inadequate words their own warmest feelings and strongest convictions, their own clearest thoughts and finest ideals.

To us who have come to America's shores to escape back-breaking poverty and soul-crushing want, to those of us who have found in the United States a haven from fear and tyranny, the fourth War bond campaign is a stirring confirmation and timely reminder of an undying universal truth. Liberty is not a drug which someone can prescribe for us. It is a living plant of slow and difficult growth which demands constant care and continuous cultivation by all of us. Fully aware of this immortal truth and deeply aroused by the grave Axis menace to our own freedom, as well as to the rights and freedom of the Italian and all other liberty-loving peoples, we Italo-Americans will go all out to help our country go well over the top in this drive.

When our country's needs are greater, our own efforts and deeds must be greater. The time to buy more War bonds is today. Postponed efforts will never win us a lasting and just peace. No two words can be more terribly bitter than "too late." The more we will suppor' the attack, the sooner will our loved ones be back—triumphantly from Italy, from the Pacific, and from all the far-flung battle fronts.

It is with joy and pride that I say to the Italo-American community: Americans of Italian origin have done it well before and will do even better now. To assure victory in 1944, we will buy War bonds more and more. Let us all do our best to speed the day of freedom's triumph over Axis barbarism.

GENEROSO POPE,
State Chairman, War Bond Committee for Americans of Italian Origin.

The IV–F Draft Classification

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL R. LEWIS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor at this time to call to the attention of the House the situation with which boys who are placed by Selective Service in the classification of IV–F are confronted.

These boys have been placed in the deferred class because of physical disability and yet the average person has no means of knowing whether a boy is deferred because of a bad heart, for instance, or is evading military service; consequently, many of these boys placed in IV–F are constantly being harassed by well-meaning people who, seeing a boy not in uniform make remarks in his hearing or even bluntly ask him why he is not in uniform and always with the implication that he is a slacker or one who is not doing his duty.

This is, of course, utterly unjust to these IV–F boys and yet it is a perfectly natural, human reaction at the sight of such boys out of uniform. For the purpose of correcting this situation I therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Selective Service adopt a button or other insignia to be worn by the boy who is classified in IV–F by which he will be identified as one who is not in uniform because of the rules of Selective Service and who, therefore, is manifestly not a coward or slacker or willfully evading service in the armed forces of our country.

I understand that the Selective Service contemplates the drafting of IV–F boys into some sort of labor battalions and I should like to suggest that, if this is done, these boys should not be required to work in civilian clothes and be subjected to the taunts and sarcasm and humiliating remarks of those with whom they come in contact and should be placed in some sort of uniform to identify them as men serving in labor battalions or in limited service but, nevertheless, in the service of their country.

I sincerely trust that the War and Navy Departments will recognize the wisdom of the suggestions I have just made and put the same into actual practice as speedily as possible where IV–F boys are inducted into the service.

American Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER E. MERROW

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in the New York Times, April 16, 1944:

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

The voice of America assumed new authority in world affairs during the past week when Secretary Hull, supplemented by Assistant Secretary Long, spoke up to explain anew the foundations, the aims, the ideals, and the limitations of American foreign policy. They were speaking on the eve of great events, when the American Nation is preparing to lay its greatest sacrifices on the altar of victory and peace. The program to which they gave eloquent support rises above partisan clamor or special pleading, and the general satisfaction with which it has been received both here and abroad is reassuring. Moreover, as Mr. Hull emphasized, this program is advanced by a nation which is speaking not from weakness but from strength. It is to be hoped that it will carry appropriate weight in the London conferences attended by Mr. Stettinius as this country's ranking representative.

The program does not pretend either to lay down the law or to solve all problems of the world. But it does outline the fundamental premises from which we must proceed, the immediate and ultimate goals for which we strive, and the most hopeful methods of attaining them. The fundamental premises are: First, that the full diplomatic power of the United States must be committed to the military necessities of total victory through cooperation with our allies, and that this must determine in the first instance every diplomatic step we take; second, that the American foreign policy must express as nearly as possible the will of the 135,000,000 people of America who give this policy its force, but also determine its possibilities and its limitations. The goals are: First, total victory and the complete overthrow of nazism, fascism, and Japanese jingoism; second, the earliest possible restoration of order and stability through strong, progressive, and popular governments dedicated neither to revolution or reaction, but to democratic achievement and, third, a democratic world organization of sovereign nations based on the power of the United States, the British Commonwealth, Russia, and China, but embracing all nations, large and small, for the maintenance of peace, the settlement of international disputes, and the promotion of a free and expanding economy as the best means of social and political progress. The methods for attaining these goals are not unilateral action or national power politics but united and agreed action based on a reign of law and morality and the harmonizing of the real interests of the four big powers which must assume responsibility for the program.

This, in general, is the program of the Atlantic Charter and the declarations of Moscow and Teheran. These are neither pious platitudes, as some scoffers would have us think, nor are they an immutable code of law. But they do represent the fundamental objectives of this Nation. Mr. Hull specifically warns that any proposal is dangerous for us and misleading to others if it does not find the sanction of popular support in this country. To this Mr. Long adds that we will not permit the armed forces of this country to be used for the support of any group or any government contrary to the will of the people.

As Mr. Hull repeatedly emphasizes, the chances and effectiveness of this program depend on agreement among the Allies and among the American people themselves. To attain the former, numerous inter-Allied commissions and conferences are now at work. To attain the latter, Mr. Hull has invoked the aid and advice of a bipartisan group of Congress in order to avoid the mistakes following the last World War. He is fully aware that this is a slow and difficult process, but he prefers to let the necessary agreements grow slowly and organically, and he can furnish solid evidence that we are making progress by this method.

Problem of the Press—I

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Times of April 4:

PROBLEM OF THE PRESS—I

Wisconsin today is in the news because of its Presidential primary. That makes this a good day to call attention to a problem in the relationship of newspapers to politics that was brought into focus in connection with this primary.

When Wendell Willkie was campaigning for Wisconsin delegates the Times assigned its Washington reporter, Robert E. Kennedy, to cover the news of Willkie's tour. Other newspapers also had correspondents on the story.

It was all in the day's work. Yet we were criticized and by—of all sources—the editor of another newspaper. The newspaper is the Daily Herald, of Merrill, Wis., and the editor is Mr. Walt Chilsen. Mr. Chilsen declared that by assigning reporters to Mr. Willkie's tour we were "magnifying (Willkie's) utterances out of all proportion." He also talked about "a conspiracy on the part of New Deal newspapers." In the group besides the Times were the Milwaukee Journal, the New York Times, the Christian Science Monitor, and others with which it had been a practice to cover important political events.

It puzzled us that an editor should talk that way.

FACTS CLEAR UP OUR PUZZLEMENT

Our puzzlement began to lift after we discovered some facts. Fact No. 1 was that Editor Chilsen was a candidate for Presidential delegate in the Wisconsin primary. He was running for the office under the designation "Anti-Willkie." Fact No. 2 was that he is recognized as a "veteran Republican leader." Fact No. 3 was that the vice chairman of the Republican organization in this particular Wisconsin county is a Joseph A. Chilsen, whose address is "care of the Merrill Herald."

We asked ourselves: "In what capacity was Mr. Chilsen speaking? As a newspaper editor, or as a political figure?"

If he were speaking as newspaper editor, the implications of his remarks did not make sense—certainly not in accord with our understanding of the purposes of newspapers. But if he spoke as "anti-Willkie candidate" his remarks did make sense—but it would be political sense, not newspaper sense.

We could stop here, if all that was important was just to clarify this one incident, if our point were merely to answer criticism. The incident, in itself, is not any mountain, and we are not so thin-skinned that we fret over criticism.

But this matter does raise an issue, one that hasn't had much attention from this generation at least, one that ought to be faced by all newspapers, and by the public in whose service newspapers are supposed to be dedicated. The issue is: How closely associated with party politics and with the actual administration of government is it proper for a newspaper to be under the freedom the people have given the press?

Phrased another way, the issue is: If the press is to perform its proper function, should there not be an inviolable separation between the press and government?

It may be argued that a newspaper owner or editor has as much right to engage in active politics, or to hold public office, as any other citizen.

It may be argued that newspaper owners have held the highest offices, and the country has not gone to the dogs.

It can be pointed out, too, that it had been traditional in this country for newspapers to "pick" candidates for office, from local officials to the President of the United States.

Some newspaper offices have been busier as political headquarters than as purveyors of news.

TWO-TIMING RAISES SERIOUS PROBLEM

All this is familiar in American politics. It may even be conceded that it is all under the heading of accepted practice. Certainly there is nothing immoral or illegal in a newspaper proprietor or editor leading the double life of journalist and politician or of journalist and office-holder.

In individual cases, such two-timing may be precisely the right thing at a particular time.

But if the press generally, through multiplication of such individual cases, should become so entwined and mixed up with politics and office-holding that it is not at all separate from Government, but gets into Government through its political satellites, haven't we a serious problem on our hands?

The Times believes there is a problem here. It thanks the Wisconsinite for his criticism, because that brought up the subject. The Times believes this problem gets to the vitals of why freedom of the press is—and must be—a constitutionally guaranteed part of our Government's system. We'll go into that in another editorial.

Radio Address to the People of the District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address made by me over Station WNBF on April 15, 1944:

Dear friends of the triple cities and my congressional district, at this time, I think it only right to thank my sponsors, the patriotic women of the Hall Furlough Clubs for their undying interest in the principles they have espoused. They are doing a wonderful job winning this war and building up morale, not only on the home front but among the servicemen.

Some of the clubs have circulated petitions during the past few days among various plants and factories in the district. I have already received petitions bearing over a thousand names and am presenting them to Congress each day as they are sent to me by club members.

The petitions read as follows:

"To the Congress of the United States:

"We the undersigned members of the Hall Furlough Clubs of America and friends do hereby petition your honorable body to pass H. R. 1504, otherwise known as the Hall furlough bill, introduced in the Seventy-eighth Congress by Congressman EDWIN ARTHUR HALL."

Not long ago, someone wrote me from Johnson City and asked me if I approved the work the Hall Furlough Clubs are doing. She also asked me if I am a member of a club.

Yes; I wrote back to her, I heartily approved of the work these clubs are doing. Any American can do no less than approve of their high and noble objectives. Who would disapprove of the clubs' effort to help the servicemen?

Who would be so unpatriotic as to ridicule the sincere, honest Americans who belong to the Hall Furlough Clubs whose main objective is to obtain free furlough transportation for our soldiers, sailors, and marines? Who would be so dumb as to want to stand in the way of the members who are doing so much to help on the home front, to assist the loved ones and families of our fighting men?

No, I am not a member of this worthy organization, I continued, but I wish I were. Moreover, I would certainly join if I could. However, I understand these good ladies have barred men from membership which is probably a good thing. Anyway, they seem to be doing all right without me. They have won some good fights and tell me they are ready for any more that come their way.

At any rate, I am certainly grateful to them for their able defense of me when I have been wantonly and scurrilously attacked. They must know how much I am indebted to them for their aid and also for this time on the radio.

So, naturally, I approve of their activities and I am pleased they approve of mine. Although I am not permitted to join any of these splendid groups because of their by-laws, that doesn't mean I am anything but solidly behind them and am very much interested in their future course. I know they will continue to grow and expand, thereby becoming an even greater force for good for the reason they are larger.

In these days of frustration and despair, of discouragement and heartache, you and I must look to our Creator for strength and support. In the hour of tribulation, what is more appropriate than the solace and comfort of the Twenty-third Psalm:

"The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for Thou art with me: Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: Thou anointest my head with oil, my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever."

Problem of the Press—II

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Times of April 8:

PROBLEM OF THE PRESS—II

Why do we have freedom of the press? Why did the people, in our founding days, insist on getting for the business of publishing a specific protection in our Constitution that no other enterprise has?

These questions are asked here in connection with a previous editorial that raised the issue about two-timing newspaper owners and editors. By two-timing, we mean functioning as publishers of news and also as participants in political organizations—sometimes being part of government itself.

GOVERNMENTAL REASON FOR FREE PRESS

Some people may believe that a free press is protected in our Constitution simply for a humanistic reason—because it is right to allow people to express themselves. That is one good reason, but it's not the major reason. The major reason is governmental.

The press is really, although not formally, one of our branches of government, in a sense comparable to the sense that the executive, the legislative, and the judicial units are branches. The press has a definite function in government—to check on all other branches.

The importance of freedom of the press consists, besides the advancement of truth, science, morality, and arts in general, in its diffusion of liberal sentiments on the administration of government; its ready communication of thoughts between subjects, and its consequential promotion of union among them, whereby oppressive officers are shamed or intimidated into more honorable and just modes of conducting affairs.

The above is the first written definition of freedom of the press by an American Congress. It was included in a communication addressed to the people of Quebec, Canada, by the First Continental Congress in 1774.

The quotation shows that the early Americans understood clearly the relationship between the press and government. The relationship combines that of a brake and a goad.

To the extent that it is functioning healthily, the press is the people's major instrument of public opinion.

In all governments, and especially in democratic forms, public opinion is the only continuous means of checking, supporting or correcting government. As Thomas Jefferson once wrote to Lafayette:

"* * * the only security of all is in a free press. The force of public opinion cannot be resisted, when permitted to be expressed."

Much of the struggle that went on in old England between the crown and the people, a struggle that carried over into the American colonies, was over publication of opinions of government—even writing them in a private petition to the king himself, for that matter—without danger of prosecution for libel against the crown.

FORTIFIED FREEDOM DEMANDED, OR ELSE

In this country, even with a republican form of government established, the people still felt that they needed protection from oppressive officers, in addition to that offered by the system of elections at set intervals. That is why they insisted that in their Constitution freedom of the press be impregnably fortified, to use a phrase of Washington's. That is why the Constitution had to be amended. In its original form it came close to being rejected by the States because a Bill of Rights, specifically mentioning freedom of the press, had not been included.

The people were not merely interested in seeing that some fellow citizens had the right to publish on just any old subject. They were more interested in a press that would check the Government. As Madison said, "a free press is one of the ways in which the people communicate their will to governments."

Can a press that is dominated by men who are as much politicians as they are journalists, whose publishing offices are really political headquarters, who themselves are in government or are silent partners or bosses of mayors, governors, Congressmen, and Senators—can such a press be said to be wholly fulfilling the responsibility that goes with freedom of the press? We believe not.

If a newspaper "owns" a public official—or a group of office holders—how can it be their sponsor in a partisan sense and at the same time their censor in the sense of being critic on behalf of the people? If a political newspaper's satellites in government become the oppressive officers who must be shamed or intimidated into more honorable conduct, it is apparent the newspaper runs out on the public by its association with them and their misconduct.

Review of Out of Debt, Out of Danger in Free America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD a review of my book, Out of Debt, Out of Danger, which recently appeared in the magazine Free America, edited by Herbert Agar and others.

Free America carries on its masthead the following statement:

Free America stands for individual independence and believes that freedom can exist only in societies in which the great majority are the effective owners of tangible and productive property and in which group action is democratic. In order to achieve such a society, ownership, production, population, and government must be decentralized.

Against this background I am specially gratified at the review given my book in this fine magazine and because I believe so earnestly in the message the book carries and the program outlined therein, I am including it here with my remarks.

OUT OF DEBT, OUT OF DANGER

(By JERRY VOORHIS, Devin-Adair Co., New York, N. Y., $1)

We will just forget, for the purpose of this little composition, the tall talk that is going around about making the whole world a better place to live in after the war, and focus our sights for the moment on a little section of it that we know something about—the United States of our own America. For it's a very safe bet if we can't do anything about improving our segment of the globe we won't be able to do much about binding up the wounds and effacing the scars of the rest of the bloody world.

Of plans for post-war prosperity we have plenty running from the slightly more than fantastic to the considerably worse than futile, and they all have one great weakness in common; nobody is quite sure where the money is going to come from to implement the schemes. True, our wartime producers will, many of them, have ample funds for reconversion to peacetime output, and, true, many enterprises, large and small, have in mind new and improved products that will add greatly to the comfort and convenience of life. But when it comes to the problem of finding a continuing and expanding market for these products, the question of a continuous flow of consumer purchasing power is the first to arise.

For the simple truth is that with everything in our favor and with very little debt to drain off our national income in taxes, we weren't able to maintain that flow in purchasing power in 1929, and we were never able to prime it back into an adequate stream with all of the New Deal measures until a new war came along to blast out the barrier of an inadequate money supply.

The fault, as Congressman VOORHIS sees it, lies in the fact that Congress has long since abdicated its constitutional right to "coin money and regulate the value thereof" to the privately owned banking system of the Nation.

And until Congress by its own act restores to itself that function, our economy will be nothing but a series of alternating booms and depressions, with each succeeding panic a little worse, and lasting longer than the one that preceded it.

The book, Out of Debt, Out of Danger is complete not only as a masterly analysis of the causes of all past depressions, but in that it points out the steps that can be taken now to avoid those that darken the horizon of tomorrow. To pay all or a large part of the costs of the war as we fight it, to establish a reservoir of purchasing power available for immediate post-war purchases, to insure an adequate supply of sound money commensurate with our expanding economy, to remove at the root the factors that threaten to cause inflation, seems like an order too big to ever be filled. Yet Mr. Voorhis has already introduced into Congress two bills that can represent a major step toward the fulfillment of these desirable ends.

If you think it makes sense for the Government to pay interest to the banking institutions on money that the Government loans to itself to finance the war—which is all that it amounts to—then you might find Out of Debt, Out of Danger a little disturbing to your complacency. If you think that America should be able to consume what it can produce in peace, as well as in war, any time and all the time that its citizens are willing to work for a living Out of Debt, Out of Danger will show you how it can be done—and fast.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, an excellent editorial appeared in the Washington Post of Sunday, April 16, 1944, relative to the Price Control Act. I feel it is worth reproducing. Therefore, under the permission granted me I include it as a part of my remarks:

DANGEROUS TINKERING

The fact that the Price Control Act expires at the end of this year has made it necessary for Congress to pass legislation providing for its extension. As we had feared, an opportunity has thus far been afforded for various organized groups to urge amendments that would seriously impair the effectiveness of O. P. A.'s program. Testifying before the House Banking and Currency Committee last week, Price Administrator Bowles mentioned three proposed changes that he rightly considers particularly damaging.

Heading the list is a proposal to strike out the word "generally" from the text of the present law requiring ceiling prices to be "generally fair and equitable." The effect of that omission would be to compel O. P. A. to fix maximum prices for specific products at levels that would guarantee reasonable returns to the highest-cost producer, no matter how inefficient he might be. Such a proposal would boost price ceilings to cover marginal production costs, thereby giving extra high profits to lower-cost producers. Mr. Bowles explained that companies unable to make a profit under existing price regulations can ask O. P. A. for relief. Then, if the output of the high-cost marginal producer is considered essential, he can be given relief in the form of a subsidy. But it would be a costly sort of folly for the Government to fix prices so high as to assure every individual businessman a profit regardless of his efficiency. Such a policy, according to Mr. Bowles, would spell the death knell of private enterprise. Suggestions to split price-control functions among various Government agencies are also frowned upon by the Price Administrator, while the proposal to throw open all courts to complainants against O. P. A. would, in his opinion, lead to price chaos, insurmountable delays, and contradictory rulings in various parts of the country.

No doubt all the amendments now under consideration are the outcome of grievances, sometimes fancied but often quite real. However, the redress of wrongs resulting from mistakes of policy in the administration of price-control legislation cannot be taken care of satisfactorily by sweeping amendments to the law that tie the hands of officials and prevent them from administering the price-control program discriminatingly and intelligently. Abundant room must be left for the exercise of administrative judgment in order to make the price-control system responsive to changing needs and to allow for exceptional cases calling for special treatment. Officials in charge of the program must be trusted with large discretionary powers; otherwise they are sure to fall down miserably on the job. The best guaranty of effective enforcement lies in permitting Mr. Bowles to continue to function under the law as it now stands. If he were to be forced into a legislative strait jacket by passage of the type of amendments here discussed, his usefulness would be destroyed.

Free Ports for Refugees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Samuel Grafton, from the Washington Evening Star of April 15, 1944:

I'D RATHER BE RIGHT—UNITED STATES CAN INVOKE NEW SYSTEM OF "FREE PORTS" TO CARE FOR REFUGEES

(By Samuel Grafton)

We need a system of free ports for refugees. These would be reservations, fenced and guarded, which any person could enter without formality, no matter how homeless or stateless he might be. Until we set up free ports for refugees we shall be asking the refugee to stand on one foot while we solve his problem, a position in which a man can wait just so long, and a child less.

No rights would be acquired by anyone who entered such a reserved area, except the right to sit down, which is a rare right at the present moment in civilization's majestic march. By an easy legal fiction, entrance into a free port would not constitute legal entrance into the country and stay in the free port would not constitute residence in the country.

We have used this same legal fiction to establish free ports for goods. For reasons much too dull to tell you about here, these are of great advantage to our foreign trade in time of peace.

FREE PORT IN NEW YORK

There is a functioning free port in the New York City area, into which foreign merchandise and alien corn can be brought without payment of customs duties, parked for a while, then transshipped elsewhere. The stuff can stay here for a year without ever being considered to be in the country, and if we can use a legal fiction to make a dollar, we ought to be able to use a similar legal fiction to save a life.

There are practical difficulties in the way of such a scheme, because storage facilities for living women and children have to be a bit more complex than storage facilities for wine and corsets.

Yet these difficulties are hardly great enough to stun the human imagination. Any Army camp scheduled for early abandonment might do, or a fence could be put around some of the excess housing facilities we have built in eastern industrial areas.

As to what agency would run the free port for refugees, the answer is, of course, the new War Refugee Board. With such a free port in its pocket, the War Refugee Board would be in a position to go to other members of the United Nations and ask them to establish similar facilities, and it could not be turned down. The burden would thus be distributed around the world.

POT AND KETTLE REMARKS

But if we ask other nations to set up facilities while we do not, the answer is going to be a low, leering laugh, accompanied by remarks about the pot and the kettle, etc.

There are legal difficulties too. But we are entertaining 130,000 Nazi prisoners of war at the moment in this country, and not one has entered under the quota. It is true that prisoners of war have certain established rights, including the right to a safe haven, where nobody shall "make funny" with them. But can we really argue, with shabby earnestness, that the innocent victims of these Nazis are not entitled to equal rights with their deadly and malicious enemies?

If we cannot give our friends at least the same rights we give our enemies, then a host of questions are raised, including whither are we drifting and what is wrong with our heads.

COULD BE PICKED OVER

The refugees could be visited by consular and other officials of their own nations in these free ports, they could be investigated, picked over, and perhaps, in time, outfitted with papers and thus gradually raised to the lofty level of legal existence, as distinguished from the inconsequential level of mere physical existence.

Meanwhile, those Americans who do not want refugees here could have the assurance that they were not legally here at all; while Americans of a more humanitarian turn of mind and heart could have the assurance that refugees were being cared for and this is, therefore, a democratic solution, in harmony with the traditional ingenuity and resourcefulness of Anglo-Saxon law making.

As one looks it over, it seems, also, to be a fairly repulsive solution. But that is all the refugees ask for—a repulsive solution. Can we give them less?

Mr. Trimble on His Birthday

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I present for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following poem, a tribute of affection to South Trimble on his birthday from one of his old friends:

MR. TRIMBLE ON HIS BIRTHDAY

'Mid an avalanche of flowers,
Handiwork of shines and showers,
Mr. Trimble, in his office,
Entertained his friends today,
Who called in, with smiling faces,
To enjoy, with him, his vases,
Filled with floral effervescence,
And their heart respects to pay
To this honored friend of theirs,
Who grows grander with the years.

Mr. Trimble's great admirers,
Many of them, were inquirers,
In their own hearts, of his silent
True philosophy of life;
But no one dared ask the question,
Openly, or by suggestion—
His philosophy of silence
Strengthened him in every strife—
Master of himself, he stands,
Meeting squarely right's demands.

Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that the following open letter written by E. C. McKibben, of Ashtabula, Ohio, is of sufficient importance to include in the RECORD. Under unanimous consent, I include it with my remarks herewith:

EXCERPTS FROM AN OPEN LETTER TO MR. RUSSELL WEISMAN, ECONOMIST-COLUMNIST, CLEVELAND, OHIO, BY E. C. M'KIBBEN, R. F. D. NO. 4, ASHTABULA, OHIO

ASHTABULA, OHIO, February 21, 1944.

DEAR MR. WEISMAN: You will pardon my intruding on your time, but as a reader of your column I have reached the point where I cannot help but foam over. Not just for any personal relief the foaming might cause, but with the most sincere hope that something I may say might in some way help maintain the solvency of this Nation and, therefore, help perpetuate a free America. At the same time being honest with the boys and girls who are staking their lives for this purpose, as well as those on the home front.

Your position that this or that "is inflationary," without any explanation of whether it is bank-book inflation or money inflation, or whether something inflationary, if properly controlled, might not be beneficial and desirous, is hard to understand.

Putting additional money into actual circulation increases the supply and decreases its value—purchasing power—per dollar. It is in this manner that the dollar value of all raw material, real estate, and some other consumer goods are increased. This is inflationary.

Deflation is the same process in reverse. In early 1920 a bushel of wheat—raw material—would buy $2. After the abrupt withdrawal of billions of dollars of the Nation's medium of exchange it would buy about 60 cents and a ten- or twelve-thousand-dollar property could be purchased for $4,000 to $6,000 or less.

The Nation's currency problem is much like an automobile tire. With the tire there is a poundage point of air pressure that is sufficient to carry the load for which it was designed and at the same time not be injurious to the tire structure. A substantial increase or decrease—inflation or deflation—from this point is injurious to the tire and means disaster for all concerned.

With the Nation's currency in circulation there is a dollar point, although not so definitely defined as in the case of the tire-poundage point. This point represents an amount sufficient to purchase all consumer goods needed, pay for a reasonable amount of luxuries and amusement, amortize personal debts, and pay all taxes, this at a rate of spending—velocity of dollar turn-over—by the people that they establish, according to their faith or fear, at that particular time.

It was the abrupt withdrawal of billions of dollars, below this point, and maintaining this low currency level that caused and maintained the panic of the decade preceding this war. This was augmented by the refusal to grant new, and the calling of outstanding bank loans—$20,000,000,000 worth—at a time when there was not money enough in circulation to meet the demands. Hence the wholesale bankruptcy, jobless millions, soup kitchens, and bread lines in a land of plenty.

It would have been just as intelligent to have sabotaged the lake shipping by dredging the Niagara River, above the Falls, to a point that would have lowered the water level of Lake Erie 10 feet.

Millions, many millions of dollars have been spent for boats, wharves, dock machinery, and channel dredging in the justified belief that this level will be maintained.

This is the part you fail to mention. The Government gives the bank an interest-bearing bond running for 30 or 40 years, the bank makes a deposit entry on their books in the amount of the bond and permits the Government to issue synthetic money (checks) in this amount. The synthetic money (checks) is dead in 30 or 40 days. But the taxpayer must continue to pay taxes to pay interest, on this dead synthetic money for the life of the bond.

This practice is dishonest, unpatriotic, and economically unsound.

If the school board of your city was to hire a group of teachers, promising to pay them their salary for 30 years and only require their services for 30 days, I am sure you would be one of the first to point to this economically unsound practice. So why keep quiet just because it's the Government and the big money interests indulging in the same practice?

They call it credit money. But you know, and I know, that there is no such thing as credit as a commodity that can be bought or sold, loaned or borrowed. Credit is purely a condition attached to an individual, corporation, or government, just as much so as their politics or religion and cannot be transferred to anyone else. Credit is determined by the ability plus the willingness—past reputation—to pay, of the individual, corporation or government in question.

If an individual gives his note for 1 year to a bank for a substantial amount, and as security gives a mortgage on his home, his farm, or business and receives a check book, he is credited on the bank's books as having made a deposit of the amount in question.

If the borrower promptly checks out the full amount, he and the bank in cooperation have coined that much synthetic money (checks) and put it into circulation. If these checks (synthetic money) return to the home bank and are canceled in 10 days, then the entire transaction is dead so far as money in circulation is concerned. Although the bank still carries the amount in question on their books as a deposit. This was never a money deposit. It was a deposit of the home, the farm, or the business of the borrower, or an equity therein, and when the amount was checked out it became a deficit deposit. The same procedure is also true when the Government issues bonds to a bank.

Of course, you will probably lead off with a flow of banker mythology—that, to issue a check puts new money into circulation which goes on and on to—nobody knows where—but is still in circulation long after the check is dead.

To those who would argue this point we would ask—why, if an individual deposits $1,000 in the bank or the Government $1,000,000 cash, that when the individual has checked out $1,000 or the Government $1,000,000 the deposit will be promptly removed from the books, but when the individual deposits a note for $1,000 running for 1 year or the Government sells the bank a bond for $1,000,000 payable in 30 years which is placed on deposit and they each promptly check out their respective amounts and the checks are canceled, that in the case of the individual the deposit is carried for 1 year or until the note is paid and the Government's deposit is carried for 30 years?

When did a Government check for $1,000,000 become of so much value to the American people that they should be required to pay $2,000,000 in 30 years for the use of a $1,000,000 check for 30 days when they could have had the use of $1,000,000 United States money for 30 years for the cost of printing the money, which would be no more than printing the bonds? And as Thomas Edison said "If the Government can issue a dollar bond it can issue a dollar bill. What makes the bond good makes the bill good."

This banker mythology that claims that new money is put in circulation when a check is issued and stays in circulation long after the check has been canceled is why President Roosevelt could not successfully prime the pump with all the ingenious alphabetical inventions to get people on the Government pay roll—when the checks were canceled he did not even have the primings.

There is a marked distinction between the Government and the individual as to the purpose of having money. As for the individual or corporation, it is theirs to be used for their particular benefit either to lend, spend, or invest, and there is no provision for them to create any money. In fact the Constitution expressly prohibits the coining of money to the States and surely no private corporation could claim special privilege rights greater than those of the States.

As for the Government, the Constitution expressly provides that they shall coin and regulate the value of money as well as foreign coin. The primary purpose for the Government having money is not, as in the case of the individual or corporation, to lend, spend, or invest, but to furnish a medium of exchange among the people for the transaction of business of every kind and nature. The present practice of the Government borrowing money into circulation is wrong. As Mr. V. C. Vickers, former governor of the Bank of England, says in his book, Economic Tribulation, which he had written just before he died. "Any additional supply of money should be issued as a clear asset to the state: so that money will be spent into existence, and not lent into existence."

It would be no more dishonest, no more economically unsound, and no more unconstitutional for the Government to turn the Post Office Department over to Sears, Roebuck & Co., and the War and Navy Department to the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., or any other chain-store system to be operated for their own personal gain, than it is for th Government to turn over the coining of the Nation's medium of exchange and the regulation of its value to a huge, privately owned chain banking system, which operates for its own personal gain.

Of course, the cry will be, "Fiat money," "Inflation," from all the flat-tire, debt- and interest-minded element. "Fiat money." Is it no good? Do not forget that every outstanding United States Government bond is a "fiat bond." The average liability of the bond, per dollar, is double the face value, principal plus interest, and the asset if any is dead when the check that was issued for it is dead.

The honest thing to do, the constitutional thing to do, and the thing to do that will maintain the solvency of the Nation, is for the Government to create and spend into existence "as a clear asset," honest-to-God United States constitutional money, its volume, and value per dollar, to be under the direct control of the Congress, which is necessary for it to be constitutional.

The value of money is controlled purely by "supply and demand." Regulate the supply (volume in actual circulation) to any given point in relation to the demand and that particular value point can be maintained within a very few degrees variation.

To control the supply (volume in actual circulation) in a constitutional manner, the Government must own the Federal Reserve bank and operate it under the direct supervision of the Congress.

This ownership is necessary for three specific reasons: First, there is no one entitled to create (coin) money except the Government; therefore, no one is entitled to the profits derived from such creation except the Government, for the benefit of all the people.

Second: The only way to regulate the value of money is by regulating the "volume in actual circulation," to achieve this, someone must reckon with the demand to purchase consumer goods. Must reckon with the ability and inclination of the public to spend or save (velocity of turnover) and must reckon with the volume of deficit bank deposits on the books of the banks. Surely the experience of the last 15 years will satisfy anyone that private institutions will not do this impartially and that the Government must do it.

Third: To keep our currency in circulation or to be in a position to withhold it to maintain a prearranged index point, we must open the dead end of the one-way street, down which practically all Government tax money, post office money, and Federal farm-loan payments go, to rest peacefully in the vaults of the Federal Reserve bank.

After arranging for control of the Government's money (the people's medium of exchange) the Government must issue money, "as a clear asset to the State," instead of interest-bearing bonds.

All the bonds sold in America do not pay $1 of war debt. Bonds are just an instrument of transferring the payment of a debt of the present time over to some future time, and in addition they create the added expense of selling costs, discounts, and interest which, when all is paid, will probably be 125 percent or more of the amount the Government received. Do you call it sound public finance to buy bonds at the present time, when everybody is working, promising to pay $2 for every one now received at some future time, when millions will be out of work, who, instead of being able to pay, will need to be fed? There is just about as much sense to it as there would be for a country village to borrow water in March and April when all the wells are full to overflowing, promising to pay it back with interest, in kind, in August and September, when half the wells are dry, and the rest hard put to meet the then local demand. If we could buy a dollar bond, we could have paid a dollar debt.

Do not misunderstand my motive. I am not advising to not buy War bonds. Everyone who can, must buy; for it is the only way provided to keep going, and the war must be won. But the finger of shame should be pointed at every Congressman, every Senator, and everyone in the executive branch of the Government who has not worked for some honest method of meeting this war expense, at least in a large degree, as we go, instead of instigating this bond policy.

We must confess failure on our part to those boys and girls who have staked their lives for a free America. We must confess our American ingenuity has not been directed toward paying the cost of this war but toward transferring the cost, at enormous expense, to the future.

This is not alone dishonest to the boys and girls who had a right to expect us to do our part while they were gone, but it is dishonest with ourselves. How can anyone pretend that we can pay with interest after the war, on a $75,000,000,000 income, that which we have failed to pay on a $150,000,000,000 income?

No industry, business, or farm can continue to pay a heavy tax, levied to pay principal and interest on mythological or synthetic money, which either never existed, or only for a short time, and pay it with honest money.

War Production Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CECIL R. KING

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that anyone will dispute the statement of Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY that the control of our economic system has been concentrated both geographically and in terms of industrial units to a degree that has almost destroyed the ability of the States and other public subdivisions to protect the economic interests of their citizens. According to the figures thus far compiled and as of May 31, 1943, the Army, Navy, Maritime Commission, Treasury Department and the R. F. C. through its subsidiaries had awarded approximately $161,000,000,000 in supply and facility contracts. Of this amount, more than $101,000,000,000, or 62 percent, had been awarded to the industrial areas for which the W. P. B. had regional offices at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Chicago and Detroit. So that 62 percent of all the war contracts had been concentrated in the industrial areas of 19 eastern and north central States. To the western States for which the W. P. B. maintained regional offices at San Francisco, war contracts in the amount of a little more than $20,000,000,000 were awarded. To the areas having W. P. B. headquarters in Dallas, Kansas City, and Denver, war contracts to the approximate amount of $15,000,000,000 were awarded; to the area having W. P. B. headquarters in Atlanta, $7,500,000,000, and to the area having W. P. B. headquarters in Minneapolis $1,660,000,000.

This geographic concentration is not a new development, but one that existed prior to the war and perpetuated and protected during the war by the W. P. B. through its control of production and materials in the United States. Geographic concentration of itself may not be a fearful situation; however, when it is coupled with the additional factor of corporate concentration we find ourselves confronted by a totally different and dangerous problem—a problem which affects the very welfare of the Nation itself.

The concentration of these war contracts in the hands of a limited number of corporate units proves to be much more startling than the case of geographic concentration.

Of all the prime contracts issued by all governmental agencies in the period of June 1940 to December 1940 but 100 corporations had been awarded 86 percent of the value of those contracts. The percentage was reduced to 75.4 percent the following year, and to 71.2 percent the year following that, but it still remains at more than 70 percent despite the vigorous efforts on the part of Congress to protect small business.

Just a moment ago I said that geographic concentration had been protected by the W. P. B. I am sure that an examination of the personnel rolls of that agency will reveal that it is controlled by representatives of the 100 corporations who have made it their business to maintain the status quo of geographic concentration by merely protecting the interests of their former employers. Therefore, this recent clamor on the part of the W. P B. for the right or the power to handle the job of demobilization worries me and should worry the people of some 34 States. In fact, the recent news reports indicating that Mr. Donald Nelson would resign if the W P. B. were not given that assignment, makes me wonder just why that agency is so concerned over demobilization when they have not as yet completed the job of mobilization in the face of this unfinished total world war. They are worried and upset and they will continue to be worried and upset until they are assured of that job. Now you may ask why. I think the answer is fairly obvious. Up to this point they have had complete control of the economy of our Nation. Because we are involved, according to Senator O'MAHONEY, as a nation in a war against totalitarian aggressors who had marshaled all the resources, human and material, of the territories which they had conquered or influenced, we ourselves were compelled to adopt totalitarian methods in totally mobilizing our country. The utilization and control of manpower and material was centered in Washington without regard to the effect upon our normal economy. This power or control was vested in the W. P. B., which thereupon assumed jurisdiction of every phase of our industrial economy. It is this W. P. B., staffed by the representatives of the aforementioned 100 corporations, that has delivered the war, and perhaps even the post-war, industrial economy into the hands of their former private employer corporations.

It is this corporate concentration that the W. P. B. is making an attempt to retain for post-war use. It is the fear of this agency that in the process of demobilization and reconversion, the peacetime economy of the Nation may be decentralized for the benefit of the average American citizen, and it is this decentralization which the W. P. B. is seeking to prevent with whatever means they have available, even under the guise of war decisions. It is the feeling of the W. P. B. that if they are given the job of handling the demobilization of our war industries, they can fully protect this entrenched concentration of industry in the northeast section of the United States to the detriment of the industrial economy of some 34 States in the Union. This design on the part of the W. P. B. was recently supported by a declaration of its Director, Mr. Donald Nelson, to the effect that no contracts for civilian goods would be allotted to any company or business located within a No. 1 manpower shortage area. At first glance this pronouncement of Mr. Nelson would seem reasonable. However, upon closer study of all of the facts involved, one can see that through this decision of Mr. Nelson, the markets of the smaller industries, of which Southern California has many, will be delivered lock, stock, and barrel to the monopoly corporations of the northeast section of the United States.

Let us analyze the facts upon which I base the charge with reference to the W. P. B. It is fairly well conceded that the European war will end before the war with Japan in the Pacific. It is also admitted that at that particular time war production will be concentrated on the Pacific Coast for the purpose of conducting the all-out war against Japan. It is also conceded that partial and even total reconversion will be authorized by the W. P. B. for the various plants and factories in the east and northeast sections of the United States. This will therefore mean that the corporations of the East will be producing civilian products for sale in the West, many products of which were manufactured in West Coast States prior to the war.

For a period of a year or a year and a half, while west-coast industries are engaged in war production, eastern industry will be in civilian production and supplying the needs of western citizens. It so happens that the west coast has developed into a two-industry region—namely, aircraft and ships, with all of its small business subcontracted to them. When the Pacific war ends, it is admitted beyond a doubt by all the war agencies, that the contracts for ships and airplanes will be canceled, thereby throwing into unemployment in the west-coast States many hundreds and thousands of people, for how long no one knows, as western industry will have to start from scratch in the matter of reconversion to civilian production. This they will find quite difficult, as their markets for civilian products will have already been usurped by eastern business interests.

Now, there is a way of meeting not only the war production requirements, but adequately protecting western business interests—a way which the executives of W. P. B. should be very familiar with in light of their past business experience. However, they apparently have not taken time to find this answer that would adequately do both jobs, and I am going to take this opportunity of publicly suggesting this solution to them for their consideration.

I say it is possible for western industry to continue its all-out war production and still safeguard its post-war markets. If western industries are allowed to accept contracts for civilian goods along with eastern business, with the right to subcontract these contracts to eastern firms cut back in war production, for manufacture under the brand name of the western concern, western industry will thereby be able to protect its markets by distribution during wartime of its own commodities under their established pre-war name. They will not have been caused to let up in war production; the cut-back firms in the East will have been fully utilized for peacetime production, and there will have been no sacrifices required on the part of anyone.

I have discussed this plan with Mr. Baruch, and I feel free at this time to indicate that in Mr. Baruch's opinion the foregoing suggestion would be the only solution to the problem at hand.

Without the utilization of this particular suggestion, or a similar one, certain cities on the west coast look forward to serious localized depressions immediately following the cessation of hostilities. This problem is a serious one, and in light of the fact that it has not been thought through thoroughly by the officials of W. P. B., I am led to believe that it is but a further development in the plans of the W. P. B. to solidify the concentration of industry in the eastern and the northeastern parts of the United States to the serious detriment of the West and the South.

Landon's Progress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me, I insert an editorial appearing in the Chicago Times entitled "Landon's Progress." Of course, it will be recalled that Mr. Landon, in 1936, was a candidate for President on the Republican ticket.

LANDON'S PROGRESS

Remember Alf M. Landon?

He ran against Roosevelt in 1936. He was "the Coolidge of Kansas." That subtitle was supposed to be enough to elect Mr. Landon as President.

Mr. Landon has just made a speech before the Republican State Convention in Topeka, Kans. A great many speeches are being made by politicians these days. We can't discuss all of them. But a speech by a former standard-bearer of one of the major parties would seem to merit some special attention. That is what we are now going to give to Mr. Landon's.

His was a speech which, in the old-fashioned Kansas way, tears the hide off the "ins," which is proper for an "out" to do.

It tears the hide off the Roosevelt administration once for its domestic policies.

It tears it off again for its foreign policies.

Of the latter, Mr. Landon says that the administration hasn't any. He says that all is confusion.

The implication of Mr. Landon's complaint is that he is not confused. Which would mean that he has a clear and definite program of alternatives.

WE'D LIKE TO HEAR SOME ALTERNATIVES

That's what we would like to hear from the opposition.

That's what the American people would like to hear.

It would be good for the country to have a clear choice of policies for our Government. Name-calling is no substitute for a policy, yet that is about all that we have been hearing from most of the administration critics.

After Mr. Landon had finished with his lambasting of Roosevelt, which took six out of the nine pages of his speech, he said, "Now, in contrast, what is the Republican position?"

We perked up over that statement. We wanted the contrast.

But what did Mr. Landon give to us? An excuse.

"In the first place," he said, "it is almost impossible for the minority party * * * to make much of a record. If a Republican Member of Congress offers constructive legislation that strikes a popular note, his proposal is never passed under his name. Some Democratic committee chairman will change it slightly and introduce it under his own name."

To that, we say to Mr. Landon: "Gosh, aren't these Congressmen awful, Alf?"

After getting his excuse out of his system, Mr. Landon went on to say that nevertheless "we (meaning the Republicans) are boldly preparing to meet our responsibilities." At that, we perked up again, especially on hearing the word boldly. To what did Mr. Landon refer? His answer is:

"Under the able and far-sighted Republican leader, Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, committees composed of members of the National House of Representatives have been appointed on the most vital questions of taxation, post-war conditions, food, and powers of the President.

"Republican National Chairman Spangler has * * * seized time by the forelock and named committees composed of Republican Governors and Members of the Congress to prepare for post-war legislation on many vital subjects."

Committees to study problems.

Well, maybe this indicates some progress on Mr. Landon's part at that. Cal Coolidge was proud of a philosophy based on the idea that 9 times out of 10, if you did nothing about problems, the problems would solve themselves. The President who was famous for appointing committees was Herbert Hoover. So maybe Mr. Landon now has progressed to being entitled to be called, not the Coolidge, but "the Hoover of Kansas," albeit Mr. Hoover, to his credit, has been voicing definite ideas on foreign policy.

One portion of Mr. Landon's talk did impress. This was his statement that, "Now with our country at war we must guard against unreasonably inflaming public opinion by flinging about loose abuse."

PATRIOTIC ADVICE FOR ALL POLITICOS

We say amen to that. We hope certain members of Mr. Landon's party in Illinois will hit the trail on that. If they don't, they may find the voters becoming inflamed, but at them. The people have a sure sense of the impropriety—and the danger—of fomenting disunity in time of war.

Division Does Not Beget Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. BURCH

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. BURCH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Danville (Va.) Register:

DIVISION DOES NOT BEGET UNITY

Reasonable, constructive criticism rarely is offensive to a region, community, or an individual. Here in the South, for instance, newspapers, educators, statesmen, and the churches have been striving to create higher levels, economic, political, spiritual, and social, for all the people by constructive leadership. The effort, as applied on the racial front, has not been without progress—a greater degree of progress than any other decade can match. Yet today much of that progress is in jeopardy because of what southerners describe as "outside interference."

The South is especially resentful that it should be forced to divide its attention between the fight against foreign enemies and those at home who would destroy southern civilization. The tensions now disturbing the South—and candor forces admission that tension has multiplied rapidly, not only in relations between white and colored groups but between the prevailing southern majority and all minority groups—are not of southern making. They are a result of constant prodding, of provoked incidents and of a propaganda campaign of unprecedented proportions aimed at revolutionizing the South overnight into a sort of utopia where the "four freedoms," the Ten Commandments, and the 59 directives of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practices shall replace custom and law of many generations.

Southern Negroes and other minority groups have begun to realize all this outside "aid" is having an effect just the opposite of that desired. The progress to which they can point was achieved not because of but despite inflammatory agitation depicting the average southerner as an ignoramus guided in his relations with his less numerous neighbors only by blind prejudice.

The strategy basically is wrong. Making a whipping boy of the South, its leadership, and its customs is no way to gain from this region the kind of cooperation sorely needed in the United States today. Yet the whipping continues. One finds difficulty in picking up a publication printed north of Mason and Dixon's line without finding therein some article or item abusive in comment on the South. Recently the Senate of the United States saw a scene in which so calm and able a statesman as North Carolina's JOSIAH W. BAILEY warned he and his colleagues have had enough of sarcastic, ridiculous references to "southern Democrats." Even this week Members of the House of Representatives revealed their anger at the continual abuse of a columnist who makes southern Democrats his most frequent target because they do not follow that portion of the party line directed at changing the South to meet Eleanor Roosevelt's specifications for a millennial socialism.

What is going on is enough to make—and does make—Southerners of good will toward Negroes and all minority groups sick at heart. They see falsehood being purveyed as gospel; friction being peddled as patriotism; prejudice being branded as tolerance; lawlessness being counseled as good citizenship—when directed against the South.

Typical of the monstrous calumnies heaped upon the South is a quotation from the opening paragraph of an article running four columns in length and appearing in the New York Herald Tribune of last Sunday. Mrs. Eugene E. Meyer, wife of the owner-publisher of the Washington Post, wrote:

"In the South the uniform worn by a Negro (soldier) affects the ignorant white population as a red rag does a bull; what is worse, a large part of the South is very crude in its attitude toward murder, particularly when the victim is a Negro."

Negro soldiers and sailors are to be seen daily on the streets of Danville and every other Southern city and town. There is a pride in the khaki and blue in the South that is unsurpassed anywhere, regardless of the color or creed of the person wearing that uniform. During more than 2 years of warfare less than 30 Negro servicemen have been booked or even questioned at Danville police headquarters. The explanation is that the vast majority of Negro servicemen coming to the city have been our own boys on leave. They have found a welcome from both white and colored and an evidence of pride in their service from both groups. They did not find, and few expected, the uniform to prove an open sesame to all their aspirations; but they did find still at home a genuine friendliness that crossed racial lines.

Such falsehood as that written by Mrs. Meyer does not help the situation. It is a pity that, posing as a friend of better race relations she, like others, exercises her talent and her position to add fuel to a flame that had been kept under control by the whites and Negroes who are accustomed to cooperate in efforts to build better Southern communities.

Editorials Approve St. Lawrence Seaway Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that every Member of the House will become familiar with the bill S. 1385, introduced by Senator AIKEN, of Vermont. This is a companion bill to the one I introduced on March 23, 1943, H. R. 2280. Both bills call for the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway power project as a part of our post-war planning effort. Hearings will be held on the Senate bill by the Senate Commerce Committee, and I am hopeful that favorable action may be taken there so that consideration may be given in the House.

I have been furnished with editorials on this subject by Harry C. Brockel, secretary of the Great Lakes Harbor Association of Milwaukee, Wis. These editorials are all ably written and correctly state the facts about this project. They challenge careful consideration. They are as follows:

[From the Milwaukee Journal (State edition) of April 4, 1944]

NEW YORK FOR SEAWAY

New York's legislature has adopted a resolution favoring the St. Lawrence Seaway.

For a long time the port of New York opposed this improvement, largely because it feared that some of the shipping now terminating in New York harbor might move up the St. Lawrence and into the Great Lakes.

However, it ought to be obvious that, as Wisconsin and other Lake States would benefit by direct shipping, large parts of New York State would benefit by power incidentally, to be created by the proposed St. Lawrence development.

The Midwest will, of course, welcome the additional support offered by the New York legislative resolution. In behalf of its own interests, it now needs the St. Lawrence Waterway more urgently than ever.

The war has cause the development of great industries on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Those industries will, in the post-war period, ship their products to foreign markets as well as to domestic consumption centers. They will ship largely by water—over the seas, to foreign markets; via the Panama Canal and by coastal routes to many of the richest domestic markets.

The Midwest, unless it gets the seaway, will remain largely "land bound." It, too, has great industries. Under present arrangements, they will have to ship largely by rail to many American markets, and by rail to seaboard ports for transshipment to foreign markets.

They will be forced to receive their imports, the vast supplies of raw materials they will need, by the same means.

That will be unduly costly. It is well known that bulk shipments, at least, can most economically be moved to distant places if they can be loaded into vessels and be transported to the ports nearest consumption centers, without transshipment.

It is improbable that New York or any other American State can suffer if, by any good device, the Midwest is helped to prosper. The inner region then will but become a more generous consumer of goods of all kinds, whether water- or rail-borne, produced near the coasts or elsewhere.

There is no national benefit in hampering or stifling the commerce—and thereby the purchasing power—of any region. So the action of the New York Legislature seems foresighted. In the end the ports of New York and San Francisco should gain rather than lose as the Midwest is opened to waterborne traffic.

[From the Detroit News of April 3, 1944]

WORK FOR MANY THOUSANDS

It has been estimated that the St. Lawrence seaway as a post-war project would give direct employment for 4 years to 10,000 men. There was mentioned also a further employment, incapable of precise estimation, in the preparation of materials and equipment, including the huge electric-power installations.

The fact is, however, that these estimates are only a beginning. Anyone familiar with the purpose and practical potentialities of the seaway will see that the ramifying activities it will inspire must result in far more employment than this, scattered over the whole Great Lakes Basin and, indeed, the whole country.

It is not always realized that the seaway in truth is already all but completed over its total length of 1,500 miles. The new Welland Canal, completed in 1932, the Sault locks, and the other Great Lakes connecting channels all are ready to accommodate ocean shipping. It is only the 48 miles of St. Lawrence rapids, which will be flooded out and made navigable by the two power dams commonly referred to as the seaway project, that remain to be dealt with.

Thus the authorization of this final project by Congress will be the signal for vast activity, especially in all the Great Lakes ports, to get ready for the day when ocean navigation will be extended into the farthest reaches of the Lakes.

The channels are ready for the ocean shipping that will plough them. But the lake ports, though most of them already have the requisite depth, are not. In all these cities, from Buffalo to Chicago, and Duluth, docks, warehouses, railroad sidings and other facilities of an ocean port will be projected and built. New businesses also will be brought into being, which, too, cannot be ignored as sources of employment.

The materials used and the new enterprise to be stimulated by this bustle of activity will have an enlivening effect on business and industry throughout the country.

There is no conceivable project the Government could undertake that would have a comparable effect in stimulating private investment and enterprise.

The over-all effect of admitting ocean shipping to the heart of the North American Continent will be one of a tremendous boost in national economic efficiency. The seaway will serve as the opening of a new frontier, which, indeed, is literally what it is.

This great project ought to be authorized in readiness for the war's end as insurance against a post-war slump and unemployment.

[From the Sheboygan Press of April 1, 1944]

STAND UP AND BE COUNTED

From the State of Vermont comes a voice favorable to action by Congress for the building of the St. Lawrence waterway and hydroelectric development as a post-war project.

In a bill introduced by Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN, Republican he asks the approval of an agreement made between the Governments of the United States and Canada to provide for the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway. From the White House comes a message from President Roosevelt favoring the development. In a letter to Senator AIKEN, President Roosevelt says:

"I am convinced that the time has come for a nonpartisan effort to secure congressional authorization for the St. Lawrence development in order that the project may be available for early post-war construction.

"The undertaking will offer such important benefits to many States that I am sure it will provide a desirable stimulus to industrial and business activity which will assist the entire country in its reconversion to a stable peacetime economy on a continued high-production level. Many competent studies have shown that it will not hurt the railroads or ports through which foreign commerce now flows, but will ultimately increase their business.

"I am advising interested Federal agencies that your bill (S. 1385), modified to provide for construction as a post-war project, has my approval.

"I have appreciated your consistent support of this great undertaking."

Out here in Wisconsin—and perhaps that is true of the Great Lakes region—few seem to visualize the importance of this development and what it will mean to the land-locked regions bordering the Great Lakes. The time for calling names is past and we feel that Congress can no longer shirk its responsibility. Every time we delay this project powerful forces including the drainage crowd of Chicago take a new breath, pull in their belts, and go into action. The people sit idly on the sidelines and see the middlewestern section of this country in a bottleneck that can only be removed with the building of the St. Lawrence seaway.

Senator AIKEN'S bill will soon approach the period when hearings will be held, and we cannot hope to defeat the special interests who are blocking the seaway unless we give every support possible to the Aiken bill. For a long period of time the Senators and Congressmen from territory opposing the bill have been able to defer action. In the East there is an effort being made to develop the waterpower independent of the seaway disregarding entirely the navigation features.

Let the power-project crowd gain their point and we will continue to sit high and dry on the shores of the Great Lakes with ports closed and navigation stifled. The Great Lakes Harbor Association has done a marvelous job, but alone it cannot do all of the work and meet the powerful enemies that would try to stop the building of a deep waterway to the ocean front. Back as far as President Coolidge's time in 1924, negotiations were in progress between Canada and the United States. Secretary of Commerce Hoover, afterward President, called attention to the need for the development of inland waterways, including the St. Lawrence Seaway. All of this delay has been occasioned by selfish interests on the seaboard who felt they might be losing something.

As far back as January 21, 1927, J. Adam Bede, of Duluth, Minn., former Congressman, spoke before an annual meeting of the Association of Commerce in this city, making a ringing plea for the St. Lawrence Waterway, and up to this time neither our association nor any other has taken a leading part, but rather has sat on the sidelines along with the people who feel that it is no concern of theirs.

Back in January 1927, Sheboygan was represented at Muskegon at the Regional Tidewater Conference Waterway by the then St. Lawrence Deep Waterway by the then mayor and the writer. Every mayor we have had has been in favor of a deep waterway, and still we have never done more than raise a voice here at home.

Now that the matter is in the foreground it is time for action. The Association of Commerce and every business association bordering on the Great Lakes should hold meetings and pass resolutions and have them presented at the hearing in Washington—not through long distance contacts, but presented personally at Washington, and arguments made so that the Congress may know where we stand.

The matter of drainage has been in the courts, and recently the Supreme Court has sustained the people and served notice on Chicago that it cannot, by greater diversion of water, flood southern areas with contaminated water, the result of their own neglect in failing to build proper purification plants.

In March 1941 the city of Ottawa, the Government of the United States, and the Government of Canada signed a pact which is known as the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Agreement. Presidents Taft, Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, Hoover, and Roosevelt have all approved in no uncertain language during their administrations. Senator VANDENBURG, Representative GEORGE DONDERO, and, in fact, men of all parties, have voiced their approval. Canada is ready and our own United States has been the stumbling block of delay. That delay must be met now as a post-war measure. It will provide an outlet from the Great Lakes and it will make possible to a land-locked people of the Middle West an inland ocean at its doors.

We appeal to every newspaper and every civic body in the States bordering on the Great Lakes to back this post-war plan with action. Let Congress and Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN, father of the proposed post-war bill, know that we are back of them.

Justice to Our Ally, India—Repeal Exclusion of Her Nationals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I delivered at Town Hall, New York, April 13, 1944, under the auspices of the India League of America:

In my many years as legislator, one surprising discovery stands out—and I say this with thankfulness—the cynic is hardly ever right, if at all. The cynic who, as it has been said, "knows the price of everything and the value of nothing," has never known the exhilaration of the fight for justice. He denies the evidence of his senses, knotting the moral fiber of his humanity. He is forever for the status quo, whatever it may be, for, as he sees it, there can be no betterment, hence, change can only be for the worse.

I am not here to deliver a little homily. I am here to assert a belief in the essential upward struggle of peoples, without and within the frame of governments. In every age, in every country, the struggle has gone forward to gain a bit here, to win a skirmish there, but the important thing to remember is—that the gain was made and is being made in each age, each century, each day. It is what we must remember in the hours that look black, in the years of turmoil and hatred when the forces of evil seem about to engulf and drown us. It is the cynic who is the defeatist.

In the United States we know that we have not reached the millennium. While our achievements in justice and equality stand as monuments to that very belief in the future of man, we have, by no means, reached any epitome of perfection. But we never cease our self-scrutiny to find wherein we fail, wherein we are betraying the purposes of our founders. Slowly, we forge ahead to the realization that no man, no government, no people are islands entire unto themselves, that insomuch as what happens in one corner of the earth reverberates throughout all corners, or, to change the figure, like waves that wash one shore because stones had been cast into the waters from the opposite shore.

Here we are fighting racial arrogance. "The United Nations are fighting," said President Roosevelt, "to make a world in which tyranny and aggression cannot exist; a world based upon freedom, equality, and justice; a world in which all persons, regardless of race, color, or creed may live in peace, honor, and dignity." And in so saying, the President of the United States was delineating our war aims That's a mighty large program. It means the liberation of oppressed peoples as well as the removal of discriminatory measures, not so thoroughly advertised, on the statute books of our own country.

Naturally, I have reference to the fact that for no reason save that of origin, Eastern Hemisphere Indians are precluded from entering the United States under immigration quotas such as are established for other peoples already embraced within the Immigration Act of 1924, and moreover, are precluded from becoming naturalized citizens of these United States. They were thus excluded from the family of nations that is the United States. I fought against the Johnson Act of 1924. It not ony discriminated against people of eastern and southern Europe but in its utter exclusion of nationals of Asiatic countries, anticipated Hitler's theory of Herrenvolk and Sklavenvolk. Is such continued exclusion the evidence that we have not as yet purged ourselves of the ugly taint of unfounded prejudice? Is it evidence that we have not been vigilant in watching our growth to a true maturity? Is not such an exclusion an echo of the totalitarian ideology that we seek to crush today? From what Olympian heights do we point our finger and say "You, Welshman, you may become part of us; and you Italian, and you, Yugoslav, and you, Iraqis; but, no, not you, Indian. Under our violently discriminatory laws, a guttersnipe from Prussia, a disguised Fascist from Spain, can enter, but the late Rabindrinath Tagore or Pandit Nehru enjoy no such right. If we have erred in the past in not recognizing such exclusion for what it actually is—an insufferable act of pompous racial ego—there remains no reason for such error to continue. Several remedial bills, among them my own, await legislative action. No sound reason exists for delaying the passage of such bill, setting up an immigration quota for the Indian peoples and according them the right of naturalization. It must be passed if the sincerity of our war aims is to pass the test, a test placed before us by every oppressed peoples on this earth who look toward these United States for justice and equality.

The Indian peoples have joined us on the battlefield. Two million are fighting in the Army, Navy, and merchant marine of Great Britain. They are among the dead, wounded, and missing. They are producing for war, farming for war, building for the war which is ours and theirs. Can we not underscore that brotherhood away from the war-torn fronts? The people, we the people of the United States, through their Congress will answer thunderously in the affirmative

If we are to follow the logical consequences of the repeal of the Chinese Exclusion Act, then, indisputably, the argument forces itself upon our consciousness that the people of India and their descendants are deserving of no less equal and equitable treatment.

But leaving aside the potent arguments that from the Chinese have been removed the unconscionable stigma of "lesser breed," and leaving aside the equally unanswerable argument that the soldiers of India have bravely fought a common foe on the battle fronts of Burma, Italy, North Africa, and against the Japanese in southeastern Asia, a higher morality demands that we prove to ourselves, and to our allies, all our allies, that our preachments of democracy are not empty tenets. We cannot, on one hand, revile the Nazi theories of racial supremacy, and, on the other, ignore the sinister implication of our immigration legislation that bars one people and not another, restrictions based on no moral or ethical ground save that of man's origin.

We are paying a bitter price to learn the lesson of the interdependence of the world and its inhabitants. We fight in brotherhood recognizing our mutual debts. Can we not underscore the brotherhood away from the death-drenched battlefields?

East Indians, once admitted, will become thoroughgoing American—as American as any. Many denizens in America are not American in heart and mind. Many natives here are not. The import factor is not that you are born in America, but that America is born in you.

Practically, the amendment of the provisions of section 11 of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended, will make permissive the admission of somewhat less than 100 Indians annually.

The hue and cry that will rise in opposition to the proposed establishment of an immigration quota for Indians and their right to citizenship, making much of the competitive labor argument and of the evils of widening immigration legislation have, therefore, no validity, no foundation in fact.

It is not a special privilege we accord the Indians in establishing for them an immigration quota nor is it an act of condesension from our favored heights. It would be, rather, the acknowledgement of our sincerity in our battle cries, a renewal in the faith of our founders.

The inclusion of the Eastern Hemisphere Indian in our family circle is, however, one step forward in the progression of the world toward equality. As we view the upheaval in almost every region of the world, our consciousness gives pause before the thought of 400,000,000 inhabitants of the land of India who find themselves subjected to foreign rule. The pulse of a people stirs. A national consciousness arises, an awareness that whatever destiny awaits India, it must be of her own making.

Yes; there are poverty and disease in India. Agriculture and industry have not reached the highest point of development. There are divisions of class and caste. I point these out because these are the very arguments that are advanced for keeping India a subject nation. This is how India has fared, ruled from above and from outside. An absentee landlord sends its overseers—who must somehow manage to keep their jobs—to attend to the needs, not of the inhabitants, but of the employer. Exact tribute, divide the interest, keep the level of living low, but remember to tell them that it is for their own good.

How much of poverty and disease could be wiped out if India as a nation could be permitted to work for itself, to pay taxes for institutions of its own, could trade freely and be traded with by all the nations of the world? No unbridgeable chasm exists in India to keep the people divided and render them unfit for self-government. There are more minorities, more unrelated languages spoken in the United States, more variance in custom and belief in the United States, than there are in India and yet out of the amalgam we have forged a mighty nation.

India has an embedded culture of its own. It has no need for the kind of civilization the conqueror gave it. In justification of conquest, the 19th century self-pitying cry of "white man's burden" has often impelled me to ask in viewing India, "Who is really carrying the burden?"

Moreover, and while this thought cannot take precedence over our American basic principles of equity and justice for all, the decisive, overt act of placing the Indians within the embrace of our immigration quota and citizenship laws, on the basis comparable to those of the other peoples, will rob the Axis of their most telling barbed weapon in the battle of psychological warfare. But were it a time of peace, we could do no less.

Except for raids by Afghan tribesmen, India for the first time since the Raj took over in 1858 has now actually been invaded. The Japs are at the gates of Imphal in Manipur State and definitely threaten Kohima and may cut the Bengal-Assam railway.

The people of India realize that Nippon is on Indian soil and Jap propaganda is riotously gloating over it. Much is made of the fact that the so-called Indian National Army, headed by the Quisling puppet, Subhas Chandra Bose, is participating in this Indian invasion. He speaks of his "army of liberation." There can be no blinking the fact that Bose's pro-Jap propaganda is adding fuel to the political fires of unrest in India.

Tokyo, Burma, and Malay radios hammer harder than ever at India. They shout, "Come over to our side. You have nothing to fear from the Japanese." They taunt the people of India with the gruesome assertion of Churchill that the Atlantic Charter does not apply to them. Indians are reminded that the Allies promise them freedom from the Japs but not freedom. They speak of the hypocrisy of the offer of freedom of the Cripps' mission and high light the caustic comment of Gandhi that the offer was like a "post-dated check drawn upon a tottering bank."

Our breaking down of immigration and naturalization barriers may do much to dull the edge of this Jap propaganda against us and our allies.

If we do not do the honorable and decent thing, if we do not place East Indians on a parity with the Chinese and our other allies, the Nazis and Japs will continue to rub it in on India and incessantly repeat that Americans are long on words of sympathy but short on deeds of actual help.

Unless we amend out of our statutes the bar sinister against East Indians, Hirohito will call us hypocrites and will screech "Don't be fools, you good people of India. These Christians of America and Britain prate of brotherly love, but they only pretend good will. They give you pious platitudes about dignity of the individual, about equality of all men, about the four freedoms, but it is all poppycock. You can't even emigrate to their land. They blacklist you. Join up with us and help drive the white humbugs out of all the Orient and keep them out."

Such messages pour into India from all sides. They reach the lowliest peasant in his dunghill hut. They seep and spread through human grapevine communications.

We must at once erase from the statute books the malignant inferiority with which we brand East Indians. Our action would be as refreshing to them as a cool breeze in the heat of summer. It would be an effective antidote to poisoned propaganda. It would hearten and encourage the Indians to fight with and for us.

Our troops are in India which is our base against Japan. Unless the people of India cooperate wholeheartedly the war will be prolonged. India, therefore, is America's business, China's business—the earnest concern of all our allies.

How can we exclude as immigrants a friend and ally? Our airmen in Calcutta, when asked, "Why do you proscribe us? We do not exclude you, friend," have no answer, because they realize the wall of injustice and humiliation we erect between comrades in arms.

We must get away from the notion, and as quickly as possible, that India is still the India of barrack-room ballads.

India is precisely what I had in mind when I spoke of the hollowness of the cynic. As the world progresses in accelerated pace, as it does today, toward international collaboration, toward a firmer understanding of the actual physical and spiritual nearness of one people to another, there needs be much rejoicing in the heart of India. For India, today, remains an indictment of greed and lust for power and political bid for prestige. It cannot remain so for long; indeed we, the free peoples of the world dare not let it so remain. India must march with the free nations of the world, lest we slip again into the sham pose of the cynic which breeds defeat even before it has encountered the enemy.

What We Get

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. WRIGHT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Bulletin of March 29, 1944:

WHAT WE GET

Lend-lease was conceived as a common pool of the resources of the United Nations, some of which are of such a nature that application of the dollar sign is next to impossible. Timeliness of aid, for example, is difficult to appraise.

But it is important that from time to time there should be an accounting on all sides of this assistance. We report periodically on what we lend-lease to other nations; Britain has just come forward with an impressive statement of what she is doing for us.

At the peak of construction work on bases in the United Kingdom two-thirds of all the civil and military labor available there was working for the United States, but being paid by Britain. Both the Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth have been devoted to our transport service. Britain now is supplying 20 percent of all the food for American forces there, and about 10,000 British civilians are employed by the United States but paid by Britain, their wages amounting to $12,000,000 a year. Britain also pays the cost of handling V mail in that country.

Britain is currently devoting 10 percent of her total war expenditure to mutual aid, and in proportion to national income is giving the United States as much as we are giving her. The full list of supplies and services furnished us is impressive. The volume and variety are important, chiefly in demonstrating to Americans that lend-lease is not a one-way street. But of far greater moment is the contribution of each nation in accord with its ability.

Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the following song, sent to me by Mr. Alfred Peterson, of Rogers, Ark., expresses so well the faith and hope of democratic peoples throughout the world that I am asking consent to have it printed in the RECORD with my remarks:

DEMOCRACY—THE WORLD SONG

Let the people rule, let all men be free,
This is the song of democracy.
Let freedom's call thrill the lives of all
To gain this glorious liberty.

Chorus

Then shout aloud for that great day
When all old things have passed away,
When war and strife and greed shall cease,
And none shall rule but the Prince of Peace.

All men are equal and must be free
To attain their highest destiny.
Then unfúrl the flag of humanity
And proclaim a world-wide democracy.

Dictators' rule is tyranny,
Their reign shall end ingloriously,
And then forever o'er land and sea
We'll sing the joys of prosperity.

All nations shout this mighty cry,
No more for tyrants shall we live or die,
And then the world with one accord
Will make their plows from shell and sword.

Exploring Agriculture's Post-war Economic Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of the House the following address by Hon. Claude R. Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture, before a meeting of the National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies at Chicago, March 22, 1944:

I did not come here to describe post-war agriculture for the very simple reason that I don't know what post-war agriculture will be like. Furthermore, I do not even feel in a position to hazard a guess as to what it will be like.

However, I am glad to have the opportunity to tell you my ideas of some of the problems which will confront American agriculture in the post-war period.

These problems, I think, are going to give us a lot of trouble and cause us to experience some unhappy years unless we do some hard thinking about them now. We will never solve them unless we can unite on an effective post-war program. Furthermore, it will be too late to develop such a program after the shooting stops.

Now, I know some may feel that such thinking and such planning may interfere with our war effort. We must not let that happen. Nothing must stand in the way of winning the war as decisively and as quickly as possible. On the other hand we want a satisfying and lasting peace. That kind of a peace won't just happen. We have to prepare for it. It may take just as much effort to win the peace as it does to win the war. The fact of the matter is that we are now making decisions which will have a great bearing on our peacetime welfare. Some of these decisions I will mention a little later in my talk.

Without laying claim to any unusual ability to see what the peacetime problems are going to be, I will say that the longer this war goes on, the more I am convinced that we are likely to face a good many of the very same problems we faced after the last war. And I am afraid if we aren't very careful, some of those problems will be even more troublesome than they were then.

In the first place, although we had made a lot of progress, we hadn't anywhere near solved all of our agricultural problems when the present World War obscured them. Because this war is so much greater in all respects than the last war the problems growing out of it are potentially larger and harder to solve than the problems which faced us at the close of the last war. Especially is this true of those problems in the economic field.

I am going to confine my remarks today for the most part to the economic problem, for three reasons. First, I don't have time to discuss all the problems; second, I don't think we can go very far toward solving our social and agronomic problems without finding the solution to our economic problems; and third, the economic problem seems likely to worry us most w en we think about post-war. I would like to emphasize, however, that I think some of the other problems, such as conservation of the soil, and good rural homes, are really he most important over the long pull. But of course, farmers can't actually conserve their soil or have the kind of homes they want unless their economic problems are solved.

There are going to be many kinds of economic problems for agriculture but one of the biggest, it seems to me, can be stated rather simply. It is: Finding a good market for all the American farmers want to produce and can produce within the limits of sound farming methods. That problem can be stated simply, but the problem itself is far from simple. Neither is it a new problem. But I am genuinely afraid it is potentially more tremendous than ever before.

To get this problem out where we can examine it, we might first discuss what farmers want to produce. I believe you who know farmers will agree with me when I say that farmers want to produce all they can. They are never happier than when they are producing to capacity. They have surprised the whole country—I should perhaps say the whole world, including Hitler and Tojo—by showing how much they will produce with wartime incentives. They have performed wonders in production despite shortages of labor, machinery, and materials, and if they have just average weather it is my personal opinion they will break production records again in 1944. Every citizen in our country, and in many other countries, is greatly indebted to the American farmers for their wartime service.

Now, I have been wondering how much the American farmers can produce when this war is over and they are able to obtain enough help, machinery, and materials, and when they are able to take full advantage of some of the recent technological developments. To help me size up the possibilities in this field, I asked some of the people in the Department to make some estimates for me. The estimates astonished me at first; yet upon examination of all the factors involved I am inclined to think they are reasonable. As a matter of fact, I think they are conservative if our technological developments continue at the present rate. But let us take them as they came to me.

They indicate that with good demand and effective educational campaigns we can, within the next 6 years, increase our production to 60 percent above the average of 1935–39. If we have moderate demand and employ only our usual educational methods, we can increase our production up to 40 percent above the pre-war level. Just for purposes of illustration I am going to assume an increase of 50 percent. Increasing production one-half above pre-war by 1950 doesn't seem unreasonable when we stop to think that our production in 1943 was almost a third higher than 1935–39 production, despite wartime production obstacles.

Now it is estimated that our population by 1950 will be not much more than 10 percent larger than the average for 1935–39. Therefore, our agricultural production per capita under these assumptions will be way beyond any comparable figure in the past.

That should be a cause for rejoicing. Think how much health and happiness could come out of this production if the people who want and need more food could obtain it. Therein lies the other part—the big economic problem which I stated in the beginning—finding a market for all the farmer wants to produce and can produce.

Well, we know the big share of the market for this huge production must be found in this country. We have found out in wartime how much more good, nutritious food people will consume in this country when they have high incomes. But what kind of incomes are they going to have in 1950? Are we going to have as high industrial activity then as now? Shall we have the knowledge and the determination to lick the unemployment problem which has plagued us in the past? These questions can't be answered now. But they won't be answered satisfactorily in the peace period if we view them with complacency now—if we just put our heads in the sand and hope for the best. If these problems are not answered satisfactorily the farmers' economic problems won't be solved satisfactorily. But even though we do find the right answers and our per capita domestic consumption of food and other agricultural commodities has increased, say as much as 15 percent above the pre-war level, what are we going to do with the rest of the increase of which we are capable, amounting to perhaps 15 percent of our total production?

There is a possibility that we can increase the industrial uses of our agricultural products if we have high industrial activity. But I would say a word of caution about being to optimistic with regard to solving our economic problem by greatly expanded industrial uses of agricultural products. Our experience has too often been that we have to price our products too cheaply to enable them to move effectively into industrial channels. At best, it doesn't seem that we will be able to increase the industrial uses by 1950 to a point where more than 5 percent of our total production will be absorbed.

That leaves 10 percent of the expanded production, or an amount equivalent to 15 percent of our pre-war production, to be exported. That is more than we exported in the immediate pre-war years, and as much as we exported in the years following the last war. Do you remember that during those years immediately after the last war we were extending credit to other nations so that they could buy our products? Again, we either are going to have to extend credit or give agricultural products to other countries, or we are going to have to accept goods or services in exchange. That is a hard, indisputable fact. It need not be an unpleasant one because we can export our surpluses if we import surpluses of other countries. Are we, as individuals and as groups, ready to accept in exchange products which can be more efficiently produced in other nations? Let us be honest with ourselves about this, because honesty as usual is the best policy. Are we really ready to advocate lower tariffs rather than higher tariffs? Are we ready to agree to fewer trade barriers rather than more? All of us know that international trade is a two-way street. Are we willing to act as if we knew it?

But even though we do find an outlet for all that farmers can produce, we still must have a satisfactory price before we can say our big economic problem is solved. First, what is a satisfactory price? Some would say that parity is a fair price; others would prefer to speak in terms of parity income rather than parity price. Still others will say whatever the law of supply and demand dictates should be the price, even though they know that farmers seem to be the only ones subject to this law in its crude, unvarnished form. Too often farmers have felt the law means that the greater the supply, the less the demand at a fair price. They know of instances in the past where the larger supply has not only meant lower prices but has also meant much lower total income.

That leads us around to the idea of price supports or price fixing of some kind. Quite frankly, I think we are not going to abandon the idea of price support of some kind. And I personally think we should keep price supports for the protection of both consumer and producer. In making that statement I am thinking about stability of supplies and prices as well as the general level of prices resulting from price-support programs. However, I want to point out some problems growing out of price supports which must be licked if we are able to keep them over the long period.

First, let us not forget that, although you can set a price for an article, you can't force the public to buy it at that price. And if the public won't buy as much as farmers have to sell, we are in trouble. If the product is perishable the trouble comes very soon. If the product can be stored, the evil day is only delayed. So we are going to have to adjust our production to meet our consumers' demands. That may mean less hogs and more dairy cattle. It may mean less cotton and more food and feed crops. Something to be remembered, of course, is that support prices produce some international complications we can't ignore. For example, in thinking of fair prices to United States farmers, most of us will be contemplating levels considerably higher than world prices or export prices have been in the past. Who will absorb the difference between them—the farmer or the taxpayers? Let us take wheat for an example. In the years before the war we had hundreds of millions of bushels of extra wheat. So did Canada and Australia and Argentina. Our farmers were getting more for their wheat than it would bring on the world market. As a matter of fact, if the world market had been as high as ours, foreign production would have increased much faster. So we tried export subsidies. I don't think we could have continued to use them very long for several reasons. They are costly. I think they tend to drive down world prices still further because, in a buyer's market, everyone usually has to meet the low price and quite often further price cutting occurs. One of the worst features is that other nations very seriously object to them.

Of course, temporarily the war has obscured this problem of support prices for products which are produced in exportable quantities.

Even though the product in question isn't produced in large enough quantities so that there is an exportable surplus, how shall we prevent other nations from glutting our markets with their products if our price is higher than the world price? That very thing is happening in wool right now simply because our price is higher than the world price. It will be said that, in such a case, we should apply an added tariff or a barrier of some kind. But tariffs and barriers, as well as export dumping, only lead to retaliatory measures by other countries, and if we aren't careful we will have ruined our possibilities for international trade and aggravated our farm economic problem.

Now, as I said in the beginning, there are some decisions in the making at the present time which will have an important bearing on our economic situation in the post-war period.

As an example, let's look briefly at the problem of inflation. I can't think of anything that would cause us more economic difficulties in the post-war period than permitting ourselves to be caught up in an inflationary cyclone during or immediately after the war. I know we would like to receive higher prices. That's human nature. And I appreciate the fact that our pride doesn't permit us to readily endorse subsidies. It is only natural that we should much rather have higher prices. But how long would it take us to get over inflation if we let prices go up and what would we suffer while we were recovering. That is too dreadful to contemplate. I can't forget that some farmers never recovered from the deflation of the last war. For myself I would much rather have $13 or $14 hogs now and comparable prices in peacetime than to have hogs go to $20 or $22 a hundred, as they did during or immediately after the last war, and then have them in just a year or two go down to $6 or $7.

Today there are unmistakable signs that another land boom is in the making. I don't need to take your time to describe the losses and the heartaches that followed in the wake of the land boom of the last war. The Government is still trying to help people and institutions recover from that crash. What are we doing about the present land boom which can be even more devastating? Thus far we have done nothing but talk about it, and not even enough of that. There are some measures, such as a stiff capital gains tax on the profits of farm sales and the limitation of credit, which would help to hold the boom down, but apparently there aren't enough people aroused to bring about such action.

In the coming weeks, Congress is faced with the task of making one of the most important legislative decisions of the war and post-war period. On June 30, the Price Control Act expires. Between now and then, the people, through their legislative representatives, must not only decide the question of renewing the act, but also the kind of bill to be adopted in replacing the present act.

I think it is fair to say that the majority of us are overwhelmingly in favor of continuing these price-control measures. At the same time, I think it is fair to say that the majority of us would like to see some amendments to the present act. In the minds of those persons proposing them, the amendments are only fair and necessary. However, if we start to amend this act so that it will be acceptable to everyone, it will be a price-control act in name only. And there is utterly no use in passing a price control act unless it is going to control prices.

Perhaps the reason we hear complaints about the one we have now is because it is effective. Many of these complaints we hear are based not so much on the harshness of the act itself, but on what appear to be inequities. In the course of a week's time you can, if you wish, become completely convinced that the present act is unfair to labor, or agriculture, or industry—or any two of the three. And since the act is a creation of human beings, it does have its weaknesses. By and large, however, it has done a most effective job. Comparing prices in this war period with those of World War No. 1 proves that. Our price-control measures have not only made it possible for us to provide wartime necessities for our families at reasonable prices but they have also contributed importantly in holding down the cost of the war itself. Mr. Bowles has estimated that if it had not been for the Price Control Act our war costs would be $65,000,000,000 more than they are now.

Enactment of an uneffective price-control measure at this time would do three things: (1) It would increase the cost of living; (2) it would increase the cost of the war; and (3) it would seriously disrupt the distribution of food and other civilian wartime necessities. Inflation feeds on itself. Increases prices cause hoarding and reluctance to sell. That, in turn, creates still higher prices.

Furthermore, any measure which fails really to hold the line on inflation would seriously jeopardize some of our great American institutions. Insurance companies and other institutions of public trust would find their investments depreciating and at the same time find insurance less attractive to a public which sees its money constantly losing value.

This is a matter in which you must take a deep interest. You must keep yourself informed and keep your policyholders informed. It is one of the most critical issues in our history. Because it means so much to everyone now and in the future, let us make price control more effective rather than less effective. Let's hold the line while our boys are whipping the Nazis and the Japs. We should do it for their sake if for no other reason. Inflation now means post-war misery for everyone, and farmers in particular.

I suspect I have left the impression that I am very much concerned about agriculture in the post-war period. I am. Maybe you think I have overemphasized some of the difficulties that lie ahead. I don't think I have. I tried to describe them as I see them, not as I wished they were. As a matter of fact, the potential difficulties I described were based on the assumption that we would find a solution to our old problem of unemployment and underconsumption. If we should fail to do that—and we have to recognize that there's no positive assurance that we will find a solution—well, I don't know how much worse the farm-economic problem would be than what I have described as a possibility.

Again, I want to call attention to the fact that none of the problems I have referred to are new. But I am afraid they are potentially more difficult than they have been in the past. However, I think we can whip them if we really try. We have had a lot of experience with these problems. We know some remedies are practical and some are not. We have learned that we have to weigh the cost of doing something effective against the cost involved in the waste and loss of doing nothing.

For instance, I think we ought to know now that one of the greatest wastes in the world is permitting human hands to be idle when we have the resources to produce things people need. We surely can agree that increasing consumption to support prices is not only cheaper but more humanitarian than restricting production to support prices. That should go for industry and labor as well as for agriculture, of course.

Above all, I hope we have learned that, after all, most of our problems are man-made problems and therefore they can be overcome by our own actions. These actions call for hard thinking, careful planning, unselfish leadership, and a resolute will to do the job.

The Real Isolationists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oil City (Pa.) Derrick, of April 14, 1944:

THE REAL ISOLATIONISTS

The term "isolationist" should not be used in a criminating manner. Many of those who now apply it derisively were isolationists themselves before Pearl Harbor. Even after it was seen that war in Europe was inevitable no one stressed neutrality more than President Roosevelt. There was also general agreement on the cash-and-carry plan of sales of war materials to the European nations likely to become embroiled. This was isolationism.

Our idea of the real isolationist is the man who refused to recognize the imminence of this war and who did not add his voice to the demand that we build up an army and navy sufficiently large to meet the challenge of Nazi Germany or warlike Japan. Rather than take protective measures we allowed ourselves to be bullied by the Communists and labor leaders, the New Dealers, and the rest of the radicals who fought military preparedness as if it were a pestilence.

We sank billions of dollars in power dams, we wrangled over Muscle Shoals, and we spent more billions for unemployment relief, but we let Japan outbuild our Navy, we shipped her oil and scrap, and about the only army we had was the National Guard. If the pursuit of these policies was not isolationism what was it?

Isolationism has been the curse of the past decade. Surely, Ambassador Grew knew what Japan was preparing for. If he conveyed his fears to the State Department, and the State Department in turn conveyed them to the President, why were the facts not laid before Congress and appropriations urged for an army and navy great enough to preserve world peace?

The ostrich-like policies of Britain, France, and Russia might have lulled us into a false sense of security, but where were the eyes of our ambassadors and ministers? Or were they merely rich men enamored of the glitter of the European capitals who had won their posts through fat contributions to Democratic campaign funds?

The world is in the mess it is today because the democratic nations refused to read the danger signals. Our Government was playing power politics. Our managing politicians were more interested in their own security than they were in the Nation's safety.

These men were the true isolationists. At one time we had upward of 300,000 young men in the Civilian Conservation Corps. When the suggestion was made that these boys should get some military training what a howl went up. The radical friends of the administration wanted nothing that would smack of militarism, while Hitler was training every youth in Germany for that purpose and Japan was fortifying every island in the Southwest Pacific.

The French were swayed by Blum and his Popular front, the British by Bevin and his professional agitators, and the Americans by the Lewises, Greens, Murrays, Hillmans, and Dubinskys—by the leaders of the pressure groups who had millions of votes to sell for Government favors.

Certainly the use of "isolationist" as a term of opprobrium does not come with good grace from those who refused to see the war trends in Europe and Asia and who waited until we were attacked before they began to prepare for war.

Farm Prosperity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that at least 98 percent of the farmers of the United States are aware of the much greater returns they have received for their 1943 crops which approximated four times as much as they received in 1931, 1932, and 1933. I observed an article appearing in the Chicago Sun, bearing on farmers' income which shows that in 1943 it was in excess of $19,000,000,000—an increase of $5,000,000,000 over their 1942 income. The predictions are that 1944 will be still more prosperous for them. I insert the article under the leave given me and I urge the farmers to read it and to give credit where credit is due:

FARMERS' CASH INCOME IN 1943 SOARED TO ALL-TIME RECORD

Farmers' cash income in 1943 soared to an all-time high of $19,764,560,000—$3,684,752,000 more than in 1942—and revised estimates of cash income from livestock may push the total increase over 1942 to better than $5,000,000,000, Agriculture Department sources said today.

Th cash return to farmers last year was the largest on record and 23 percent higher than a year earlier when $16,079,808,000 was earned, a Bureau of Agricultural Economics report showed. The total figures include Government payments.

Income to farmers in 1943, after deducting labor and other costs, was estimated at $12,475,000,000, compared with $9,480,000,000 in 1942, a 32 percent increase, the department said.

"Marketing of the largest number of hogs in the history of the country and the sale of increased numbers of eggs from larger flocks accounted for most of the advance in income," B. A. E. said.

"The record potato crop in Maine, favorable prices for tobacco in Connecticut, exceptional crops of citrus fruits in Florida, both in 1942 and 1943, and the valuable crop of vegetables in Arizona went a long way in bringing about the increases in receipts from crops in 1943 of well over 60 percent as compared with 1942."

One source pointed out that the $19,764,560,000 figure may be increased by another $2,000,000,000 when revisions are made in the near future on 1943 livestock marketings.

Thomas E. Dewey Belies the Title of "The Sphinx of Albany"—He Makes His Position Clear on Domestic and Foreign Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, we Americans frequently develop misconceptions and form false conclusions simply because we hear or read statements which are not based upon fact but which are accepted as factual only because they are so frequently repeated and so widely circulated. In connection with the prospective nomination of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey as Republican candidate for President, many Americans are in danger of forming erroneous conclusions solely because so many ill-founded and fictitious statements have been bandied around by careless writers and speakers to the effect that the attitudes and policies of Tom Dewey are not known to the electorate of this Republic. The truth is, however, that better than any other potential candidate for President on either ticket the policies and program of Tom Dewey have been made clearly available to the general public both by the spoken and written word and by his definite actions as Governor of the State of New York.

The following article by Gould Lincoln, taken from Sunday's issue of the Washington Star, provides informative, albeit partial, summary of Governor Dewey's attitudes on matters of public policy of importance to this Republic.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that Tom Dewey is also author of a book which sets forth his position with crystal clarity. That book is The Case Against the New Deal, and it is published by Harper Brothers, of New York City.

In view of the fact that from his own book, from his various speeches, from his official acts and declarations as Governor of New York, and from many, many interviews with the press the attitudes and policies of Governor Dewey have become widely known, it is a bit surprising to read so much in certain metropolitan newspapers and in the columns of pro-New Deal columnists to the effect that Governor Dewey should now announce himself as a candidate for President and begin an extensive speaking campaign setting forth his stand on public questions. In my opinion, Tom Dewey is wise in not permitting himself to be stampeded from his consistent position in which he has said he will not become a candidate for the Republican nomination and in which it is clear that as a good American he will accept the Republican nomination and head the campaign for his election if the convention selects him as the party nominee.

It might be noted in passing that the newspapermen and radio speakers who are now most articulate in urging Mr. Dewey to take time off from his many wartime duties as Governor of New York to start an active personal campaign for his own nomination are the self-same speakers and writers who were most active in advising Wendell Willkie the best procedures to follow in order to secure the Republican nomination. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the value of the advice and counsel of this self-appointed coterie of president-makers is not beyond suspect in view of the results which it obtained for Mr. Willkie. Having seen their suggestions adopted and followed by Mr. Willkie with such poor success, these persistent advisers are now offering them to other candidates. However, it would appear that Mr. Dewey as well as Governor Bricker, Harold Stassen, Douglas MacArthur, and others prominently mentioned for the Presidency, would do well to seek the counsel of political doctors whose prescriptions for the body politic have not brought the disastrous results procured by those offering the recommendations followed by Mr. Willkie.

We used to have an old-fashioned idea in America that when the office seeks the man, we secure our best Presidents. We also considered it good American procedure for a presidential candidate to run on the platform developed by his associates and himself at a national party convention. For a pre-convention presidential possibility to beg for the nomination too vigorously or to endeavor to impose his personal notions upon the party too violently is neither a dignified nor a successful formula to follow in persuading Republicans whom they should nominate for President. Tom Dewey is versed enough in American history and American traditions to realize the function that party government plays in America and to understand that one man domination of either the Republican Party or the people's Republic is something foreign to the basic features of the American way of life.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Congress and the country will be interested in reading the interesting summary of Tom Dewey's attitudes prepared in the following article by Gould Lincoln. It reveals Tom Dewey as a man with definite convictions but he is not a man possessing a dictatorial complex.

THE SPHINX OF ALBANY SPEAKS FREELY—MANY ADDRESSES GIVE CLEAR PICTURE OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC VIEWS

(By Gould Lincoln)

Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, leading probability for the Republican Presidential nomination, has been labeled "the Albany sphinx, the enigma of 1944." No one, so the charge goes, knows his opinions regarding the important issues of the day. No one knows what his own political plans are.

These are the moans of the Democrats—and of those Republicans who do not wish to see him nominated. Mr. Dewey is constantly importuned by them to say where he stands on public problems.

What does Dewey think about these issues? More important, what has he said about them?

Governor Dewey has never been a "pussyfooter." His opponents in past political fights have never found him reluctant to state his views or to strike hard. A perusal of his speeches, made during the last 2 years, his messages to the State legislature, and his statements to the press, reveal a careful study of both national and international issues and a searching knowledge of State affairs.

He is shown as a strong supporter of international collaboration for peace in the future. He is shown as a determined supporter of the war effort, wishing to press the war to final and complete victory. He is an ardent advocate of revival of State control of State affairs. He is an opponent of centralized power in Washington. His speeches and his record as Governor show him a progressive in the field of social security and in his attitude toward organized labor and management.

Here is what the New York Governor has said on important issues:

THE WAR EFFORT

From Governor Dewey's inaugural address, January 1, 1943:

"We are engaged in a savage war for survival. It is a war not merely of men and materials, but also a war of human faith. * * * In all things needed for the winning of the war we are united in unswerving loyalty to our Commander in Chief, the President of the United States. We are united in our faith in freedom, in the ultimate triumph of justice and in the triumph of freemen under God. Shoulder to shoulder, with every resource at our command, we shall carry on the fight to total and lasting victory."

From Governor Dewey's annual message to the legislature January 5, 1944:

"Since we last met, the armed forces of our country and our allies have made great strides on the road toward victory. * * * I have absolute confidence that this precious unity will continue and grow even stronger as we enter the final, desperate stages of this dreadful conflict and that victory will surely and before too long rest on the arms of the free people of the world."

From Governor Dewey's speech to the Republican women Saturday, May 9, 1942:

"We shall win the war and then we must win the peace. For as the most powerful of nations, we have learned that power begets responsibility. Never again shall we forswear hard-won victory. * * *

"It will not do now, in my judgment, merely to voice again the aspirations that were shattered 20 years ago. The world has greatly changed since then. Even after the total victory, upon which we shall insist, it will be impossible to put back into their bottles the genii which have been released. National and racial aspirations, long subdued, have been awakened. The hopes of hundreds of millions of people all over the world are on the march. The victory at arms will not be the end, but only the beginning. * * *

"We know we can work together with other nations for war. We must work with other nations for peace. We know that when the freedom of one nation is destroyed the freedom of other nations is already in peril."

From an address by Governor Dewey to the Young Republican Clubs May 16, 1942:

"We cannot think about the future of America without considering the future of the world. On this subject there is need for hard-headed thinking. Every time we get into a war we tend to think only in terms of idealism. After the war we tend to think only in terms of domestic materialism.

MUST PLAY WORLD ROLE

"We cannot build the next peace on sentimentalism alone. We of America are tough-minded realists. We strive for a world where peace will endure not only for the welfare of the world, but for the elementary self-interest of every American. Unless our thinking includes that premise, the American people will reject it. And that must not occur again. We must use our industrial might with a full sense of responsibility. The young and vigorous America that will be reborn out of victory must play its part in building a peaceful world to come.

"No man can chart a blueprint of the future of the world. But any man who thinks of the suffering and horror of war must think with a clear and resolute mind and spirit about the future. Twice now the people of the United States have entered a major world war which they hoped to avoid. As a result our people should be determined that we must not continue this process of periodic sacrifice of the flower of youth. * * *

"We must meet from a human and understanding point of view the problem of the homeless Jews and other dispossessed peoples. We must meet constructively the legitimate desires of a free Polish people, a free Czechoslovakian people, a free Dutch, and free Belgian people, among others. We will deal, when the time comes, with a free France and we will recognize the aspirations of those great peoples of the human family—China and India."

From Governor Dewey's Lincoln Day dinner speech in New York, February 12, 1944:

"Anyone who gratuitiously raises so much as a doubt as to the unswerving determination of our party (Republican) to build a great peace trifles with the truth and with his country's future. I was present at Mackinac Island when the Republican Governors and Republican leaders in the Senate and House of Congress deliberated upon the principles which must guide us in bringing about a lasting peace. There was not one person present who was not moved by the tremendous opportunity to state the principles by which it was to be approached and inspired by what lies ahead of us as a Nation.

"It was that group of Republicans who drew the Mackinac charter, which was translated into action by our distinguished Secretary of State at Moscow. It was that result which was embodied in the Connally resolution, adopted by a bipartisan majority of the Senate. Here was the first concrete, constructive achievement in our foreign policy of the future and its framework was advanced by the Republican Party at Mackinac Island."

From an interview with Governor Dewey at Mackinac Island, September 5, 1943:

"It would be to our interest to have a military alliance with Great Britain after the war. The American people have never suffered such a shock as when they feared the British Navy might be seized by the Nazis in the summer of 1940. As a matter of fact, we have had a de facto alliance with Great Britain ever since the War of 1812."

LOOK TOWARD OTHERS

Governor Dewey added at the time he believed that eventually Russia and China should be included in the alliance.

From an excerpt of the 1942 New York Republican platform drafted by Governor Dewey himself:

"The United States must be prepared to undertake new obligations and responsibilities in the community of nations. We must cooperate with other nations to promote the widest international exchange of goods and services, to broaden access to raw materials, to achieve monetary and economic stability and thus discourage the rampant growth of nationalism and its spawn, economic and military aggression."

From an address by Governor Dewey in New York May 28, 1942:

"Assuming that the lease-lend debts will be canceled and that there is to be no repetition of the futile attempt to collect reparations in the form of money, there will still be difficult transfer problems. After the war we shall have to lease, lend and give both to our allies and to our defeated enemies, food, medical aid, machinery and equipment to rehabilitate their destitute peoples and rebuild their bomb-torn lands. But we cannot establish a sound post-war economy beyond the first period of emergency reconstruction on a basis of international charity. We must find means of exchanging with other nations the things they can use and the things we can use."

POST-WAR ECONOMY

From an address by Governor Dewey in New York, May 28, 1942.

"Our great danger may very well be that, having succeeded in suppressing, in part at least, a price inflation during the war, we may give way to a post-war inflation. I have already spoken of the reaction of the public to wartime controls. If the history of the last war is any guide, we may have strong popular insistence for throwing off all such controls and for getting 'back to normalcy.' That, rather than any business collapse, may be our test.

"If we suddenly discard all controls and give way to a post-war inflation we will have still another reaction. That revulsion may carry us, by another swing of the pendulum, far into a peacetime system of regulated economy. Our people will not want that, but there will be those who will point to the episode as conclusive proof that private, unplanned enterprise is incapable of giving us sustained employment except under the stimulus of war and the restraints of full Government control.

"I do not believe either swing is necessary. Neither is it necessary if the genius of American business which is producing to win the war starts now—today—to win the peace. * * *

AMERICANS NEVER GO BACK

"The American people never go backward. I do not believe in reverting to the theory of laissez faire, nor am I willing to go back to the nearer past and accept the creeping collectivism of the past few years.

"Facing the world ahead and recognizing the necessity of a Government active in promoting the best interests of individuals and individual enterprise, we should establish two principles at the base of such regulation.

"The first is that Government intervention must be of a character consistent with the American free-enterprise system. Its objective must be to widen—not restrict—individual economic opportunity. It must do this without any reservations as to its faith in private enterprise. In short it must promote fair trade and not treat trade as a thing to be tolerated.

"Second, in the administration of Government intervention in private business the personnel must be composed of those who believe in and understand both American workers and businessmen. This is impossible where a supreme qualification for holding public office seems to be complete innocence of any experience in the matter which is to be the subject of regulation. * * *

"Businessmen must learn to work with the Government. They must learn to think in terms of national well-being as well as in terms of their duty to their stockholders and to their partners."

LABOR

From Governor Dewey's annual message to the legislature January 6, 1943:

"In planning for the future we must make sure that we are preserving the rights of labor in accordance with the constitution and laws of the State of New York. Organized labor faces a difficult crisis in our country today. In large measure the functions of free collective bargaining have been superseded by regulations governing hours, wages, and conditions of employment, promulgated by the Federal Government. In total war this is probably inevitable. * * * The process we are witnessing with our own eyes here at home demonstrates the fundamental truth that there is no place for genuine collective bargaining in a regulated economy."

From Governor Dewey's address to the State industrial union October 30, 1943:

"In other States there have been large and dangerous strikes in the production of coal or airplanes and of vital parts of war machines. * * * But in New York State since the beginning of the war there has been a steady decline in the number of strikes. * * * There has not been a single major strike in our State this year. There are many reasons for this record. First and foremost is the striking patriotism of labor in our State. * * * Here is a record that says plainly that organized labor in New York State has come of age. * * * In New York the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively through agents of its own choosing is written into the constitution. It is part of our fundamental law. That is as it should be. In our modern society this right is as basic as freedom of speech or freedom of the press.

"RIGHTS BRING RESPONSIBILITIES

"Like every other human right, the right of collective bargaining carries with it responsibilities. The overwhelming majority of labor leaders clearly recognize those responsibilities. Unfortunately it is the few abuses of power which get attention while the honest day-to-day job is often taken for granted. It is true we still have labor organizations that are run along undemocratic lines. We still have instances of the misuse of union funds. * * * But there is no longer room for question of the vitality and essential character in our society of labor organization. We are developing a mature, responsible leadership in labor.

"Out of the sacrifices of this war we intend to create a better future. In the shaping of that future labor must of right have a big voice.

"Only a fool in management would wish to destroy the sense of security and usefulness which comes to workingmen when they are ably represented by honest labor leadership which believes in the American enterprise system. Such management would be digging its own grave.

"By the same token labor unions can never be destroyed from the outside. They can only fail if they fail to lend their united support to full production in a free society. We must—all of us—learn to marshal our full support for every single useful enterprise that is ready to produce goods and employ people."

SECURITY

From Governor Dewey's inaugural address January 1, 1943:

"The new administration of your State is committed to the proposition that our society must provide full employment through full production. We know that these objectives are attainable at a price, for twice within our generation they have been attained at the price of war. They must also be achieved in peace. * * *

"The State will have a duty constantly to adjust its social-welfare agencies and educational facilities to meet the special needs of a post-war community. * * *

"We seek security from the economic hazards of large-scale industrialization. But we cannot rely solely upon Government for that security."

From Governor Dewey's annual message to the legislature January 5, 1944:

"A more effective attack upon our present day and future responsibilities in the field of social security requires that we bring related activities in the field of social service into an effective working team and that we simplify our administrative machinery. * * *

"Medical care for persons who cannot provide it for themselves and their families continues to be one of the chief areas of unmet human need. This calls for cooperative action on the part of public administrators and private physicians to bring about a high order of medical care for the needy sick by the judicious use of tax funds and medical facilities."

From Governor Dewey's message to the legislature March 26, 1943:

"When I first addressed your honorable bodies at the opening of this session I called your attention to a long-standing evil which permitted the payment of as little as $900 per year to full-time employees of the State, and recommended an increase in such pay to a minimum of $1,200. By action of the legislature the $1,200 minimum has since become law."

SOLDIER VOTE

From Governor Dewey's message to the legislature, March 7, 1944:

"There is a perfectly simple solution to the problem. Every soldier can be provided with a ballot which will be valid under our Constitution. Any pretense of overburdening the military or transport services is a sham. Purported literature many times the weight of all the paper ballots under the plan I propose have been shipped regularly abroad at the direction of officials in Washington. Moreover, we have at last been able to find out what the authorities in Washington say they are willing to transport and the size and weight of the ballots I shall propose to you comply with their own specification. * * *

"Citizens who fight for their country have the right to vote. That right must be made effective. They are entitled to have that right free from partisan exploitation or perversion. They have a right to know that their vote will not be limited to some offices and denied as to others."

CENTRALIZATION AND BUREAUCRACY

From an address by Governor Dewey at the New York Herald-Tribune Forum November 17, 1943:

"Most of us are agreed that there must be a halt to the concentration of power in the national Government. That means we must stop leaning wholly upon the national Government. In the period ahead the States will be strong. They alone will have survived the war without overburdening debt. They express the vitality and resurgence of a free people. They are unafraid of the future. They are untrammeled by the weariness and defeatism that comes from the repeated fumbling of overcentralized government, which believed that this country was built to saturation in 1932.

FREE ENTERPRISE

From an address by Governor Dewey in New York October 1, 1943:

"The society which has completely abandoned all private enterprise, whether it be in business, education, or social service, cannot any longer claim to be a free society. The fellow over whose head government must, in all matters, hold a protective umbrella, is a frightened man, not a freeman. It is the frightened man who is the source and raw material for regimentation and totalitarianism."

From an address by Governor Dewey in New York, May 28, 1942:

"It is my firm conviction that we can meet these burdens and fulfill our future responsibilities as a free people and only under a system of free enterprise. But if we do not meet them well and fully under free enterprise the school of collectivist planners will surely be here to take over the job. And that will be the last chance of freemen to solve their own problems."

From an address by Governor Dewey in New York, May 9, 1942.

"Our factories are turning out the arms. Meanwhile the administration is busy putting into reverse, every economic concept it has preached for years. It used to tell us that our industrial plant was overbuilt. Now untold billions must be poured into construction of new plants. It used to tell us to borrow, spend, and consume. Now, it must warn us to save, conserve, and pay our debts. It used to promote inflation by adaptations of every device advocated from William Jennings Bryan to Dr. Townsend. Now it belatedly warns us against the terrible consequences of inflation. It used to tell us that we had too much food, and throttled its production. Now it must ration what it so long tried to destroy. It used to pillory industrial managers as public enemies. Now it calls upon them to save the Nation from disaster. These foolish, false prophets who could not plan for a war they said was inevitable would not plan for a new world."

AGRICULTURE AND FOOD

From Governor Dewey's address at the Governors' Conference, Columbus, June 22, 1943:

"No purpose would be served in analyzing the incredible deficiencies of the National Government in its 10-year campaign to restrict food production in the United States. We are just now reaping the harvest of these policies. But just as a sardonic final touch, we now find that out of the genius of the O. P. A. there was developed a theory that it would be a good idea to repeal the natural law of economics that corn and hog prices are tied together. The result is a ceiling price on corn at $1.05 at Chicago. Meanwhile the farmer can get $1.45 for the same corn right on the farm just by throwing it over the fence to his pigs."

From an address by Governor Dewey in New York, April 9, 1943:

"Under the stress of war we have relearned the obvious truth that no central government can solve at one time the problems of the Indiana corn grower and the New York potato grower or fruit grower. No power in Washington can fit into the same pattern the needs of the Colorado rancher and the Virginia tobacco grower. No set of national controls, however much they may be multiplied, can do anything but hinder total agricultural production."

Rural Electrification

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a copy of my address given before the annual meeting of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, Chicago, Ill., on Tuesday, March 21, 1944.

The matter referred to follows:

First, I want to thank my friends in the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association for honoring me with this manifestation of their gratitude for my services in promoting rural electrification throughout the country.

I regard my work in this respect as my greatest service to mankind. As I have said before, electricity is the lifeblood of our advancing civilization. It is the greatest servant humanity has ever known, and the only one the man or woman of ordinary means can afford. It has been the dream of my life to have it placed in every farm home in America at rates the farmers can afford to pay; and I want to say here and now that regardless of the carping criticisms on the part of the real enemies of rural electrification, the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association is rendering a service in helping to defend and promote this program that simply cannot be overestimated. Their services recently in helping us to get the main provisions of the Rankin-Russell rural electrification bill incorporated in the Pace bill that was pending before the Committee on Agriculture, and which has now been reported and passed by the House with those amendments included, was one of the greatest services ever rendered to the farmers of this Nation.

These provisions reduce the rate of interest to the co-ops to 2 percent, extend the amortization period to a maximum of 35 years, take the ceiling off and leave the amount to be provided each year for rural electrification to the discretion of your Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

This will go far toward helping us to realize the goal of our program, the electrification of every farm home in America at rates the farmers can afford to pay.

I began this fight more than 10 years ago by organizing cooperative power associations in every county in the district which I have the honor to represent in Congress, and have pushed the program locally and nationally with all the energy I possessed. The result is that today I have one of the best electrified districts in America. It is true we have not reached all the farmers in every county, but we have a program in operation through which, when materials are again made available, we can, and we will, reach them all.

From a national standpoint our success has exceeded my fondest hopes of 10 years ago. At that time less than 10 percent of the farm homes of this country enjoyed the use of any electricity at all; while all the countries of western Europe had from 90 to 100 percent of their farms electrified. Even Japan had 90 percent of her farms electrified; New Zealand, a new and sparsely settled country, had more than 65 percent of her farms electrified.

Owing to the $40,000,000 limitation on the amount Congress was authorized to provide each year, we were so handicapped that we could not have electrified the farm homes of America in 50 years, without some relief from that restriction. In 1938 I forced through an amendment to a bill in Congress, on which all points of order had been waived, increasing the amount provided for rural electrification for the next fiscal year by $100,000,000, making a total of $140,000,000 available for the fiscal year 1939. Immediately the cause of rural electrification sprang into new life and leaped forward with such vigor that today, instead of 10 percent we have more than 40 percent of our farm homes electrified.

With the assistance of organizations such as yours, with the support of the individual independent farmers throughout the Nation, we expect to carry this drive onward until we reach them all.

When I came to Congress the American people were using only 40,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity a year. This year they will use more than 220,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours, or five and one-half times as much as we used then.

I predict that within a reasonably short time after the close of this war we will be using anywhere from 500,000,000,000 to a trillion kilowatt-hours a year; and I want to see that the farmers get their pro rata share.

We have 230,000,000,000 billion kilowatt-hours of hydroelectric power now going to waste in our navigable streams and their tributaries every year. I want to see that waterpower developed, harnessed, and used for the benefit of all the American people, and especially the American farmers.

Some time ago a Member of Congress is said to have accused us of trying to enslave the farmers of this country, intimating that we were trying to control them politically. I have heard a great deal of nonsense expressed in criticism of the rural electrification program, but I believe that was the limit. In the first place, this rural electrification program with its independent cooperative associations, controlled by the independent individual members themselves, is one of the greatest democratic movements of all times.

It would be absolutely impossible to control the votes of these farmers and their wives, even if anybody were stupid enough to undertake it. As for enslaving the farmers by imposing this program upon them, that suggestion is more stupid than the other.

Do we enslave the farmer by taking away from him the old brass lamp, or inducing him to discard it and light his home, his barn, and his outhouses with electricity?

Do we enslave the farm women of the country when we turn the old washpot bottom upward, or use it to feed the cows in, discard the old scrubboard and deprive her of the luxury of bowing down over it and wearing her life away scrubbing the family clothes, and substitute a modern washing machine that will do the same work for almost nothing, while she goes about her housework or attends to her other duties?

Do we enslave the farmer, or his wife and children, by doing away with the old oaken bucket with its long rope and creaking windlass, and enabling him to install a modern electric pump that supplies his home with water throughout, also his barn and his cattle in the pasture, for a few cents a month?

Do we enslave the farmer when we enable him to use a modern milking machine, with which he can milk four or five times as many cows as he could milk with his naked hands, and provide him with the facilities for operating a grade A dairy, which he could not do before?

Do we enslave the farmer and his wife and children when we make it possible for him to own and operate an electric refrigerator to preserve and keep fresh and wholesome the food his family needs, or provide cold storage facilities that enable him to save his own meat and other produce, instead of having to ship it to a processing plant 300 or 500 miles distant, and back, paying the freight both ways?

In a word, do we enslave the farmers of this country when we make it possible for them, through their own efforts, to take to their homes everything we have in the city except the noise and the city taxes?

If that is enslaving the farmers, please brand me as one of the greatest advocates of such slavery the world has ever known, for if I have my way, those facilities are going to be made available to every farmer in America, at rates so reasonable that it will not only be possible for him to pay them, but it will be economic folly not to do so.

Remember that our farm boys, those young men from the farm homes of every State in the Union and every section of every State, are today fighting the battles of this Nation on every contested front in the world. It is our duty not only to preserve American institutions against those radical elements that would tear them down; it is our duty not only to guarantee to those boys that when they come back home they will find the same flag flying at the same place, over the same institutions their fathers established; but it is also our duty to make it possible for them to go back to the farm and enjoy all the comforts and conveniences our modern civilization can provide—one of the greatest of which is an abundant supply of electricity at rates they can afford to pay.

When we shall have consummated this program, electrified America from coast to coast, even to the most remote precinct and the most isolated home, we will have laid the foundation for the future greatness of a country more powerful than the Athens of Pericles or the Rome of Augustus, more splendid than the France of Louis, or the England of Queen Elizabeth—one that will shower her blessings upon the strong and the weak, the rich and the poor, and make this the greatest, the richest, the most desirable country the world has ever known.

Iraq's Contribution to the War Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting statement compiled from Iraq Government official sources by Maj. Chefik Haddad, of the Iraq staff in Washington, setting forth the sacrifices this small and young nation is making for the successful prosecution of the war in which we are engaged.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Since Iraq's entry into the war the activities of its national administration have been greatly expanded and coordinated with the war efforts of the United Nations in the Middle East.

Public security organizations, such as police, censorship, etc., have been enlarged in order to furnish the necessary protection for the large Allied forces stationed in Iraq, and for the immense supplies of war material that have been transported through the country en route to Russia. All expenses thus incurred by these organizations have been borne by the Iraq Government.

All telephone and telegraph installations have been placed at the disposal of Iraq's allies. Iraq has reduced civilian use of long distance and local lines to a minimum. Moreover, telephone communications with neighboring countries have been completely suspended for civilian purposes and handed over to the Allied military forces. Trunk lines, switchboards, instruments, wires, poles, and other equipment which the Iraq Government had in stock and on order for the much-needed expansion and maintenance of the country's communication system, have been made available to the military authorities together with the services of Iraq's engineers and workshops.

The ministry of education has made available to the Allies all the educational facilities and workshops of the manual training schools.

The ministry of social affairs has devised a labor program whereby military needs are being served most efficiently and with precedence to civilian requirements.

Iraq's public health department and hospitals have extended their services to the Allied troops and technicians stationed in Iraq.

LAND COMMUNICATIONS

The service of the public works department and its large, well-equipped workshops have been utilized exclusively for the construction and maintenance of war communications. Large stocks of irreplaceable materials owned by the department, such as steel and other metals, and originally intended for national needs, have been utilized to further the war effort of the United Nations.

Very stringent restrictions have been placed on civilian use of building materials so as to divert existing stocks for military purposes.

The entire railway system of Iraq (about 1,200 miles), together with its workshops, stocks of material, technical staff, etc., has been placed under the joint control of the Iraq Government and the British military. Maj. Gen. H. C. Smith, of the British Army, in a signed statement dated July 14, 1943, declared:

"These railways have readily supplied the British military forces with various materials, stores, equipment, etc., whenever these were required and have also extended to them facilities relating to the supply of electricity and water and repairs in the workshops. In addition, lands, sheds, buildings, etc., the property of the railways which the British forces needed for their purposes have been placed at their disposal. The provision of such facilities and the extension of assistance of this nature will be continued by this Administration whenever and as long as they are required.

"It may not be out of place to mention here that the demands of the British military authorities have placed a heavy strain upon the various services of these railways, especially upon traffic operations and this Administration is gratified to place on record the fact that all staff, both Iraq and non-Iraq, have risen to the occasion and by their unstinted exertions have enabled this Administration to cope adequately and expeditiously with the increased military traffic and other requirements.

"H. C. SMITH, Major General."

All of Iraq's existing roads have been used gratuitously by the armies of the United Nations. Many new highways have been constructed and large expenditures made for the strengthening of bridges and other overpasses in order to carry the exceptionally heavy traffic. All motor and animal transport has been requisitioned for military purposes.

WATER COMMUNICATIONS

River steamers and crafts, inland port installations and waterways have been handed over to the military, leaving a minimum of facilities available for civilian use.

The Port of Basra with its grounds and equipment, which includes electrical power and water purification plants, roads, airdromes, hangars, residential quarters, rest houses and clubs, has been made available for the use of British and other allied nations even to the exclusion of commercial traffic.

Civilian employees of the port have been evacuated in order to provide living quarters for the military. The plants have been enlarged so as to supply Allied troops with electricity and safe drinking water. Large tracts of ground owned by the port have been allotted to the Allied military authorities for the construction of building and camps.

Among major works carried out by the port technicians have been—

(a) Construction of two deep-sea berths.

(b) Construction of berths for discharge of lighters.

(c) Surfacing of areas for storage purposes.

(d) Erection of additional quay cranes.

AIR COMMUNICATIONS

All Iraq's air communication facilities such as airports, landing fields, hangars, workshops and equipment, have been handed over to the Allied military forces for their exclusive use.

IRRIGATION

Flood control: The department of irrigation has had to give full protection to the country's strategic communications, to the large areas occupied by the armies of the United Nations and to numerous storage installations housing valuable stocks of war materials. The building and reinforcing of river bunds and other protective earthworks such as diversionary outlets, sluices, and gateways has necessitated a 50 percent increase in the department's engineering staff and an increase of over 400 percent in its labor force. The available stocks of building material, originally intended for the expansion of irrigation, in accordance with Iraq's plan for economic development, have been used almost entirely for military purposes.

Canal construction: To promote production of foodstuffs, the Government has had to hasten the completion of canals which were under construction and to open new ones with the object of increasing the arable areas by about 30 percent.

Clearance of silt: Before the war, individual farmers were responsible for the clearance of silt from canals passing through their lands, but now all irrigation canals are being dredged by the government at its own expense. This has been done for the double purpose of keeping farm labor at its productive occupations and to insure an even flow of water so as to irrigate all available land. The department of irrigation has had to meet these very costly undertakings from Government funds.

AGRICULTURE

Though essentially an agricultural country, Iraq has had to increase its yearly exports of foodstuffs so as to relieve the food supply crisis faced by the United Nations in the Middle East. The following steps have been taken:

(a) Control of foodstuffs at their source of production and Government requisitioning of all agricultural products at fixed prices.

(b) Distribution of free seeds to farmers.

(c) Expansion of the organization by the department of agriculture of an antipest campaign.

(d) Government provision of credit facilities and financial loans to farmers.

As a result of the above measures taken by the departments of irrigation and agriculture toward the war effort, Iraq has succeeded in increasing its exportable quantities of foodstuffs by 50 percent. This increase was made available to the Allies—

1. Through the Middle East supply center for distribution to both the military and civilian populations of the countries surrounding Iraq, and to the war refugees stationed in Iraq (about 200,000).

2. Through local contractors to the large armed forces and technicians stationed in Iraq itself.

MILITARY EFFORT

For reasons of security, Iraq's military efforts cannot be divulged except for the fact that all ordnance factories belonging to the Iraq Army and its contractors as well as its military installations have been gratuitously placed at the disposal of its allies.

The following are a few of the additional noteworthy sacrifices made by Iraq to further the war effort.

Clothes have been rationed as well as essential imported foodstuffs, such as sugar.

Houses have been requisitioned and occupied, the tenants have been evicted so as to provide housing for the military.

Allied military forces have been allowed to use government-owned land for camping and other purposes free of rent.

A control of foreign exchange was imposed so as to make Iraq a member of the sterling area.

The Government of Iraq has levied no customs duty or impost on the huge quantities of war materials imported into the country or transported over its highways and railways to neighboring countries. Nor has the government collected income tax from either civilian or military members of Allied Nations who are stationed in Iraq and engaged in the war effort.

Surplus production of wool, cotton, and dates (150,000 tons yearly), oil seeds, etc., are entirely used for the war effort and have been exported for that purpose under control at low fixed prices.

CONCLUSION

It is evident from the foregoing that the people and government of Iraq recognized the importance of the geographic and strategic position of that country and in their effort to help their allies in the common cause, the country's national economy has been severely disrupted.

Every material and installation connected directly or indirectly with transportation and communication services has been strained to the utmost in order to handle the hundreds of thousands of tons of military equipment, and in rendering the various services required for the efficiency of the Allied armed forces stationed in Iraq and the surrounding countries.

A very large portion of the Nation's various installations such as: Port machinery, rails, engines, workshop machineries, telephonic and telegraphic equipment, electric and water purification plants, etc., will need replacement at the end of the war. The various stocks of materials which had been intended for national requirements and diverted to the war effort will have to be replaced.

Not only will the cost of these replacements after the war be more than their original value but as no customs or other revenues have been collected on anything connected with the war effort from which a reserve fund could have been built up, the Nation will have to face a tremendous tax burden in the post-war period. And during that period both the economic and social requirements of the country will be handicapped.

Customs revenue formed 54 percent of the budget before the war and now it has dropped to 44 percent, the deficit has to be made up by increased taxation.

It is estimated that about 35 to 40 percent of the labor available in Iraq has been used for unproductive military purposes and this will have its repercussion on the national income in the years to come. The high wages paid to labor for war work has drawn manpower from the shepherd tribes and cattle breeders and has retarded the land settlement movement. Thus, the supply of farm labor has become short.

Except for dates, Iraq did not export vegetables or fruits. These were cultivated in quantities just sufficient to supply the country's requirements. The large Allied forces and refugees stationed in the country were allowed to buy vegetables and fruits without restriction. This condition decreased the supplies available to Iraquis and has caused a very sharp rise in the cost of living.

When one considers that the population of Iraq is only about 5,250,000 people and that the national income is comparatively low, it is obvious that Iraq's citizens are rapidly incurring a per capita tax burden which may bring them dangerously near the border line of economic disaster. And this is being done knowingly and in a sincere cooperative spirit by the Iraqi Nation.

Indeed a creditable effort on the part of a 20-year-old nation!

Prelude to Peace—Address by Senator Jackson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL D. JACKSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Prelude to Peace," delivered by me at the seventy-fourth anniversary banquet celebration of Perry Lodge, F. and A. M., Marysville, Pa., on Thursday, March 16, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

William Lyon Phelps is accredited with a report that there appears on a tombstone, dated 1440, in Essex, England, the following verse, predicting the motion picture, the submarine, the airplane, and the war:

"When pictures look alive with movement free,
When ships like fishes swim beneath the sea,
When men outstripping birds, shall scan the sky,
Then half the world deep drenched in blood shall lie."

As to the power of prophecy or the wisdom of the author of this quatrain, I have no concern. But why could not he have said:

"When pictures look alive with movement free,
When ships like fishes swim beneath the sea,
When men outstripping birds shall scan the sky,
Then all the world in blessed peace shall lie."

Is it of the very essence of this world that 504 years of man's mastery of invention must be accompanied inevitably by war? In spite of our enlightened hope for a just and durable Christian peace, must we submit 504 years from now to more war? I do not believe it.

As to how man may acquire this durable and permanent peace, that is, the structure of his permanent peace plans, is a political problem which I do not desire to discuss here. Whether or not he must have peace is the moral question with which I am concerned this evening. Man needs peace more than he needs a narrow nationalism, just as he needs religion more than prosperity.

Before erecting the structure of peace programs, the world must have the conviction that mankind is worth the price we shall have to pay for peace. First, then, whether man is worth saving is a problem, the answer to which constitutes this prelude to peace.

Our race will live upon its faith in this worth of man, or assuredly it will perish.

Man must have, cherish, and defend this faith or forfeit his hope and right to persist.

Holy Writ brings us the assurance that God created man in his own image—as the Psalmist said, "a little lower than the angels, and crowned him with glory and honor." Shakespeare marveled, "What a piece of work is man," he exclaimed.

Matthew Arnold says the race of man has long fed on boundless hopes and has angrily spurned all simpler fare.

To be rational and consistent, we either must believe dynamically in the value of man or prepare our minds to assume a slow and painless process of race extinction. If we are indeed no more than a burned-out match in the midst of a black and dismal void, why should we not let it go at that, cool into dead ashes, and let the endless night rains wash these into the crevies of oblivion. No, He who created man never intended for him such an ignoble and futile end, such a nameless destination.

Suppose in some cosmic court, having jurisdiction throughout the whole of the created realm, some interplanetary indictment were brought, calling into question the actual deserts of man upon the earth, based on the record of his history. Suppose that you and I were called upon as citizens of this planet to defend not only "all that tread the globe," but also all "the tribes that slumber in its bosom." What writer of unanswerable briefs would we scurry to retain to aid us as solicitor; what silver tongue, what Paul, Demosthenes, or Bryan to serve as advocate.

Most assuredly our client will be accused of brutality, stupidity, greed, littleness, superstitution, arrogance, vulgarity, injustice, corruption, degredation, moral disintegration, and cowardice. The naked charge, apart from the specifications which will follow, is so overwhelming at first blush as to almost persuade us to assume the burden of the proof that man on the contrary is kind, intelligent, unselfish, magnanimous, tolerant, humble, pure, honest, significant, vital, and heroic.

Even as we stand there and hear the charges read, there will break through upon our senses—adding a flush of terror to bewilderment—the recollection of the wrongs that plagued the melancholy Dane.

When our ears have been filled to overflowing, when they have heard all they have capacity to listen to, impish memory from within will whisper these words of Hamlet:

"* * * the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely
The pangs of despised love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurns,
That patient merit of the unworthy takes
* * *."

In support of the presentment, as specifications, there will be paraded across the pages of the true bill each felon, zealot, traitor, bigot, and drunkard—the thankless child, the thoughtless parent, the slaver, the imbecile, the tyrant, and all the diseased of mind and body. The facts will be alleged, recounting the children's crusades the fall of Rome, the slaughter of the innocents, the smelling flesh of witches burning, Negro slavery, anti-Semitism, Huns and vandals, both ancient and modern, of every kind, screams from dungeon chains, and the atrocities of all those who have stalked through blood to mount a throne.

Experts will be waiting there to give opinion evidence against us. These will be the defamers of mankind, the cynics, the iconoclasts, and the arrogant. We shall hear, probably, the apostrophe to man:

"Detestable race, continue to expunge yourself, die out;
Breed faster, crowd, encroach, sing hymns, build bombing airplanes; * * *
Convert again into explosives the bewildered ammonia and the distracted cellulose;
Convert again into putrescent matter drawing flies,
The hopeful bodies of the young; * * *
Breed, crowd, encroach, expand, expunge yourself, die out,
Homo called sapiens."

Indeed we must admit that if we were to go this day upon such an errant of defense, we should have to be careful to wash our hands, clean our shoes, and put on fresh counsel robes, lest the very tribunes of the sky smell the sticky stench of human blood.

We should have to be in good voice and hold rapt attention, lest there be heard away up there the agonizing cries of children begging for crusts to stem the pangs of hunger.

Alas, why did that loved and loving Scotchman have to write:

"Man's inhumanity to man Makes countless thousands mourn."

They will quote it against us, citing volume, page, and line. But the significant part of that quotation is that man can mourn and man does mourn. We take heart. Out of the salty residue of tears there spring the triple alchemies—remorse, aspiration, and resolution—transmuting indifference into charity, hate into love, ineritia into action.

Let us anticipate the case, counsel upon the measure of our proof, and shape the rough outlines of argument.

The infamous house painter of Austria—more cruel than Genghis Khan, more ambitious than Napoleon—bartered all that was high and good of the German people to launch the minions and mechanics of offensive war. He conquered guiltless Belgium, Czechoslovakia, France, Greece, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Yugoslavia, and Denmark, denuded their fields, emptied their granaries, and stole their factories. A part of the peoples of these dozen nations he ordered massacred by his secret agents, the bleeding remnants he chained to his chariot. The myth of his invincibility was feasted and glutted upon the whole of Europe's colossal industrial capacity.

The Jap—master of long-range planning, precise execution, and aggression on a grandiose scale—pursued his national jujitsu to that day of infamy, that day of the great treachery, that changed Pearl Harbor from a place to a date. It overtaxes the finite mind to try to comprehend the ruthless destruction in the cruel onslaught of these two powers.

But here is patient China, trading space for time and numbers for future opportunity. Here is England, with quiet fortitude, holding on until blue birds over the white cliffs of Dover, the shepherd's flock, and Jimmie sleeping in his own little room again, form a sweet sentiment wherever men love liberty and would die for freedom. Here, just yesterday, emerging out of almost hopeless darkness, are the Russian masses, with a power of resistance, a will to defend, an organizational ability, a new generalship—and now the counter assault—which make all free men want to bend the knee in gratitude.

Towering above all this, behold the growing soul of America. Before December 1941, the blood surging in the streets of Stalingrad was seeping down Pennsylvania Avenue from Capitol Hill to the White House. An attentive ear could hear the whir of Zero planes above the gray clouds over Washington. A watchful eye could see the haughty, shiny boots of the Gestapo, clicking in the streets of your city. But the majestic will of our one hundred forty millions stands between us and the shadow of the swastika. Now we are on the march on every continent. We are on every ocean. We are in the air everywhere. We have written an Atlantic Charter. We have stated "four freedoms."

Does not our willingness to assume and endure the countless hells of war in order to extirpate the tyrant's ills, far outweigh these evils we are seeking to destroy? Does not our determination to preserve the freedoms for man expunge the curse of those who would take these freedoms from him? Who ever can find it in his heart to answer "No" is a philosophic Nazi. He should take a comfortable refuge in the company of mankind's moral debits—no asset to the brotherhood of man. He will find no asylum in the company of the valiant sons of men who give their lives to see to it that right shall not be forever on the scaffold and wrong forever on the throne.

But enough of man's invention, war; he also invented music. With the brush upon the canvas, the chisel on the stone, genius finds nobility in the innermost nature of things, and calls it forth, thereby awakening the soul of man. Awhile ago I sat before a symphony orchestra and heard again the beautiful Blue Danube Waltz. I saw the bright children of the morning's sun dancing on the bend of the river. I pushed off and floated on the current of the stream. I felt its broad meandering sweeps and its slower movements. Each changing moment brought me hours of shifting scenes—of valley, field, mountain, wave, and glassy stillness. All this was without an effort, free from ugly and mundane realities I know are there. I believe I was filled with more enrapturing delight in the craft of my imagination than if I had been aboard a real one on the muddy river itself. Why? Because one time, nearly a century ago, a young Austrian named Johann Strauss labored and struggled, with this as his only hope of reward—that he might speak beautifully to men, women, and children he would never know; that he might be able to talk to future generations out of their yesterdays with tone and harmony and melody.

I stood before the Lincoln Memorial. No one can feel just the same sense of quiet dignity unless he stands there in what William Howard Taft called the whole sacred place. I looked at the figure of the great President. Around me were his words. I could feel the power of his justice, truth, patience, mercy, simplicity, humility, self-abnegation. The sculptor had worked with shapeless stone, and had fashioned a figure of such artistic perfection that it made me feel an overwhelming sense of the presence of the Great Emancipator softly saying, "With malice toward none, with charity for all." Because of the great skill and labor of this artist, whose wage I have never paid, and never shall pay, there descended upon me the dual blessing of the sculptor and the man.

The yellowing scrolls of history disclose the tenacity with which the human race survives. Famine, pestilence, earthquake, and fire work their devastation in their several seasons, but over them all rolls the great river of humanity. All the cancerous growths of innate lust feed upon the heart of man to discourage him. He falters, stumbles, and falls, but he is up again in the morning. Throughout the ages he has sometimes sloshed along in the morass. His boots sometimes pound out a firm staccato upon the flinty path. He is sometimes up and sometimes down. But patience always guides his face aloft again, and hope forever swings his eyelids toward the sunny hilltop. The poet, Edna St. Vincent Millay, who calls upon detestable man to expunge himself, would have to admit upon cross-examination that she also wrote how man met the earthquake:

"* * * he heard the sick earth groan * * *
Rolling its pitchy lake of scalding stone
Upon his house * * *
Where did he weep? * * * with his head between his knees?
Where said the race of man, * * * 'let me freeze'?
By nightfall he has built another town * * *

And how he met the flood:

"The broken dike * * *
And nothing left but floating disarray
* * * was this the day Man dropped * * *
And died * * *
His burden heavier than a quilt of clay?
No, * * *
Above his garden faintly glimmering yet * * *
There bulked the plough * * *."

Surely some ancient graybeard will interject that we have stoned our prophets. Yes, the centuries have stoned their prophets, but the later generations of their offspring worship at their shrines. Our Presidents, whose only cause has been that of liberty and justice, we have maligned and persecuted with cunning, hate, and fury, but the future ages of our children will look upon their faces in Mount Rushmore and call them blessed.

Thomas Paine may speak up to declare that our governments are imperfect. Our country, it is true, has never met his standard of perfect government. We cannot say:

"My poor are happy, neither ignorance nor distress is to be found among them, my jails are empty of prisoners, my streets of beggars, the aged are not in want, the taxes are not oppressive. The rational world is my friend because I am a friend of its happiness."

But experiments in democracy have brought man nearer to that goal than he ever has been in all his history under any other form of government. More than that, as men in their religious concepts think less and less of the other great nations as their enemies, they come to regard them all as potential allies against a common foe, materialism, and greed.

They will remind us of the Negro. Has not the blood so freely volunteered upon the battlefields of the War between the States, given to redeem the black man from his shackles, gone a long way to heal the stripes of slavery? Did not the lives of thousands—themselves without guilt—lives gladly laid upon the altar, expiate the wrong of those who took the Negro captive? Has not the later poverty and humiliation of those who were called the Negroes' masters paid some bit of interest on the debt? Have we not tried to wash away the last drop of blood drawn with the lash? Do we not now know and plan and teach according to the principle that unless we help the wretched we ourselves become degenerate?

Some astronomer may want to change the subject from ethics and morals to matters of man's relative importance, size, and achievement. He will demonstrate that our sun and moon and all the several companies and constellations of stars and planets as the layman sees them, taken as a composite whole, form but a speck in a universe; that this whole universe is but a pin point in a larger universe bringing to bear distances of millions of light years in their apartness. He will show that in the cosmos, containing universes of universes, our earth is but an infinitesimal rotating shadowy part of an almost dimensionless point. Another scientist asseverates most gravely that we who are the tiny inhabitants of this atom earth, small as we are, are retrogressing, even degenerating.

Our answer to this shall be that the bigness of things lies not in their physical size, and that the bigness of the human intellect, of the soul of men, matches the physical bigness of the creation. Ralph Waldo Emerson, in his essay on history, says man is greater than all the geography of the world. The retrogression and the degeneration we deny.

Let us imagine a minute worm munching on a weed in the midst of the sargasso seas. Suppose that by the employment of only its own potentialities, and by the aid of only the implements it finds at hand upon the stem on which it lives its puny life, it reaches out beyond its watery home. Assume that it comprehends the bursting of the continuous dawns around the globe, the heights of Tibet, the Valley of the Nile, the Aztec ruins, the New York sky line, thundering Niagara, undulating fields of ripened western grain, the slow digesting of the barks and ships of all the ages in the bellies of the seven seas, and the red sun resting on the blue pillow of the Pacific. The achievement of that worm would be no more phenomenal than the wonder of man's conquest of the illimitable creation about him. Man has taken the lightning from the sky and put it under heel. He has made slaves of all the forces of the land, the sea, the ether, and the air. The coordination and skill represented in a home run, a completed forward pass, and the precision of invented things challenge comparison with nature's physical perfections. Slowly but surely medicine and surgery, too, outwit and overcome the natural enemies of health.

Spiritually, physically, intellectually, man has indeed, as Milton said:

"* * * regained the lost Paradise and frustrated the conquest fraudulent."

We shall not be without the aid of testimony on our behalf. Out of eons of time and out of space ubiquitous will come our witnesses. One by one we shall call them to the stand, all those whose foreheads have felt the touch of divine power. There will be Moses with his tablets of stone; St. Francis of Assissi; all the pious popes; Martin Luther blazing a way for the Knoxes and the Calvins; Mrs. Bixby, of Boston; Confucius writing the laws of man's intrinsic nature; Helen Keller; Joan of Arc out of the fire; Woodrow Wilson, who saw the light of heaven shining on his blade; Socrates, draining the world's cup of death, returning it full of his wisdom; Father Damien and his lepers; Booker T. Washington; the Mrs. Minivers; Beethoven; Voltaire, with the "forest of minds" around him; Justice Brandeis; that pair of dreamers, Keats and Shelley; Jean Francois Millet with his gleaners, and under his arm the wooden shoes out of the Angelus; Thomas Jefferson, writing copybook maxims about governments of the people, by the people, and for the people for Thomas Lincoln's awkward boy and all the future statesmen of the world; the Mormons; the blind whose souls can see; Mary, Martha, Magdalene, and all their daughters; Capt. Colin Kelly.

We shall have witnesses, and to spare. Against blasphemies, we shall set off, "Peace on earth, good will to men." Against the felon we shall set off the just judge. Against ignorance we shall set off universities and schools, and the millions of patient teachers of the young. Against intolerance and superstition we shall set off the devout pulpits bearing on their backs like Atlases, the Holy Bible. Against cheapness and vulgarity we shall set off the Red Cross, and the unnumbered organizations not for profit, building character in men. Against corruption we shall set off the myriads of honest men whom the spoils of office cannot buy. Against avarice we shall set on the philosopher, the philanthropist, and that mud-spattered saint, the country doctor. Against selfishness we shall set off that neighborhood angel who assuages bereavement with a cherry pie.

We shall match Pilate with Paul; the Benedict Arnolds with the George Washingtons of the world; persecution with Easter. The darkness of those children's crusades we shall dispel with the altar fires of Asia, and a million lighted Christmas trees.

But the best to speak for us will be a lowly Jew. He has ragged wounds—of nails in His hands and feet; of thorns upon His head: of a spear in His side. The most persuasive and authoritative voice, the sweetest tongue of all time, with paradox, beatitude and parable will tell what He sees in man. As Dr. William Lowe Bryan of Indiana University said:

"* * * underneath the man of lust and murder and treachery, He saw another man who cannot be given up. He knew the passion of the prodigal, the passion which led Him from His father's house into every iniquity; but He also knew that in the prodigal there was a deeper passion which, if awakened, would lead him from among the swine back to the life where he belonged. He knew the disloyal cowardice of Peter, but He knew that below the cowardice and disloyalty there was a Peter who would stand like a rock in a storm. He looked out upon a jeering multitude, symbol of the vaster multitude who forever jeer and crucify the good. He believed in them. He saw what was in them. He saw through the darkness and through the whirlwind of evil passion the real multitude, whose deepest law, whose deepest necessity, is that they shall be loyal to each other and to their Father in Heaven."

So will He testify.

The trial begins today. We are arraigned. The court is ready. Let us fasten to our shoulders the royal purple and let it trail. Let us grasp and hold aloft the scepter. Let pomp prevail. Let trumpets sound. Let the heraldry proceed. We march with certain tread into and beyond the singing stars, each proclaiming as we go, in the words of Emerson:

"I am the owner of the sphere,
Of the seven stars and the solar year,
Of Caesar's hand and Plato's brain,
Of Lord Christ's heart and Shakespeare's strain."

The sheer audacity of our resolution will justify our claim and show of worth; and listening, those we leave behind shall hear like rolling thunder, the acclaiming verdict of eternity.

Having conquered the prelude to peace, man will have laid his foundations for peace. Then will he be ready for the architects of his future.

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial in favor of the St. Lawrence seaway. The editorial appeared in the St. Albans Messenger for April 14, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOPE FOR THE SEAWAY

Here in the north country are a number of small groups of men of long vision who have been working, year in and year out, for adoption of the St. Lawrence seaway project. In addition to the cheap power this development would afford, there has been the added attraction of the Champlain cut-off, the proposed development which would link Lake Champlain with one of the great inland waterways of the Western Hemisphere.

In opposition to these persons have been certain powerful industrial and financial interests. They have seen cheap power as a threat to their own swollen power, they believe that such progress would bring with it a natural breakdown of their control.

But to these small groups which have been able to see the glories of the future as they are linked to this gigantic construction proposal goes our sincere appreciation. We have seen the light of their wisdom. We know that the railroads would be given untold quantities of freight for their carriers; and the cheap power that would abound would entice many a manufacturer to open shop in the Green Mountain State.

It is because of this view of the one sure pathway to a prosperous future in Vermont that we hail the support now being given to the St. Lawrence seaway development by no less a person than Secretary of State Cordell Hull. The bill now before Congress, sponsored by and named for Vermont's Senator AIKEN, would create the seaway and hydroelectric project. No provision is made for the Champlain cut-off, but this development would naturally arise out of the other in a very few years—if once the larger project could be built. Then the public would see what benefits are inherent in large developments of this sort.

The Aiken bill, calling for an expenditure of $421,000,000, would permit a masterful undertaking—one overshadowing in history the Erie Canal and marking for the future a waterways course that would eventually lead from Burlington and St. Albans to the shores of Chicago and its great center for agricultural implements manufacture, to Detroit and the heart of the automobile industry, and to the massive grain elevators of Duluth.

Receipts by Farmers Under 1942 Agricultural Conservation Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter and accompanying tables from the Department of Agriculture, showing the estimated gross payments, by States and commodities, under the 1942 agricultural conservation program.

There being no objection, the letter and tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 1, 1944.

Hon. BURNET R. MAYBANK,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR MAYBANK: In response to your request for the amount of money received by farmers under the 1942 agricultural conservation program in each State, we are enclosing a processed table entitled "Estimated Gross Payments, by States and Commodities—1942. Agricultural Conservation Program." Payments for each commodity and for conservation practices are shown separately as indicated, and the total for each State is shown in the last column.

If you desire additional information with respect to this or other phases of the program we shall be pleased to hear from you.

Very truly yours,

W. G. FINN,
Acting Chief.

Winged Victory and Moss Hart

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, it is, of course, a very obvious statement to say that there are many people in this country who are doing a good war job even though they are not in the thick of battle on the fighting fronts of the world.

I would add, of course, that people in political or public life are on the firing line all the time and that their lot is never an easy one.

However, it is my purpose today to advert briefly of the war contribution of one Moss Hart, noted playright, and author.

At the suggestion of officers of the Army Air Forces, Mr. Hart made a tour of many camps in the country where young American boys were being processed from raw recruits into perfect flying supermen.

He lived with the men in their barracks, got the real feel of the life of an Air Corps man and then went into comparative seclusion to write a play about the activities he has viewed with much enthusiasm.

He came up with Winged Victory which has been playing on Broadway in New York City for many months. Of course just writing the play was not all. There was the big task of finding the proper personnel in the Army to play the right stage roles and, of course, there were the off-stage functions to consider, too, such as box-office work, scenic design, and so on.

Needless to say Winged Victory has been a smash hit from the theatrical showman's viewpoint but it has also been a success from the angle of its broader purpose.

Hundreds of thousands of mothers and fathers, brothers and sisters, and friends of men in our Air Force have gotten a sweet simple peek into the behind-the-scenes comedy, tragedy, human goings on that are part and parcel of the period during which Johnny Jones, bank clerk, or student, or apprentice lawyer, or farmer, is transformed as if by magic into Flier John Jones, out to smash the Axis, to preserve American democracy for the benefit of his country, his family, and all his loved ones.

I can say without fear of contradiction that this project would not have seen such success, may never have seen the light of day if it had not been for the creative work of Moss Hart. At the height of his career, he gave up one of his most productive years to his country so that Winged Victory would become a reality for the home-front folks to see, enjoy and know.

I take this opportunity of saluting Moss Hart as an outstanding figure on the home front for World War No. 2.

Address by Governor Martin, of Pennsylvania, Before State Federation of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of the address delivered by Maj. Gen. Edward Martin, Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, at the annual conference of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., on April 17, 1944.

This address represents, in my opinion, one of the outstanding analyses of the role which American labor is playing in the present conflict, and of the true nature of that conflict as it affects the institutions, the constitutional guaranties, and the freedoms for which America is now fighting.

Governor Martin, who himself enjoyed a distinguished military career in the Spanish-American War and the previous World War, is well qualified to make such a statement. He has made an outstanding record as Pennsylvania's war Governor, a record comparable to that of the late Andrew G. Curtin, the Civil War Governor of the State of Pennsylvania.

I commend this address to all those who are sincerely interested in a clear-cut and comprehensive statement of the true nature of America's society, and the contributions which that society is making during this war to the preservation of freedom and the rights of mankind throughout the world.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and fellow Americans, 28 months ago America was at peace.

There was an abundance of food.

Goods were plentiful.

Our cities roared with night life and reckless spending and we were watching, as from a great distance, the war in Europe.

A national election had been held in which both parties pledged no interference in the war.

They said it was not our war.

We were planning new enterprises, considering new ideas in social security and moving toward finer educational standards.

The politically minded, ignoring a great and growing national debt, were making more and bigger governmental commitments.

How they were to be paid for nobody knew and few cared.

We all wanted to be let alone

Then on that fatal December Sunday morning came the infamous blow at Pearl Harbor.

We were stunned.

Those in authority minimized both the danger and the disaster.

The Nation tried to place the blame.

Men gathered, talked, reasoned, and worried.

Nothing resulted.

Then out of the past like a dream rose the real America.

The suffering at Valley Forge; the shame of the burning of Washington; the dead we left in Mexico; the hard marching, the terrible fighting, the hospitals of pain in the war between the States; the fever and hunger of the war with Spain; the long, dark nights, the days in the dugouts, and the years in the hospitals of World War No. 1—all these came back out of the national memory.

Then there appeared a fighting America; a dynamic America; a crusading America; the old America of the frontier.

All of our greatness in the crises of the past rose up before us.

Everything we had done became an inspiration.

A soft, easy going people, wishing only an undisturbed peace, suddenly became strong, terrible, determined, and aggressive.

Labor, agriculture, management, and government moved toward war.

Farmers produced more food.

Industry raised more capital.

Management sought ways and means.

Workmen gave their skill and their energy.

More plows turned more furrows.

More wheels of industry turned faster.

More men were training and hardening in camps and maneuver areas.

The sea and the air were filled with troops, and materials moving to fight in all parts of the world.

We were no longer on the defensive.

In the American way we were attacking.

In 2 years able management, abundance of capital, and skilled workers, backed by American will and enthusiasm, had done as much as Germany did in 9 years, Russia in 20, and Japan in 25.

We have made a great start, but there is much more to do.

We must have a united country.

We must work as hard as our men fight.

In the sixties, in the War between the States, there was sectional strife.

Now there is the menace of another kind of strife—of one group against another.

This is dangerous to our country.

This is no time for men to seek personal gain.

No man today should try to put personal ambition above the security of this Nation.

Real Americans must face this situation as real Americans faced the emergencies of the past.

Three hundred years ago strong men came to the western world in pursuit of happiness and security.

They landed in New England, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

They worked, endured, and prospered.

They moved westward.

They cleared the land, broke the prairies, built roads, bridged the rivers, erected homes, founded schools and churches, constituted government, and helped each other.

But at all times they kept their individual freedom.

They did not seek collective economic security for fear it would interfere with liberty.

To them the liberty to pursue happiness was the most precious thing in the world—for it meant freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly, and freedom of action.

Franklin said over 160 years ago:

"Those who would give up essential liberty to purchase a little temporary safety, deserve neither liberty nor safety."

During the Revolution they endangered their right of property and their very lives so that the right to pursue happiness might be guaranteed by a written constitution.

This has always been uppermost in the minds of real Americans.

It has made us the most progressive people of the world and, as a result, we have enjoyed the highest living standards in the history of the race.

This record made by this Nation is the world's greatest wonder.

We have had differences, but political class distinction has never entered our political, cultural, and religious life.

The War between the States was a sectional and economic quarrel.

It was followed by the flowering of the greatest economic period in the annals of any people.

Our system has grown until it is colossal.

It is interdependent.

We depend on one group for food; another for clothing; another for heat or light or water.

It is so complicated that the people entirely depend upon it.

Only government can see to it that these various agencies do their work.

A group in transportation cannot tie up heat, light, and water, for they are all int rdependent, and the lives of the people are menaced.

Other vital groups are in the same category.

Helpless people may die as a result of group action.

The rights of the people are always superior to the rights of an individual or a group.

This situation must be approached with courage, knowledge, and understanding, for the people are sovereign in the United States.

It is a job for each of us.

It will be unfortunate if the time ever comes in America when all of a certain group, class, or section belong to one political party.

We must not have a farm party or a labor party or a conservative party or a radical party or any political organization which can claim that all the people of one section or one group or one class are members.

If we want our free government to endure, each party should be a cross section of the whole country.

The difference in parties should be upon the question of governmental problems as a whole and not for one class or group.

It is the duty of all of us to see that every American is gainfully employed, but this cannot be done by force.

As we approach this problem, the ability of the individual must be considered.

The Almighty did not create every man to be a fine workman with tools, or a great executive, or a grower of crops.

Our social system should be so perfected that, as nearly as possible, each man may do the work he is best fitted to do and at a fair profit.

This will help in maintaining the high living standards this Nation has enjoyed for generations.

To work, to invest money, or be a candidate for office, no man must be forced to belong to a certain group, church, club, organization, or political party.

When that time comes, individual freedom is lost.

Any man may aspire to belong to an organization but he should not be forced to do so.

In America we believe in labor organizations, in their right to strike, and in their right to collective bargaining.

These rights, however, entail a public obligation.

If the leaders of labor in America fail to recognize this obligation, they may spel the destruction of organized labor in America, which will be detrimental to all of us.

We all want every American to earn a wage which will maintain the American standard of living.

The wage to do this depends upon economic conditions.

It should be high enough that savings can be made for the inevitable rainy day.

We want freedom from fear and freedom from want through our own efforts.

If we insure these freedoms in any other way, then our individual freedom that means everything to an American may be lost.

And now, as spring comes to the world, we know that bitter fighting confronts us and all our sons and that 1944 is the decisive year.

We know that we are making terrific sacrifices, that we are sending enormous quantities of material and millions of men overseas to preserve liberty. What is that liberty?

It is:

That we may meet as we like in our churches, our union halls, our lodge rooms, our clubrooms, and our great places of assembly.

That labor unions, veteran organizations, granges, Sunday schools, Boy Scouts, fraternal societies, and all other groups may parade and assemble in entire freedom.

That any of us may be candidates for office regardless of our position in life or what we may advocate, and that political groups shall be free from oppression.

That no government or organization may tell us what speeches we may hear, what music we may enjoy, or what pictures we may see.

These are the outward signs and visible symbols of what we are fighting and dying for, as we have in the past.

True liberty means that a man should not be kept from a job because he is denied membership in a union.

Union fees that are too high are bad.

Monopolies, either in capital or labor, are bad for America.

Both are un-American.

Monopolies made capital unpopular, and they can make labor unpopular.

We must always remember that in America the people are supreme.

Union officers represent the people just the same as public officials and the heads of corporations represent the people.

When big business threw smaller businessmen out of business, curbing legislation followed.

This can happen to labor.

Too many strikes are unpopular and against public policy.

It is up to labor to regulate such matters.

After Pearl Harbor labor pledged fewer strikes.

What is the record?

In November 1942 we had 144 strikes; and in November 1943 we had 300 strikes.

In November 1942 our strike-idle workers numbered about 52,000; and in November 1943 they numbered ten times as many.

In November 1942 we lost less than 130,000 man-days; but in November 1943 we lost the enormous total of nearly 3,000,000 man-days.

Doubtless there was merit on both sides of these arguments, but the enemy rejoices in them as a sign of weakness and disunity.

Too many accidents are crippling production.

The record shows:

War-front totals of casualties, from Pearl Harbor to January 1, 1944, according to the Office of War Information, were 32,078 killed, 45,595 wounded, 32,478 missing, and 29,707 prisoners.

Home-front accident totals from Pearl Harbor to January 1, 1944, according to the National Safety Council, were 190,000 killed and 18,500,000 injured.

Traffic accounted for 54,000 dead, and accidents in the home killed 63,500.

There is no comfort for ourselves and our allies in these accidental dead and wounded.

A casualty on the home front hinders victory.

An absentee in a plant is as hurtful as the man who fails to report on the fighting front.

Whether the absentee will admit it or not, he is prolonging the war.

This is the war of every one of our more than 130,000,000 Americans.

We can, as General Eisenhower says, win it in 1944 if every American on the home front does his duty.

We are winning, but the advance is so slow that effort must be renewed.

Production must not lag.

Food, transportation, rifles, planes, tanks, all the tools of war and all the drive and power of the spirit of the past are needed.

From the days of Lexington down to the South Pacific, north Africa, and Italy labor has made possible the feats and victories of American arms.

Everything labor has is at stake in this war.

In the lands of the Axis labor is enslaved.

In the lands conquered by the Axis labor is enchained.

Our form of government means more to labor than to any other group of Americans; and we know that we can depend upon aroused labor to do its full duty.

I am urging and pleading with you to do everything in your power that Pennsylvania industry, mines, and farms may set new records in 1944 in the production of critical war material, and by so doing you will let our fighting men on the fighting fronts know that you are behind them in every act and deed.

Rural Electrification

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by Hon. I. H. Hull, of Indianapolis, before the National Electric Cooperative Association, of Chicago:

Mr. President and friends, it is true I have been interested in the cooperative movement for several years, but it is also true that even before I became interested in cooperation I was interested in rural electrification.

Sixty miles southeast of here I was living on a farm where three of my four children were born in the farmhouse by the light of a dim kerosene lamp. About that time a power line did come past the house and we were the first ones to make use of it.

My wife had become so completely sold on the idea of rural electricity that when we talked about moving a little while later she said, "Well, I don't care so much about whether or not we are going to get a place where we can make more money, but we must have electricity." So it became a pretty fundamental part of our home life.

A little later I became affiliated with the cooperative movement and had the opportunity of visiting in Denmark and Sweden and saw the wonderful rural electrification systems which had been built up in those countries. I came back and our State of Indiana enacted our rural electrification act, several months before the R. E. A. law was passed.

Since that time I have always been very much interested in both cooperation and rural electrification, and so for the little while that we are going to visit this morning, I hope we can keep both of those things in mind and work out, as far as we can, the interrelationship between the two and the help that each should be to the other.

I think we ought to take just one moment to get before us a little of what we may be confronted with in a general way after the war.

I saw a figure the other day that caught my eye. We will have a national debt of one-quarter of a trillion dollars. They have even quit talking about billions any more. On that particular day I noticed the national debt had gone up to $187,000,000,000, and the estimate, of course, now is anywhere from $250,000,000,000 to $300,000,000,000. That in round figures, is two-thirds of the value of all the physical property of the Nation as estimated just a few years ago.

Well, we could get pretty badly alarmed, but I am not one of those that is going to get panicky about that thing just yet. I want to do a little thinking first to see just how we are going to face a situation of that kind.

If we enter on the post-war period with conditions such as we had in the early 1930's, and add this tremendous war debt to an unbalanced economy in the Nation, things can get unbelievably bad. I think one thing we want to keep in mind is that because of the tremendous burden we are placing upon the Government (rural electrification is one of the best investments that one can make) that we do have a real reason to try to relieve the Government as fast as possible and pay off the debts we owe in our rural electric lines the same as we pay off on other debts.

I am a firm believer in trying to work out these obligations as rapidly as convenient. But the best we could do on that isn't going to make a lot of relief on this one-quarter of a trillion dollars. Another thing we must keep in mind is this—after all, the real wealth in all America is not in our physical property. The wealth of America is in our manpower and the manpower of this country can create or destroy, according to the way we use it, in a very short period of time the entire value of this obligation. They say we will have some 30,000,000 men and women released from the war and the war effort in a short period of time. If those 30,000,000 persons come back and are not used to produce wealth, if we do not keep them properly engaged, we can go into a bad situation, but, on the other hand, if we take those 30,000,000 persons and let them produce wealth at the rate of $1,000 a year apiece, there will be thirty billions a year and we will pay off this war debt with the newly created wealth in a period of 10 years' time.

The future depends, in other words, on how we organize and train and mobilize the manpower of the Nation. That is where our real wealth is.

Now you are wondering really what that has to do with rural electrification or cooperation either. Well, let's examine the three proposals that are made generally as to how we are going to utilize that manpower in the post-war efforts.

The first one of those three and one we must consider is Government activity. The best Government activity that I know of is the rural electrification project. We do go ahead and make many more jobs by activity of Government enterprise and I am not quite as much against that as are some folks that I have heard of.

I heard a story the other day of a couple of fellows that belonged to a church. One of them was very hard of hearing and he didn't have one of these hearings aids yet and he couldn't understand the other fellow very well. The other fellow came up to him and said to him, "Have you seen our new preacher yet?" And he said "Eh." And he said, "Have you seen our new preacher yet?" And the fellow said, "Have I seen a New Dealer?" "No," he said, "I asked you have you seen our new preacher yet, he is a son of a bishop." "Yes, yes," the hard of hearing fellow said, "They all are." [Applause.]

I said I haven't become quite that much set yet against all New Deal programs. As a matter of fact, this rural electrification program properly carried on is one and I have always been a thousand percent for it. But listen, I have two boys in this war and most of you have them and if I know what those boys are fighting for today, it is to bring about an economy in the United States of America, as free as possible from Government domination and control, so let us relieve the Government as much as we can of the responsibility and burden of keeping these 30,000,000 men and women working.

The second thing that is generally proposed and it is a thing we will have to follow through, is a large expansion of profit business. Now, I have no quarrel whatsoever with profit business. We have had profit business and it is a good thing. We have it now and, of course, we will have to depend on profit institutions to furnish most of these jobs. Jobs will be made, as Eric Johnson said, by the demand of the people not by the institution. But profit business will have to create the machinery that gives the jobs for most of these people. Last spring my wife and I took a little vacation and went down to visit our daughter in Miami, Fla., and we went all over Miami Beach and up and down Biscayne Boulevard where those thousands, yes, I would say thousands, of those magnificent homes are, and I certainly enjoyed looking at them and was glad somebody built them so I could take a look at them. Among other things we walked down past the home of William Deering. Again I want it distinctly understood I have no quarrel with William Deering. He did a marvelous job. I think he did a service to the American farm that we ought to be truly grateful for, but as we walked down past that home, the first remark my wife made, "Oh," she said, "I would hate to have the responsibility of organizing all the servants they have in that home," and I came back and my first remark was something like this, "I wonder how many corn planters and cultivators and tractors it took to build that home." After all, the fellow that builds up those funds is the fellow that has the patronage out here whether it is electric power, farm machinery, or gasoline and we have rather imposed on a certain group of those people by forcing all of these tremendous funds on them, they have to take care of that home and the money we have given them. [Laughter.]

My wife's next remark was, "William Deering, I'll bet, doesn't have any more enjoyment out of that mansion where millions of dollars have been invested than we can have in our seven-room home in Indianapolis." The point that I am bringing out is not that I am criticizing William Deering. Someone had to do that job and let us be grateful that he went ahead and did it. The point of this is that when we enter this post-war economy we must depend upon a wide distribution of wealth and earnings among a large group of people to keep buying power alive, and you have to keep that buying power alive. That is the only way to make these jobs. We cannot solve the post-war problem by depending entirely upon profit business unless we can put some checks on it and unless we can find a way as far as possible of distributing earnings out among the people on the cooperative basis as you are doing in your cooperative rural electric program.

Well, that brings us down to the third proposal. Let us not do away with anything we have that is usable. Use all the Government agencies we can but keep them under proper check, and the same with profit business, but let us go ahead and develop our cooperative program.

While I was in Denmark I was riding along the country road with the manager of the Cooperative Wholesale. And some way we got to discussing the matter of farm tenancy. He pointed out that in Denmark they had overcome tenancy in that country to a large extent. Whereas half the farms had been operated by tenants, at the time we were there only 8 percent were operated by tenants, the rest by landowners. He also pointed out all over the countryside which we went into, little butcher shops where farmers brought their hogs in and processed them. They put them in brine instead of flooding the market at the wrong season of the year. They took those hogs out of the brine and sent them into the market as the market could use them. He pointed out and showed me some little cheese factories they had put up in those neighborhoods and this and that and other little community enterprises which had been built up.

I said do you think it has been the cooperative movement that has relieved your tenancy here and he said that is only one thing. The first thing though that he did mention was rural electrification. He said that the first thing they did in Denmark toward solving their tenancy was to get their electrification. At that time two-thirds of the farms were electrified. They had access to this power for these little community enterprises. Then he said the next thing perhaps was the cooperative movement. It helped make jobs for a lot of the boys and then he said they had a definite planned social program to try to improve living standards out in the rural communities and make it attractive so folks would want to stay in the rural communities. He said he used to look forward as other farmers did to the time when he got old and could move to the city. In the meantime he had taken that job in Copenhagen but he said country life was so beautified since conveniences had been brought in and the social environment so improved since he had moved into Copenhagen that he said "I am now looking forward to my old age when I can move back into the country and enjoy our Danish country life." I wonder if we get the full significance of what that means.

Three or 4 years ago I saw some figures that went like this. Ten parents in the county will bear 14 children, those 14 children, the second generation, will bear 20 children, the third generation, if they all stay there, those 20 children will raise 28. The parents in our large metropolitan cities bear 7 children, the 7 have 5, and the 5 in the third generation have 3. The city population dies. In three generations 10 parents in the country will increase to 28 while 10 parents in the city dwindle to 3. In other words, country communities are raising surplus children, feeding, clothing, and educating those extra children to replenish the population of the dying city. Not only that, one-third of each generation of children carries with them their inheritance from those country communities and takes it to the town. Don't you see what we are doing? That is not the fault of profit business. It is not the fault of anybody but ourselves and gradually we are sapping the natural wealth of our country community, taking each generation of children with their share of inheritance, one-third of the family, moving to the city, there to spend their lives. And that is not all; in our more prosperous territories, like Iowa, for instance, a good share of the fathers, when they have accumulated a sufficient amount of wealth which they have drawn out of that country community, move out and go to town and take their fortune and with it build a home and spend a good deal of what they have built up.

Now, what are we going to do about that? And this is my principal message I want to bring to you this morning, as we look forward to these hard days that may come while we are trying to pay off the war debt, as we face the facts as to what we have always done in the way of building up the great centralized industries with remarkable efficiency. Profit industry must draw all of the earnings it can get out of every community. I would like to bring up one more illustration. Some time ago one of our country bankers told us that at the end of the year the cooperative association in his county had accumulated in his bank over $24,000 which they distributed back among the people. He told of another petroleum distributor, a local agent for a chain system, when he made his deposit he would sign a draft and send every bit of the money to a certain New York bank. All profits left the community.

Since that time—that has been several years ago—we have integrated that business down there until today these farmers maintain their own local distribution and keep all the savings at home. They now own the transportation system and bring the earnings of that transportation system back to the community. They own their refinery and bring the savings of that refinery back and pass them around among themselves in that community. They own the oil wells where the oil comes from and the savings of the oil wells are brought back and passed around among the folks in that community. On the one hand, the one system was just taking every dollar out of the community and depositing it in a metropolitan bank and on the other hand the reverse operation. All savings from industrial transportation and distribution come back and are passed around among the folks in that community.

I am tremendously interested in the future of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association. I hope as we go ahead and develop it we will all of us keep in mind the tremendous desire and opportunity to serve the people and bring about a better distribution of the good things of life. It must be done in this post-war era and I am thinking, in order to do that, if you do have some things in your set-up that are not entirely right it is nothing to get scared about. I never knew anything that grew up as fast as this did that didn't have some things wrong with it. The only thing is, let us look at this thing now from the standpoint of the benefit there will be by being controlled out here among the people. Use it and make it genuinely cooperative. If there is any complication because of politics or anything else, keep those in the background just as much as we can but build this thing and serve the folks and bring about that distribution of earnings which must be done as we are to face this post-war era.

I think of this whole cooperative program today pretty much as our fathers looked upon the affairs of government back in 1776. I am thinking of it from the standpoint of getting fair play in business just as they were looking forward to getting fair play in Government.

You will recall that the Colonies had all the trouble in the world trying to get someone else to solve their problems for them. They sent emissaries to the King of England, and the King could not understand their problems; he wasn't living there and didn't know what they were up against, and he didn't know how they suffered to pay taxes, and so finally after they tried everything else in the world, and tried to get somebody else to solve their problems for them, they came back home and decided if they were to have fair play in government they would get it by governing themselves and not depending on someone else to do that job for them.

I say to you today the time is past for us to expect some metropolitan center to solve our farm problems for us. I say to you today we must be willing to do what is necessary, and, if necessary, do a little house cleaning to get our house in order, then all get together, all of our cooperative movements in America. Let the various units help each other and build up such a strong movement in the interests of the farmers and other common people that we can build a program on which we will bring about our economic freedom and fair play, and when we bring that about we will solve our problem and we will build these community enterprises. Maybe we are going to process some of our meat and keep it in cold lockers or brine and feed it onto the market, as they did in Denmark. There are a hundred things we can do as we look around this program. I wish we could get the picture, building up those little rural communities as fast as we can, and bring those centralized industries back out into the neighborhood and keep our surplus boys and girls out there—they are the most valuable thing we have on the farm today—and put them to work, not for somebody else whose main interest is exploiting the farmer but putting them to work for the dads and uncles they have grown up with. When we get that kind of an economy there isn't any reason why we should look forward with fear to our post-war era.

I Am Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, Gov. M. Q. Sharpe, of South Dakota, is a State administrator who has a full appreciation of the significant contribution which education makes to the development of an alert citizenry and to the functions of freedom in this Republic.

The other day in an address delivered by Governor Sharpe in connection with the dedication of the new administration building at the University of South Dakota he made a dramatic presentation of the virtues of education which is impressive enough and sufficiently significant to warrant its finding a place in the permanent literature of this country. I take this means of calling it to the attention not only of the Congress but of all citizens interested in the expansion of educational opportunities in America:

I AM EDUCATION

(Excerpts from the dedicatory address of Gov. M. Q. Sharpe, of South Dakota, in connection with the dedication of the new administration building at the University of South Dakota, located in Vermillion, S. Dak.)

This is an appropriate time and place to pay homage to the sublime influences and benefits which education has spread over the world in all ages and places. The most vivid way I can do this is to personalize education as a living, pulsing being which we may see and hear. Thus personalized, education would appear before us as a great, majestic figure in our own image, with the high brow of knowledge, the level, steady gaze of inquiry and truth, a face of power and purpose, and with an ever-directing finger pointing toward an attractive, interesting future; and would say something like this:

I am education. I grew with life as its "leader-out" to higher planes and broader fields of thought and action. All life just naturally follows me because I am its guide, its plan, its experience, its ambition, its progress, its ever-present benefactor. Those who follow me reverence me more and more as they see my pliant horizons ever widening into more interesting, serviceable, healthy, and civilizing epochs; as they see my wholesome, accurate, practical ideas guarding them from harm and increasing their happiness. Those who belittle me are never confident. They are always using the ideas and products of my scholars, students, and disciples. They fear my records of laws, principles, and truth.

In the nests of the apemen and the caves of the cavemen I was incessantly telling them: this is the right way; that is the wrong way to make it or do it; there is still a better way; you can have a better home, a better life. In the squatting places of the aborigine I first became identified as a factor of better life because I caused him to classify and to record in his memory and to transmit to posterity by oral tradition, all those methodical customs, habits, principles of humanity which today are instinctive in each of you and are the foundation stones on which your present education and civilization rest. I am one of the beacon lights which led you up from savagery. I still lead you on, and on, and on.

My mission is to make things better; to identify and promote the good and the true; to label and obstruct the bad and the false. The written record, the schoolroom, the laboratory, the test tube, the microscope, the telescope, the electronic rays, and tubes: these are some of my instruments. Ever and ever bringing forth new laws and truths, my scholars, students, and disciples produced for you the engine, the bridge, the vehicles of the air, earth, and sea, the wires and tubes of communication and transportation; and all the numerous engineering, mechanical, and scientific benefits, comforts, conveniences, and pleasures which you have around you in such profusion today. Some of them took up the test tube, the electric ray, the surgeon's instruments, and the pleasure of study and experiment with chemistry and life, and there came into general use and practice much knowledge of health, so that pain and disease are being alleviated and the maimed and disfigured are made whole and efficient; and the human body is made better and stronger and more capable of the eternal struggle for individual and racial improvement. The philosopher, the jurist, the statesman, are slowly but surely etstablishing the truths and principles necessary for myriad races, kindreds, tongues, and people to live together under the benign principles of law, order, equity, and fraternity.

The teacher, professor, instructor, tutor, and trainer are my ambassadors, counsel, and apostles to you; but all of them and all of you are ever my own scholars, students, pupils, and disciples. The more you acquire of me the more do you become persons of considered judgment, practicing moderation, frugality, industry, truth. You learn the futility and the fallacy of excesses, anger, improvidence, dishonesty. My eternal promise to you is: You make the most of me and I will make the best of you.

Why I Would Like To Be a WAC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, some months ago the Illinois civilian WAC recruiting committee in cooperation with the United States Army sponsored a drive for the recruitment of young women for military service. To stimulate interest, the American Legion Auxiliary joined with the recruiting committee in sponsoring an essay contest which provided a prize of a $25 War bond to the young woman of high-school or junior-college age who submitted the best essay on the subject Why I Would Like To Be a WAC. The contest was organized on a basis of congressional districts and a like prize made available for each district.

In the Sixteenth Congressional District of Illinois, which embraces Peoria, Tazewell, Bureau, Marshall, Stark, and Putnam Counties, the winner of the contest was adjudged to be Miss Gretchen Phillips, Varna Township High School of Varna, Ill. She is a charming, studious, patriotic young lady who has so generously participated in the war activities of her community and has devoted her talents to the victory effort. I find therefore a genuine pride in suggesting the publication of her essay in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and therefore make a unanimous-consent request that it be included with these observations:

WHY I WOULD LIKE TO BE A WAC

(By Gretchen Phillips, Varna Township High School, Varna, Ill.)

My interests, just like so many other girls of my age, have usually been centered around educational and social functions. During war, I must make these functions coincide with the war effort, putting my heart and soul into winning this—the people's war.

I know that buying bonds or doing some defense work is going to help, but does that in any way compare with what our boys are giving?

I, as a woman of my country, can do much more. One way is by joining a branch of the service, and certainly one of the finest branches is the WAC's. There is no conscription to force me to join a woman's corps, but I am simply asked to do my part. Certainly that is not too much to ask. For in so doing, I will free some man for active service.

As a member of the WAC's, I would be using my talents for the good of my country; moreover, the educational facilities offered me would be beneficial in my later civilian life. We know that all work and no play makes Jane a dull girl. Taking this into consideration, a number of social and recreational activities are also provided.

A WAC must necessarily go where duty calls. This demands that I would have to leave my home, friends and dear ones, but in so doing, I will speed the day when all the members of our armed service can again return to their beloved homes.

Comments on Veterans' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper articles with reference to the subject of veterans' benefits:

[From the Marlboro (Mass.) Enterprise]

PHILBIN INFORMED ON ROTARY POLICY FOR TROOPS ABROAD—FIRST CONTINGENT OF MEN FROM SOUTHWEST PACIFIC AREA EXPECTED TO BE HOME SOMETIME NEXT MONTH

WASHINGTON, D. C.—In response to his inquiry concerning the troop rotation policy soon to be placed into effect in the Southwest Pacific theater of operations Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, Democrat, of the Third District, which includes Marlboro, has been assured by Maj. Gen. James A. Ulio, The Adjutant General of the War Department, that the shortage of shipping space to place this policy into effect was being alleviated and it is expected that the first contingent of troops from that area will begin to arrive in the continental United States during April 1944.

The Massachusetts Representative held several discussions with officials of the War Department relative to troop rotation plans for boys in the Southwest Pacific, shortly after the Army announced plans for furloughing troops from other battle areas, including the African and Alaskan theaters of operations. The discussions were partially prompted by correspondence Congressman PHILBIN received from anxious parents in this section since many families from this area have boys who were among the first to leave the continental United States for action in the Southwest Pacific.

PHILBIN released the following letter from General Ulio, confirming previous talks he had had with War Department officials:

"I refer to your recent letter concerning the return of enlisted personnel, now on foreign service, to a station within the continental limits of the United States.

"The War Deparment does not question the desirability of rotating troops who have been on foreign service for a considerable length of time, and has had the matter under continuous study since the inception of the war. Until recently lack of shipping space has been the main obstacle in the return of personnel from overseas duty. This shortage of shipping has now been partially alleviated and there is a policy for the South Pacific theater now being prepared, and it is hoped that shipping facilities will sufficiently improve by April 1944 to enable the return of a certain number of men from this theater.

"Emphasis is placed on the rotation of units and individuals from combat duty to rest areas and to areas of healthier climates in all overseas theaters in order to alleviate the stress of combat and the effects of severe climatic conditions and it must be appreciated that the actual number of men returned to the United States must depend upon the amount of shipping which can be made available, since the maintenance of full combat effectiveness of our troops overseas must always receive first consideration."

War Department officials told PHILBIN that the selection of enlisted personnel to be returned to the United States under this policy rested entirely with the commanding general of the particular theater of operations in which the man was stationed. The selection would be determined upon the basis of length of service and the type of duty of the enlisted man.

PHILBIN also revealed that the War Department has two methods of repatriation of enlisted personnel serving overseas—"rotation" and "return." The rotation policy applies to men released by the theater commanders after replacements of the same military skills are furnished to him. The return policy covers personnel sent home for hospitalization, discharge, and, in the case of officers, because it is desired to use their skills in special assignments. In the latter case, no specific replacement is sent from the United States.

Personnel chosen under the rotation policy are to be given leave or furlough on arrival in the United States, sufficient for them to spend 3 weeks at the place of choice. They are then to be reassigned to duty in the United States before return to a foreign area unless military requirements make reembarkment necessary.

More than 200,000 troops, exclusive of sick and wounded, have been returned to the United States, War Department officials told PHILBIN, since the beginning of the war. Some of these were "rotated" personnel, others "returned" personnel. To date, the minimum period for rotation has been set as 18 months for service in the north African area and 2 years in the Alaskan and Caribbean commands. Regulations for eligibility in other theaters, including the Southwest Pacific, are now being formulated and it is expected that 18 months of service will be one of the requirements.

PHILBIN stressed the fact that availability of shipping for the transportation of rotational replacements is one of the main factors in controlling the number of eligible men who can be sent to the United States under the rotation policy. Military exigencies and the personnel situation in the theater of operations are other factors.

PLEDGES UNYIELDING SUPPORT FOR BENEFITS FOR SERVICEMEN—CASH PAYMENTS FOR VETERANS—CONGRESSMAN PHILIP J. PHILBIN ADDRESSED HUDSON AERIE, F. O. E., LAST NIGHT

HUDSON.—Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of the Third District, and a member of the Military Affairs Committee, again pledged his unyielding attention and efforts to the welfare of the men and women in the service of their country when he spoke before the meeting of Hudson Aerie, F. O. E., last night, declaring, "Nothing is too good for them."

Congressman PHILBIN is one of the staunchest supporters of the bill now before Congress, providing for adequate muster-out pay for those in the armed forces, and he is confident that the bill, which calls for substantial cash payments, will become a law. His particular interest is in the disabled veteran, and he advocates cottage care rather than institutional for the mentally ill.

In his brief but stirring address he urged the members of Hudson Aerie to continue their good work for liberty, justice, and equality, and called upon all citizens to work shoulder to shoulder for speedy victory and an early return home of those in service. Ever mindful of the sacrifices and sorrows of homes throughout the land, he has every confidence in the ultimate attainment of that for which we fight, if the American people will be ever vigilant, not only toward destroying the tyrants on foreign soil but will also be mindful of the enemies of freedom on the home front—those who would destroy our freedom and our form of government.

Congressman PHILBIN, who is spending the holidays at his home in Clinton, and who returns shortly to Washington for the reconvening of Congress, cited the outstanding work of Hudson Aerie, one of the largest and most active organizations in the State. Always among the foremost in support of community, county, State, and Nation, the Aerie, with a membership of more than 500, is credited with the purchase to date of $24,000 in War bonds, a record difficult to be equaled. Sixty-seven members are now in the service of their country and their names are suitably inscribed upon an honor roll which hangs in the lounge in the Aerie suite. Stanley J. Kurgan introduced Congressman PHILBIN.

SOLDIER'S DISCHARGE PAPERS MUST OMIT AILMENT DETAILS

WASHINGTON, December 3.—Disabled veterans of this war who have protested to New England Congressmen that their discharge certificates revealed the diagnosis of their ailment were advised today that such disclosures violated Army regulations and should be eliminated.

Maj. Gen. J. A. Ulio, adjutant general, told Representative PHILBIN (Democrat, Massachusetts) to advise veterans who complained to the Congressman to return their certificates to the War Department for "any correction that may be warranted."

The veterans, PHILBIN said, considered such information harmful to their future, and General Ulio cited this regulation:

"The diagnosis of a disability will not be shown on the discharge certificate as the cause of discharge."

The adjutant general in a letter, also explained procedure for filing claims for pensions by enlisted men discharged from the Army by reason of physical disability.

"Army regulations provide that when an enlisted man is to be discharged on certificate of disability for discharge, and regardless of line of duty, he will be afforded an opportunity to file a claim for pension on Veterans' Administration Form No. 56," said General Ulio.

"If the soldier does not desire to file such a claim, the regulations prescribe that he sign a statement to that effect.

"The signing of such a statement does not prevent him from filing a claim at any time in the future."

PHILBIN also announced today that in response to requests from residents of Milbury and Milford, he had obtained from the Solid Fuels Administration inventory adjustments which would entitle them to more anthracite coal.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram of March 28, 1944]

PHILBIN URGES SPEEDY ACTION ON G. I. BILL

WASHINGTON, March 27.—Speedy congressional action on the G. I. bill of rights to assist war veterans was urged today by Representative PHILBIN (Democrat, Massachusetts) in a House speech.

PHILBIN said he hoped to introduce an amendment to the Senate-passed measure which would provide for establishment of rest homes and smaller isolated units for the solicitous care of mental and nervous cases. He declared such cases will embrace well over half of all our casualties.

PHILBIN said, however, that if it appeared his amendment would delay passage of the bill he would seek other means of effectuating his objectives.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Evening Gazette of June 5, 1943]

WOULD GIVE SERVICEMEN MORE INSURANCE PROTECTION

WASHINGTON, June 5.—Provision for additional insurance protection for members of the armed forces is contained in a bill which Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN (Democrat) of Clinton, Mass., introduced in the House this week.

The bill, similar to one introduced in the Senate by Senator WALSH of Massachusetts, guarantees to every enlisted person full insurance coverage as soon as he enters military service.

"It also gives the enlisted person broader discretion and power of disposition with respect to designating and changing beneficiaries so as to permit enlisted persons to have full control of their insurance" PHILBIN said.

[From the Boston American of December 8, 1943]

WASHINGTON, December 8.—Speedy passage in the House by Monday of "just and generous" legislation providing cash benefits for honorably discharged veterans was predicted today by one of its chief supporters, Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, of Massachusetts, Republican minority leader.

Equally rapid approval in the Senate also was anticipated by the Bay State Congressman. MARTIN made his prediction as members of the House Committee on Military Affairs met in executive session to draft a bill which will be acceptable to all persons interested in the welfare of former servicemen.

PHILBIN GIVEN CREDIT

Great credit for the swift action by the committee went to Representative PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of Massachusetts, who had scoffed at statements that a quorum could not be mustered.

Both MARTIN and PHILBIN seemed certain that the bill would be reported out of committee without delay, perhaps even today. They stressed that members are familiar with what veterans need and that the only argument appears to be over the size of the cash payment.

CITES PRESSING NEED

Congressman PHILBIN, himself a member of the Military Affairs Committee, summed up the feelings of the great majority of Members of the House when he said:

"We can no longer tolerate a situation where our discharged veterans are being cast aside, unprovided for, and permitted to go in want and suffering. We must give practical effect by immediate legislation to our oft-repeated slogan: 'Nothing is too good for them.'

"That there is pressing need for Congress to take this action is becoming increasingly apparent. Day after day reports are brought to my attention of boys being mustered out of the service, oftentimes in poor health, sometimes with unfortunate mental afflictions, and sent to their homes without even so much as an escort.

"This condition must be remedied at once. The American people will no longer tolerate carelessness or neglect of our gallant war heroes. We've had a great deal of talk about heroism and sacrifice. Now is the time for Congress to show that it appreciates the outstanding deeds of these young men and that it is prepared to provide every possible measure of compensation, support, hospitalization, care, and treatment that a grateful people can give.

"I think that the Boston Record-American and Sunday Advertiser, and other Hearst papers throughout the United States are to be highly commended for their efforts in endeavoring to adjust these intolerable conditions."

[Editorial from the Boston Post of June 26, 1943]

SIMPLE JUSTICE

The bill to be introduced in Congress within the next few days by Representative PHILBIN, of Massachusetts, safeguarding the status on civil-service lists of men and women now in the armed services, deserves careful consideration.

It proposes authorizing the Civil Service Commission to revise its regulation so that at the close of the war prompt consideration will be given to those on the lists whose names have been reached while they are serving their country.

This would seem but the simplest of justice. Were these young men and women who have passed their examinations and secured eligibility on civil-service lists still at home, they would automatically secure the positions to which their preparation entitles them. They should not be penalized for serving their country in time of war.

The Soldier Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD J. McMURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. McMURRAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from Pvt. A. C. Stikl which appeared in the Milwaukee Journal on April 14, 1944:

SCOLDS REPUBLICAN CONGRESSMEN

To the Journal: I wonder how our Representatives in Washington think we in the service overseas feel when we read about their conniving to deprive us of our vote. Don't they represent us? Are we in servitude? Are we fighting for the right to preserve representation? Don't they think we might resent their bickering?

I wonder if Representatives SMITH, STEVENSON, KEEFE, MURRAY, and O'KONSKI, of Wisconsin have sons in the service. If this item receives space, will the above-mentioned Representatives be kind enough to reply to the writer justifying their defeating votes? I am sorry to say that 5 of the 224 defeating votes were from Wisconsin.

I sent my address to the Milwaukee election commission to assure me of receiving a ballot unless the afore-mentioned five Representatives can think up a scheme to persuade our State government to deprive us of our vote.

Congress offered us an empty hand through the Rankin bill. What a mockery! It is an insult to the intelligence of every fighting man. Very few servicemen overseas have heard of the conniving on Capitol Hill to deprive us of voting. If my citizenship is shelved for the duration, please let me retain the right to vote.

I hope the people of Wisconsin remember the five afore-mentioned names on the roster of the House of Representatives. They should be removed as soon as possible, at the next election affecting them.

I almost forgot an important name—Senator ALEXANDER WILEY. He also contributed to the cause of the afore-mentioned "statesmen" by being absent or not voting in the Senate. Was he ashamed to vote for us? He should be certain of replacement at the next election.

The armed forces have the situation well in hand at the front. Let Congress keep order and democracy at home for us!

Pvt. A. C. STIKL.

SOMEWHERE IN NEW GUINEA.

Britain's Broken Word

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Post of April 3, 1944:

BRITAIN'S BROKEN WORD

We are sure that the British Government knows even better than we just what has happened to the Jews of Europe under Hitlerism and how desperate is their need of a haven. Still it has chosen to shut its eyes to this. But even if it can keep out the sights and sounds of 4,000,000 people being murdered or starved to death, it cannot evade its legal obligation which is a heavy one indeed.

The British Government holds Palestine as a mandate from the League of Nations. It holds it under 28 articles which specify exactly what the British can and cannot do.

What are some of the terms?

1. The preamble and article 2 say that England shall be responsible for putting into effect the Balfour Declaration which called for making Palestine into a Jewish homeland.

2. Article 6 calls upon Britain to facilitate Jewish immigration into Palestine. It also calls upon Britain to encourage "close settlement by Jews on the land."

3. Article 15 says that no person shall be excluded from Palestine on the sole ground of his religious belief.

4. Article 27 emphasizes that "the consent of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of this mandate."

What has Britain done with these terms to which it agreed? It has violated each and every one. It has set aside the Balfour Declaration, it has barred Jews from settling on the land, it has shut off Jewish immigration.

DEFIANCE OF THE LEAGUE

It has done all these things without the consent of, in fact in defiance of an unequivocal protest made in June 1939 by, the League Mandates Commission. In violation of the mandate, in violation of the Anglo-American Treaty of 1925, which incorporates the mandate, in violation of the Balfour Declaration, Britain has gone ahead with the white paper.

Today, the land that was to become the Jewish homeland is instead the land that discriminates against the Jews. Instead of article 15 of the mandate, "No person shall be excluded from Palestine on the sole ground of his religious belief," the white paper sets up a blunt system of discrimination, "No further Jewish immigration will be permitted." Could anything be clearer?

This means that Zoroastrians, Christians, Buddhists, or fire worshipers may go into Palestine, but not Jews.

An American Protestant may immigrate into Palestine, but not an American Jew. This is discriminatory legislation, of a kind that is opposed to the American system.

Is the State Department ready to cooperate with the British in making this discrimination effective? Will it notify the British Embassy which applications for passports to turn down and which to approve on the grounds of race?

Or will it instead remind His Majesty's Government that by the treaty of 1925, which, word for word, incorporates the mandate of the League of Nations, the British Government agrees not to make any changes in the mandate without the specific consent of the United States?

UNILATERAL MONKEY BUSINESS

Will it tell the British Government that we don't like the kind of unilateral monkey business being pulled now any better than we liked Mr. Hitler's?

We think the way to test this unappetizing mess of broken treaties and violations of solemn pledges would be for a Jew, a citizen of the United States, to apply for a passport to immigrate into Palestine.

His application would be taken up by the British Embassy. If rejected, the embassy would have to specify that it is as a Jew and not as an American that he is turned down. For immigration is closed to no one but Jews.

If he is turned down, as he probably will be under the terms of the white paper, this Jewish citizen of the United States then would have the right to expect our State Department to secure for him his rights under the Anglo-American Treaty of 1925, which includes the mandate.

If the State Department should refuse to do this, then we would have a clear case of its refusal to carry out a sworn obligation. The matter would become one for the courts of the United States.

We think such a test is imperative. It is called for by the law; it is called for in the name of decency.

Tomorrow's Roads Must Be Planned Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. W. ROBINSON

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am including a program which was delivered over the Mutual Network, Friday, March 17, 1944:

ANNOUNCER. How are the streets and roads in your area? Are they highly congested with heavy wartime traffic? Are they full of chuck holes and other indications that men and materials for maintenance are wartime luxuries? Are you becoming travel-hungry and planning many long trips on America's highways when gasoline and tires again are plentiful? What kind of highways do you expect to find after a lot of wartime battering? What kind of highways for post-war travel would you like to have? Mutual has brought to the microphone in the Nation's Capital outstanding leaders qualified to bring you answers to these questions. Under the chairmanship of the Honorable J. W. ROBINSON, Member of Congress from Utah, the Committee on Roads of the House of Representatives is conducting hearings to determine what should be done about America's highways after the war. Here is Congressman ROBINSON, who will lead the discussion on Tomorrow's Roads Must Be Planned Today.

Mr. ROBINSON. Thank you.

Ladies and gentlemen, we are not going to have any speeches. We are going to just talk over informally the subject of roads, in which all of us have an interest. First, I want to introduce the gentleman here with me.

Mr. Samuel C. Hadden is from Indiana. He is chairman of the State Highway Commission of Indiana, and he is also the president of the American Association of State Highway Officials. Mr. Hadden.

Mr. HADDEN. Thank you, Congressman ROBINSON. We highway officials have recommended that Congress authorize the appropriation of funds, effective immediately upon the conclusion of hostilities, for the improvement and expansion of our highway system.

Our recommendation was made in the belief that because of our specialized knowledge in this field, it is incumbent upon us to advise the Congress as to the needs of the highways of the Nation and to offer our assistance to your committee, Mr. ROBINSON, and to other Members of the House and Senate, in working out the details of whatever program the Congress sees fit to authorize.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Roads Committee appreciates that very much, Mr. Hadden.

Ladies and gentlemen, the other member of our group is Mr. Russell E. Singer, general manager of the American Automobile Association. In that capacity he speaks on behalf of millions of owners and drivers of passenger cars, who are the users of the roads. Mr. Singer.

Mr. SINGER. I am glad of this opportunity to take part with you, Congressman ROBINSON, and with Mr. Madden in a round-table discussion of post-war highway problems. On October 15, last year, the board of directors of the American Automobile Association approved a comprehensive eight-point post-war highway program. I don't want to go into the details of that program now, because I am sure they will be developed as we get further into the discussion. In general, however, I can say that the motorists of the country are aware of the serious deficiencies which exist in our road system, particularly in the cities and suburban areas, and that they are strongly in favor of getting prepared so that when the war ends the improvements that are needed can be undertaken without delay.

Mr. ROBINSON. Thank you, Mr. Singer.

It is important that our listeners understand exactly what is before the Congress. As Mr. Hadden pointed out, the State highway officials of the country have recommended that Congress authorize Federal highway funds to be used after the war is over. In order to get this proposal into Congress for consideration, a bill was introduced by me in the House of Representatives. That is the bill on which we are now holding public hearings. An identical bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

This bill would authorize $1,000,000,000 in Federal funds for use in each of the 3 years after the war on highway projects which are eligible for Federal aid. Many details have to be worked out as to what projects would be eligible for this Federal assistance. In general, however, they include the construction of new roads, and the reconstruction of old ones, on highways which have been designated as part of the Federal-aid system. In addition, the building of bridges on these highways, and the construction of grade separations at crossings, are eligible. Is that about the substance of it, Mr. Hadden?

Mr. HADDEN. That's it exactly, Mr. ROBINSON. The Federal funds would be apportioned among the States according to a formula established by the Congress in advance. The Federal money also would be matched by State funds, in such proportion as the Congress determines. In this respect, the bill is the same as previous Federal-aid highway legislation. It retains the traditional principle of formula distribution and the policy of Federal-State matching of funds.

Mr. ROBINSON. I'm glad you mentioned those points, Mr. Hadden. The Federal-aid principle has made possible during the last 28 years the development of a system of roads in the United States which is the envy of all the rest of the world.

I think it would be worth while to spend a minute or two explaining how this came about.

The Federal Government first took action in road-construction matters way back in 1806. Funds were appropriated that year for the improvement of the historic National Pike. Again, in 1893 highways came to the attention of Congress as a national problem, and a small sum was appropriated for surveys of road management. In 1912, Congress appropriated $500,000 for improvement of rural postal delivery routes.

But it was in 1916 that Congress passed the law which was to become a landmark in highway development. That law provided for the appropriation of Federal funds which were divided among the States, according to the population, area, and mileage of post roads in each State. Matched by similar State funds, the money was applied to the construction and improvement of a selected system f highways.

That Road Act of 1916 was a milestone in our transportation history. It stood the test of time, and with certain amendments which have been made to meet changing conditions, is still the basic law of the land.

Mr. SINGER. Incidentally, Mr. ROBINSON, the gold pen which was used by President Wilson in signing the 1916 Federal Aid Act is on display in the headquarters of the American Automobile Association.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is an interesting memento, Mr. Singer. We have in this country about 3,000,000 miles of rural roads. The Federal-aid system totals 235,000 miles, representing about 8 percent of the total mileage. Those are the primary highways. In recent years we have begun the development of a secondary system, which is limited to 10 percent of the total.

Mr. HADDEN. It is worth noting, Mr. Robinson, that the funds appropriated for these Federal road systems are used only for construction purposes. The repair and maintenance costs are borne by the States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. Our road law also gives us a workable pattern for Federal and State cooperation which is worth attention in these troublesome days. Under our road law, the individual States continue to bear the responsibility for the planning and the construction of roads. They likewise share in their cost. The Federal Government, in turn, sets up certain standards of design and construction, and coordinates the road plans of the States so that we get a Nation-wide system suitable to the requirements of military defense and the national welfare.

Gentlemen, that gives us a little historical background. We have said something about the basic principles which underlie this present bill. But there are many important questions about the program which ought to be answered.

For example, there is the matter of timing. Why should this bill come up now? Here we have a measure dealing with post-war appropriations, for projects which can't be undertaken until after the war is over. Why not wait, then, until after hostilities are concluded, before we take up this legislation? Mr. Hadden, would you care to comment on that point?

Mr. HADDEN. I would, indeed, Mr. Congressman. It was more than a year ago when the association of which I am president first proposed a measure of this kind. We urged then, and we urge now, that Congress take action as promptly as it can. The reason is simple. If we are going to be ready when peace comes to begin the improvement of our road system, then we must plan the work in advance. But sound plans can't be made overnight. We can't even begin many of them until we know the amount of Federal funds that will be available, and for what type of projects. Until we have definite assurances as to what part Federal aid is going to play, no State can make real progress in planning its post-war program.

Our highway engineering staffs are now greatly depleted. We have got to use our limited manpower with the greatest possible economy and efficiency. That means concentrating our work on those projects which come within the scope of this legislation.

Mr. SINGER. Mr. Hadden, how much time do you estimate is involved in making these plans, and what are the principal difficulties involved?

Mr. HADDEN. The time varies, Mr. Singer, depending upon the type of project, the availability of manpower for surveys and planning, and other factors. In testimony before Congressman ROBINSON'S committee a few days ago, Mr. T. H. Cutler, the State highway engineer of Kentucky, pointed out that in 1933 and 1934, it took the highway departments of the country 3 months to put only $96,000,000 in projects under contract. At that time all the States had adequate engineering staffs.

One of the biggest problems, of course, is securing rights-of-way. In some States, the legal procedures involved in land acquisition make that job even longer and more difficult than in other States. But under the best circumstances it takes a great deal of time. Then there are the complex problems of selecting and locating the most needed facilities, of designing them, and of preparing construction drawings and specifications. All of these preliminary steps must be taken, however, if the highway program is to be soundly engineered and constructed.

Mr. SINGER. Let me add a word to what Mr. Hadden has said regarding the urgency of this program. The obstacles which stand in the way are large. The time for preparation is short. In my opinion, the planning and blueprinting of warranted projects is dangerously lagging. I think that we have a right to expect leadership from the Congress during the months ahead in the enactment of wise and proper Federal-aid legislation. But the States and local communities also are confronted with the necessity to complete their plans without delay, to the point where bids can be obained and contracts let immediately after the termination of the emergency. Mr. ROBINSON, what can we, as individual citizens, do about this?

Mr. ROBINSON. Everyone listening to this discussion, Mr. Singer, has a responsibility in this important problem. Because only to the extent that road needs are thoroughly understood, and vigorous public support is given to those who are in charge of highways, can we expect real progress to be achieved. This is true not only of the community programs, but of State and Federal activity as well.

There you have the historical background and the reasons for speedy action. But we haven't said much about the need for the program. Why are these projects essential? What is the size of the program that will be necessary? What amount of Federal-aid funds should be authorized?

Mr. HADDEN. The program recommended by the State highway officials provides for the expenditure during the 3-year period following the war of a total of $4,000,000,000. That figure includes both Federal and State matching funds. It is based on estimates which were made in all the States. A program of that size, Mr. Robinson, is regarded by the highway officials as the minimum program which should be planned. It will not accomplish in that period all that we feel should be done. But it is about as much as the States believe can be undertaken without a sacrifice of efficiency.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Federal appropriations would be considerably larger than those made during the years previous to the war. Can you tell us, Mr. Hadden, what the factors were which prompted this recommended increase?

Mr. HADDEN. Well, there are two conditions with which everyone is familiar that call for a large-scale program of highway construction after the war.

The first is the fact that we haven't had any regular highway construction in this country since 1941. About all that States have been able to do has been on access roads; that is, on the connecting links to military camps, war factories, and similar installations. These represent only a small fraction of our road mileage.

The second is the fact that our roads have gone right on wearing out. When you stop to consider, gentlemen, that before the war the biggest part of our regular construction program each year was devoted to replacement of worn-out and obsolete roadways, and that this work has been completely suspended, you begin to realize the huge backlog of work that is accumulating and the job which must be done when activities are resumed.

There are other circumstances which tend to increase the size of the job to be done. Many of the most heavily traveled roads, for example, are the oldest roads, and the most inadequate. They were due for replacement long ago. Some of our principal highways are handling large concentrations of war traffic. They are taking a severe battering in some instances from military vehicles and from the transportation of war goods. Some of the highways are being kept in operation only by extraordinary maintenance, and will have to be reconstructed entirely.

Mr. SINGER. In regard to that maintenance question, Mr. Hadden; would you say that road repair has been seriously curtailed during the war?

Mr. HADDEN. Yes; there has been some curtailment, due to shortages from time to time of equipment, materials, and manpower. In certain States there has also been a shortage of funds, due to the decrease in highway revenues resulting from gasoline rationing. In general, I would say that the roads are being kept up reasonably well in the face of extreme difficulties.

The highways which are especially hard hit are those in areas where military maneuvers and heavy troop movements have taken place. Then, of course, the weather continues to take its annual toll, particularly in the northern part of the country.

Mr. SINGER. I bring up the question of road maintenance, Mr. ROBINSON, because it has a bearing, as Mr. Hadden explained, on the amount of replacement and new construction which will be necessary after the emergency.

It also has an important bearing on the immediate problem of maintaining essential wartime transportation. We are facing a critical task from here on out in conserving this transportation. Each month, 150,000 automobiles are being scrapped or retired from service. Motor vehicles are steadily growing older, with no replacements in sight. The tire situation is serious. Gasoline supplies are short. Each day, we must get along with less and less, but we must manage somehow to keep 'em rolling.

In these circumstances, adequate repair of streets and highways obviously is of great importance. A ragged hole in the street, or a broken shoulder on the highway, can tear up desperately needed rubber, and put a serious strain on equipment already operating on borrowed time.

Mr. HADDEN. That's certainly true, Mr. Singer. Highway officials recognize maintenance as a problem which is going to get tougher as more and more road mileage wears out. Some of the worst difficulties encountered in past months with respect to materials and equipment are being ironed out, so that the outlook is improving in that regard. But manpower is an increasingly serious problem.

Mr. SINGER. Mr. ROBINSON, we were talking about the factors which must be considered in determining the size and character of the post-war highway program. Mr. Hadden pointed out that we are accumulating a large wartime deficit in our highway system. The plans also must take into consideration the inadequacies which existed in the highway system before the war.

Because of the reduction in travel today, it is easy to forget how bad conditions of traffic were in those days, especially in and near our cities. But they were serious. Congestion, delay, and accident hazards created bottlenecks which were strangling highway movement and taking a huge toll in time, money, and even in life and limb.

After the war, highway travel will be resumed. Unless proper action is taken to provide adequate facilities, these conditions will become serious again. The problem on roadways where traffic is concentrated in heavy volume can be met—and must be met—by the construction of modern expressways and other types of facilities with large traffic capacity.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no question, Mr. Singer, of the need to modernize a great many of our heavily traveled highways. In 1940, the Public Roads Administration reported that there were 5,500 miles of road less than 18 feet wide on the strategic military network alone. This system includes approximately 80,000 miles of primary roads which have been designated by the War Department as having critical military importance. In addition to the 5,500 miles of narrow pavements, the report showed 14,000 miles of weak road surfaces on the system, and serious deficiencies in a considerable percentage of the bridges.

Mr. SINGER. Yes, that's a good example of the modernization program needed. During the last 3 years, of course, these deficiencies have increased because of wartime deterioration. Mr. C. H. Purcell, director of public works in California, has stated that our military road network is at the most only 75 percent adequate. He further states that other primary rural highways are even less adequate.

Mr. HADDEN. In July of last year, the American Association of State Highway Officials asked all highway departments to list their minimum needed construction on main highways. The result was a listing of 158,000 miles of immediate highway construction needs, plus 30,000 bridges requiring rebuilding. The total cost estimated for these projects was over $7,000,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Hadden, did that estimate cover the cost of modernizing all main roads, including State highway systems?

Mr. HADDEN. No, it didn't. Additional construction is necessary to bring all State highway systems up to modern standards. The total estimates were 5.3 billion for the primary Federal aid system, 3.2 billion for the Federal secondary system, that is, the farm-to-market roads eligible for Federal aid—and 2.5 billion for highways extending into and through cities. That adds up to a grand total of $11,000,000,000. From these figures, it can be seen that the post-war authorization which has been proposed is not too large, so far as road requirements are concerned. The program contemplated under the present bill would, in fact, make possible only a part of the improvements that the States have listed as necessary.

Mr. SINGER. What you have said about the requirements, Mr. Hadden, reminds me of a statement made recently by General Fleming, the Federal Works Administrator. Talking in Chicago about the highway-construction plans for the future, General Fleming remarked that what we are facing is not so much a post-war program as it is a postponed program. He was referring, of course, to need for catching up after the war with the schedule of improvements which was getting under way when the war intervened. Anyone who has been jammed up in a long line of cars back of a red light, or crawled at snail's pace, bumper to bumper, on some roadway incapable of handling the traffic load, knows exactly what the General meant.

Mr. ROBINSON. That gives us two yardsticks with which to measure the size of our post-war program, gentlemen. The first is the maintenance and construction which have been deferred by the war. The second are the inadequacies of our roads, which existed before the war emergency arrived, and which resulted from the spectacular increase in highway travel that took place during the past three decades in this country.

Now I want to suggest a third factor. The third factor is the future of highway transportation itself. In peacetime we learn to expect a new model car each year. Improvements are incorporated into our motor vehicles every season. But roads can't be built that way. The roads we are planning today will be constructed after the war, and then will be expected to serve the public in 1960 and 1970. They must accommodate cars that won't even be on the drafting boards 15 years from now.

We must plan boldly, gentlemen. The program must take into account the increases which are anticipated in vehicle registrations and in mileage of travel. Otherwise, the facilities that we build will soon become obsolete. And the penalty of obsolescence is a stiff price we can't afford to pay. Expediency is a wasteful policy from the standpoint of highway costs.

Fortunately, we do not have to rely on guesses as to what our traffic needs will be. As result of the highway planning studies which have been carried on in all the States for several years, we now have a solid foundation of factual information on which to base our program. From these studies has emerged an orderly and progressive master plan for highway development.

Mr. HADDEN. That is absolutely correct, Mr. ROBINSON. Working in cooperation with the Public Roads Administration, the States have accumulated a tremendous amount of information on the character of road use, on the economics of the highways, and other engineering and fiscal data. It was these surveys which made possible the work of the National Committee on Interregional Highways, under the chairmanship of our veteran and able Commissioner of Public Roads, Thomas H. MacDonald. Analyzing our national highway needs, that committee found that more than 20 percent of the total traffic could be carried efficiently and safely on less than 1 percent of our total road mileage, if those roads, both rural and urban, are improved to new high standards in the years ahead. The committee's report recently was transmitted to Congress by the President, and it recommends that this interregional system of modern highways be officially designated, so that future projects on these routes can be designed to meet the necessary specifications.

Mr. SINGER. Those are the roads, Mr. Hadden, that will have the capacity needed to open up the bottlenecks in our highway system. Here and there around the country are samples of these roads of tomorrow, with limited access to prevent roadside encroachment, with separations between opposing streams of traffic, with all intersections eliminated. When an expressway of this type is constructed in a congested area, the heavy volume of traffic seems to disappear as if by magic. The modern highway does not appear to be carrying a load at all. That is simply because it is doing the job for which the roadway was designed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Singer, is it your opinion that in the years ahead motor travel will continue to increase as it did during our recent history?

Mr. SINGER. Yes, Mr. ROBINSON; all signs seem to point in that direction. A few years ago the Public Roads Administration estimated that by 1960 the vehicle mileage in this country would be double that of 1937. The war has interfered with that upward curve, but the trend definitely will be toward more and more use of motor vehicles. At present the passenger car is doing a war job. Social and recreational driving for the most part have been greatly curtailed. But when peace comes again a travel-hungry public will soon expand that mileage to its peacetime level and beyond. We can certainly expect in the post-war years a revival of the great tourist industries and other activities dependent upon highway travel.

Mr. HADDEN. That activity, Mr. Singer, will mean employment. And that reminds me that we have not mentioned at all the economic benefits which are derived from safe and efficient highway transportation.

Mr. ROBINSON. That's true. Nor have we said anything about the useful jobs which the highway-construction program itself will provide during the demobilization period after the war, when peacetime industry and business are coming back. The employment in those projects will be a secondary benefit of the highway program, but it may prove to be an extremely valuable asset in the post-war adjustment period.

Mr. SINGER. Much could be said also, Mr. ROBINSON, about the imperative need of giving more emphasis in the post-war highway program to the requirements of city and suburban areas. The 1916 road law got us out of the mud. I hope that the 1944 road law, ushering in a new era in the history of America's highway transportation, will get us out of the muddle.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; we could go on profitably for hours, gentlemen. Highway traffic is something which affects the day-to-day living of each and every one of us. In conclusion, I desire to thank the Mutual Broadcasting Co. for the time and courtesies extended us. Also, I want to thank you gentlemen for joining with me in this discussion. I want to thank our listeners, too, for myself and on behalf of my colleagues in the Roads Committee of the House of Representatives, for the constructive interest which so many of you are showing in the solution of this important national problem.

ANNOUNCER. Ladies and gentlemen, you have been listening to a round-table discussion on the subject of Tomorrow's Roads Must Be Planned Today. Participants were the Honorable J. W. ROBINSON, chairman of the Roads Committee of the House of Representatives; Mr. Russell E. Singer, general manager of the American Automobile Association; and Mr. Samuel C. Hadden, president of the American Association of State Highway Officials. The program came to you from Washington, D. C., as a public-service feature of the Mutual Network.

Why Labor Should Vote Republican

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD W. LANDIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address I made over the National Broadcasting Co., April 2, 1944:

Fellow Americans, the workers of America are to be congratulated on their splendid efforts to create a miracle in war production. The free men and women of America have rolled up their sleeves and done an outstanding job. Their record speaks for itself.

You, better than anyone else, know that all real wages are paid out of production. You know that without constant expansion of enterprise, full employment and higher real wages and resultant better working conditions cannot be realized.

The Republican Party, throughout its entire history, has been a real friend of labor. You perhaps have forgotten that the very birth of the Republican Party came from its determined effort to end the most oppressive of labor's abuses—slavery. And since that birth the Republican Party has never failed to protect the expansion of enterprise; it has always fought for full employment; and under its administration of the Nation's affairs the trend of the real-wage level was always upward. The greatest peacetime prosperity enjoyed by any laboring men any place in the world has been enjoyed by the workers of America under the administration of Republican Presidents. The American people attained the highest level of individual possessions, the greatest number of comforts and all of this without incurring any peacetime direct, interest-bearing Federal debt.

Leaders of the Republican Party have devoted themselves to enacting helpful labor legislation for many years. They have spoken fearlessly, frankly, on the subject of collective bargaining, decent wages, shorter hours, and better working conditions.

President William McKinley signed the Erdman Act June 1, 1898, which provided for mediation and conciliation in the settlement of disputes between the railroads and their employees. It prohibited the discharge of a railroad employee because he was a member of a trade union.

A Republican Congress passed the Railroad Labor Act of 1926, which further aided the prompt settlement of railroad labor disputes. Again the Republican Party sponsored the Anti-Injunction Act of 1932, which protects labor from a discrminatory use of the injunction to break strikes. It was the first party to foster protective tariffs to maintain American wage scales. It has restricted immigration to protect our standard of living. It has opposed child labor.

As a member of the House Labor Committee, I have had the opportunity to contact many employers and labor leaders. All labor organizations, and most of the employers, are united in preserving the Wages and Hours Act and the National Labor Relations Act which gives the American workers minimum wages and the right of collective bargaining. Most employers have complied willingly and in good faith with these provisions. They believe it would be a step backward to destroy them. No one wants to return to sweatshops and low wages. However, thousands of employers and employees are disgusted by the way these acts are being administered.

Employer and employee alike have seen the National Labor Relations Act administered to provoke strife. They have seen it used for political purpose to play one labor organization against another. It is perfectly plain that the right of the employee to bargain collectively with his employer will be of no avail unless there are employers with which to bargain.

In its manipulation of organized labor, the New Deal has injured the labor movement. It has claimed as allies and it has sought to make political vehicles of certain labor groups and thereby aroused opposition to the labor movement by other groups of our citizenry. This is the underlying cause of the agitation that "something must be done to labor."

In the general confusion of our Government, labor has been the whipping boy of bureaucrats. The Department of Labor, which was established to be the central clearinghouse for labor problems, has been rendered impotent, and now labor's leaders have to go from one to another of 25 governmental agencies dealing with labor.

Under this New Deal administration labor unions have been deprived of their right of collective bargaining. Federal bureaus control wages, hours, working conditions, and promotions. The Wages and Hours Act has been hamstrung from the beginning because of the poor administration of the act.

The Republican Party will replace the New Deal's plan of regimentation and compulsion with good management and persuasion. We will utilize the facilities of industry to the best advantage of labor, management, and capital in the post-war period. We will continue to work for full employment, better working conditions, wise and considerate supervision, old-age and disability insurance and the rights of collective bargaining.

The Republican Party will see to it that laws enacted to help labor are administered properly. We will recognize honest American labor leaders and see that industry in this country is a partnership between labor, management, and capital. We will demand that there be a fair division of income in this three-way partnership. We will help to bring about mutual confidence and understanding. We will get the job done with old-fashioned American teamwork.

Fellow Americans, will we rake leaves for the Government under New Deal leadership, or will we have real jobs in private enterprise under Republican leadership? We will have to make our choice. There is no question as to how real Americans will decide. Free enterprise must lead the way, unfettered by Federal restrictions. The hope of the world lies in free men and women. We must keep faith with the men and women in our armed forces. We must keep the torch of liberty burning at home to light the way.

The Hungry Horse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD, under unanimous consent, an editorial from the Flathead Monitor of Thursday, June 10, 1943, concerning the proposed Hungry Horse Dam in Montana. The writer of this editorial, Mr. Harry Kelley, has been devoting the last 20 years of his life toward the development of this project because he is convinced of its need in furtherance of Montana's progress. He knows whereof he speaks and our people have every confidence in his ability and all of us of Montana are in wholehearted accord with what he says.

The editorial follows:

Hungry Horse Dam is the one answer to the Grand Coulee water needs. It is ready to go now and can be built in time to meet a great part of the alleged needs by 1945. It was brought out in the hearing that it may be needed in 1945 and would actually be necessary in 1946. That is a far cry from the middle of 1944. We have no objection to Grand Coulee or any other downstream development having the full use of Montana water, but we insist on them having it in an equitable way that would give Montana its full use by holding this water in the upper reaches of the Flathead, where it would damage no one.

The McKellar Amendment to T. V. A.

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the people of my section, especially the farmers, are greatly disturbed, and rightly so, over what is known as the McKellar amendments to the independent offices appropriation bill.

There are two of these amendments, the adoption of either one of which would, in my opinion, wreck the T. V. A.

Let us consider these amendments separately in order to determine just what effect the adoption of either one would have upon the future of T. V. A.

One amendment would require T. V. A. to turn into the United States Treasury all of its receipts and then come to Congress annually for an appropriation covering expansion and operating costs. Now, on its face, this amendment will probably appeal to those who do not think the matter through. A careful analysis of the amendment, however, will clearly show up the dangers that are so cleverly wrapped up in this seemingly righteous piece of legislation.

Congress, under the leadership of Senator Norris and Senator McNary, was functioning in a businesslike, statesmanlike manner when it set up T. V. A. Under the terms of the T. V. A. Act it first laid down the objectives, then the method of operation, and then, following sound business practices, it allowed the Authority to function as a business corporation through a board of directors, managing its designated functions and its own funds, free from Washington bureaucracy, and free from national and local politics. Moreover, Congress, in order to safeguard every right, required the Authority to make an annual report to the Congress, and required that all receipts and expenditures of the Authority be audited by the General Accounting Office. In other words, as a private corporation operates within its charter provisions through a board of directors, the T. V. A. operates within its legislative provisions through a board of directors. And, as the board of directors of a private corporation has to report to its stockholders, so the board of directors of T. V. A. has to report to the Congress, the representative of the people, who, in the final analysis, are the stockholders of T. V. A.

Now, T. V. A., operating as it has along business lines, free from political influence, has made a great record. No charge has been made that the management has not been efficient and that the Authority has not operated in accordance with good business practices. No charge has been made that funds have been diverted or that the Authority has been guilty of waste, extravagance, or poor business judgment. It has a record for efficiency and sound management that any business corporation would be proud of. And, in my opinion, the reason it has such a fine record is because it has been free of political influence. Now, what would this McKellar amendment do? It would force the Authority to come to Congress each year for expansion and operating funds. And Senator MCKELLAR, due to the illness of Senator GLASS, is the acting chairman of the Senate committee that would pass upon the appropriation. It is well known that Senator MCKELLAR, in spite of Lilienthal's outstanding record, does not like Lilienthal and wants to get rid of him. What does all of this add up to? Let us be plain about the matter. It simply means that T. V. A. will no longer be run along business lines, but will be conducted along political lines. It means that when the Authority comes before the Congress for an appropriation, you would have the McKellars saying, "Get rid of Lilienthal and I will go along." Others would be saying, "Do this, that, or the other, and I will go along." It simply means converting T. V. A. from an efficient business organization into a political organization. Do this and you will destroy T. V. A.

The other amendment is equally as vicious. This amendment would require Senate confirmation of all Government employees receiving $4,500 and more and would apply, of course, to the some 600 T. V. A. employees receiving such compensation, most of whom are in Tennessee. In all, I understand this amendment would apply to some 30,000 Government employees. Stripped of all hypocritically pious arguments, what would this add up to? Well, every sensible person knows that neither the President nor the Senate could even pretend to consider 30,000 appointments on their merits. It simply means a revival of the spoils system upon a scale never before dreamed of, and the allocation of these appointments under the ancient rule of senatorial courtesy.

To the spurious argument that this legislation is aimed at reducing T. V. A. power rates, let me say in no uncertain terms that I do not know of a more effective way of raising T. V. A. rates, and raising them not only to a point where they would no longer serve as a good yardstick by which power rates in general can be measured but to a point where the farmers could no longer afford to use electricity. Why? Because in substituting political management for business management you would crucify the Authority upon the political cross of inefficiency. If the power interests had set about to destroy the Authority, they could not have devised a more ingenious scheme than the McKellar amendments.

Another thing I desire to bring to the attention of the House is the manner in which this legislation originated. It would seem that such far-reaching legislation would originate in the usual way; that is, by a proper bill, which would be referred to a committee for proper hearings and study, and then a report to the Congress, setting forth its findings and recommendations. This is not only the proper legislative procedure but the only safe procedure. This legislation originated, however, by what is known as a rider; that is, an amendment to an appropriation bill. Such an amendment could not have originated in the House because it would have gone out on a point of order as being legislation on an appropriation bill. The rules of the Senate, however, permit such amendments. I am always suspicious of legislation by riders. Legislation that cannot weather hearings and study by the proper committee is seldom, if ever, proper.

Mr. Speaker, on April 8, 1944, the Southwest Virginia Agricultural Association held its annual meeting at Abingdon, Va. The meeting was attended by over 300 outstanding farmers from the 9 Virginia counties lying within the watershed of the Tennessee River. Among other resolutions adopted, the association adopted a resolution condemning what is known as the McKellar amendments and calling upon the Virginia Senators and Congressmen to lend their influence to defeat same. Under unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks, I include herein a copy of the resolution:

At the ninth annual meeting of the Southwest Virginia Agricultural Association, held at Abingdon, Va., on April 8, 1944, in attendance were over 300 representative farmers from 9 Virginia counties lying within the watershed of the Tennessee River, the below resolution was unanimously adopted by the entire body:

"Whereas it has come to the attention of this association that certain proposed amendments undertaking to obstruct the efficient administrative, financial, and operating powers of the Tennessee Valley Authority, as created by the act of Congress in 1933; and

"Whereas this body deplores such amendments as being inimical to the efficient and effective operation of the Tennessee Valley Authority and to the best interest of this area and State; and

"Whereas the farmers in the counties represented here, together with the farmers from the other Virginia counties, are receiving material assistance in their farming operations through the efforts of the Tennessee Valley Authority in their fertilizer program; and

"Whereas the entire Nation is receiving benefits from the T. V. A.'s national defense program of electric power and munitions production, navigation, flood and soil-erosion control, high-analysis fertilizers, and other activities of inestimable value to our war effort: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this body unanimously endorses the entire program of the Tennessee Valley Authority and requests that its present activities be continued and expanded as rapidly as practicable; be it further

"Resolved, That the Virginia Congressmen and Senators and members of the House and Senate Agricultural Committees be forwarded copies of this resolution with the request that they use their vote and influence to oppose any action which would in any way impair the efficient and valuable work being done by the Tennessee Valley Authority at present or in the future."

J. L. SANDERS,
Chairman, Resolutions Committee.

Mr. Speaker, on March 28, 1944, the city of Bristol, Va., also passed resolutions condemning the McKellar amendments. Under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I include herein a copy of the resolutions adopted by the city of Bristol, Va.:

CITY OF BRISTOL, VA.,
March 28, 1944.

Mayor Preston presented the following:

"Resolved, That this council go on record as opposing the McKellar amendments now pending before Congress concerning the Tennessee Valley Authority, because: First, having already signed a contract, we are interested in obtaining T. V. A. power for our city; second, we believe that T. V. A. should be kept out of politics; and, third, T. V. A. now has a fine record in fact and in the public estimation as rendering splendid service in many ways to the people in the area served by it and we regret that its future and its usefulness is threatened by said amendments.

"We respectfully call upon our senators and members of the house of delegates to oppose said amendments."

Upon motion of Mayor Preston, seconded by Mr. Aaron, and by unanimous vote, the foregoing resolution was adopted

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of resolution adopted by the Council of the City of Bristol, Va., at its meeting of March 28, 1944, as recorded in minute book 13, page 354.

Given under my hand and the official seal of said city, this the 30th day of March 1944.

Amendment to Use Tax Stamp Act

REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I take this time today to advise the House that I have introduced an amendment to title 26, section 3540, of the United States Code, which is commonly called the Use Tax Stamp Act. Under the provisions of that act each person owning and operating a motor vehicle or a boat is required to purchase a use-tax stamp and attach the same to the motor vehicle or boat, and to exhibit the same in a conspicuous place. A failure so to do subjects the owner to a fine and punishment.

In many cases, since this act became a public law, the people have complied with the law by purchasing the stamp and affixing it to their motor vehicle or boat, and thereafter the same has been lost, removed, stolen, or mutilated, and the owner has been compelled to purchase another stamp, for that period for which he has already purchased a stamp and for which he has already paid the fee of $5 therefor. Under the present law there is no receipt issued to the purchaser of the use-tax stamp, and no other written evidence is issued to him, so evidence is available whereby he can show that he has made such purchase in compliance with the law.

The bill which I have introduced provides that the selling official shall issue and deliver to each purchaser a receipt, or written evidence, of such purchase, showing the date of the purchase and the name and address of the purchaser, which shall be duly signed by the selling officer and which such evidence may be thereafter used, by the purchaser, in case of the loss, removal, theft, or mutilation of such sticker, stamp, or tag so purchased by him, to secure another of the same, or a duplicate thereof, without any additional charge therefor.

Mr. Speaker, it was not the intent of this law that our people should be required to purchase, at a cost of $5 each, more than one stamp for any one motor vehicle or boat during any one year. However, in many instances where the stamp or sticker was lost or stolen the people have been compelled to purchase another to take its place in order to avoid the punishment provided by the law. This measure will provide the material evidence necessary for our people to secure a duplicate stamp, without any additional cost, in cases where the stamps or stickers have been lost, stolen, or mutilated.

How to Continue Our Traditional Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by me last night:

Both in the public press and on the radio, there has been criticism of the alleged lack of a consistent foreign policy. Many people in public life have complained that our Government did not follow a foreign policy that was consistent; that our foreign policy of today was not the policy of yesterday, or would be the policy of tomorrow. This criticism was wholly unjustified by the facts.

A few days ago our Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, told the people of the United States very plainly and in very definite language just what our essential foreign policy is, was, and will be.

One of the principal points which were raised in the Secretary's speech, was the fact that our country has always followed the policy of human freedom, human dignity, and the right of every individual to live happily and without fear.

It is in line with this policy that we now have the opportunity of again demonstrating to the whole world that we value human rights; that we seek to save human lives wherever possible; and that we shall do our share to bring about a condition for many, so that they may be relieved of the haunting fear of a hopeless existence.

As the German Army is retreating on the eastern front, it leaves in its wake hundreds and thousands of victims. These victims are not soldiers who are fighting in the ranks and who wage battle. These victims are men, women, and children left behind all over the war area, whom Hitler has marked for extermination. Knowing that he cannot win this war, he wants to complete his fiendish program of destruction before it is possible to rescue his victims.

This condition has now existed for some time, and since I believe that it is our duty as American citizens, and in the tradition of our country, to help the oppressed, I introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives, which declared it to be the sense of Congress that aid should be given to victims of oppression, who are desirous of establishing temporary homes in the United States, so that they may come to us until such time as other homes can be provided for them.

What I propose to do under this resolution, is to save as many human lives as can be saved within the framework of our immigration laws.

While much can be said concerning our future immigration policy, there is no question that restrictions of immigration and limitations of immigration have been clearly written into our legislation and there is no question but that our future immigration policy will continue to be based on selective immigration. It is therefore impossible to do anything by way of increasing the number of permanent immigrants who might be admitted from Europe from the Hitler-ridden countries.

In his progress through Europe, Hitler has already murdered and enslaved masses of people in every country to which his legions have gone. He enslaved the countries of western Europe and whenever his armies are forced to retreat from Russian territory, he slaughters and enslaves thousands along his path.

The only way we can save at least some of his victims is by granting temporary havens of refuge to as many as can find the opportunity to escape, until such time as they shall be able to return to their homelands or until such time as other countries might be found ready to receive them.

The object of my resolution is, therefore, no amendment to our immigration laws and no desire to interfere with a settled policy of our immigration laws, but it is purely a temporary measure designed to help and to save. The program is not limited to Jewish victims of Hitler's persecution, but is to be applied on a broader basis, including all racial groups, which have borne the brunt of Hitler's persecution.

The important thing now is not to provide for a future settlement of these people, but to enable them to save their lives until such time as definite plans could be made for their settlement.

Hitler will not wait for us to rescue them from his clutches. He is carrying on his program with ferocious and unrelenting might, and if we do not do something now, at once and in a hurry, there will be nobody to save when the time will come for us to resettle the ravaged countries which Hitler has despoiled.

In pleading for justice for the many who have been dispossessed by the fury of the German regime, we are not seeking to open the doors for those who may be unworthy. On the contrary, the types of aliens who have come to the United States since 1933 have been persons who have materially contributed to the welfare of the United States, and many have since given their lives in battle. A few days ago, I had the pleasure of listening to a very interesting discourse by my colleague, the former Governor of Massachusetts, and former mayor of Boston, Congressman CURLEY, who recited the fine record of achievement and bravery contributed to this country by a large number of Jews, who have distinguished themselves as soldiers, sailors, and marines. Among the names he mentioned were many who have only recently arrived in the United States as victims of Hitler's persecution. Undoubtedly, there will be many others in the same category who will be found among those whom we may rescue from Hitler's clutches.

To be sure, the ideal solution of the problem of the men, women, and children who are slated for extermination would be their removal to Palestine. Palestine is ideally situated to receive these persons, since it is accessible to them by land, does not require any shipping for transportation, and would be the place in which these victims could find a congenial home.

I have not yet given up hope that some way will be found to open the doors of Palestine to the victims of Hitler's persecution.

The British white paper is not recognized by the people of the United States as being within the terms of the British mandate over Palestine, and there is no question in my mind that this so-called white paper is a clear violation of our treaty with Great Britain, and I will leave no stone unturned to see that this white paper is abrogated.

Palestine could be opened not only as a home for the Jewish victims of Hitler's persecution, but to all races and nationalities, who can be invited to settle there within the limits of the country's absorptive capacity. I know that sooner or later the great powers will see the wisdom of this step and will themselves propose Palestine as a solution of the problem of persecuted minorities.

Only recently a fine economist and a member of our own Department of Agriculture, Dr. Lowdermilk, wrote a very convincing book, in which he pointed out the miracle of achievement of Palestine. He showed how waste lands have been converted into blooming gardens, how empty spaces which had been neglected for hundreds of years have become thriving and fruitful. So I do believe that since this miracle was accomplished, in face of tremendous odds against it, these prospective refugees can make Palestine even more fertile, and even more suitable for a homeland for the dispossessed. But, I am afraid that if we waste too much time in trying to convince people who do not wish to be convinced, how wonderful a solution Palestine would be, we shall lose valuable time in effecting the rescue of those who may otherwise not be rescued in time.

As a result of my correspondence, I am convinced that with the approval of our Federal authorities, many States would welcome refugees to settle on farms wherever possible, and by doing so will help to relieve our present critical shortage of agricultural workers throughout the United States.

Another possibility was Alaska, which offers the additional advantage of being strategically an important outpost of the United States, so that a resettlement of suitable persons within its borders will result in obtaining favorable groups of people in the interests of the United States, in this remote corner of our country.

Only recently Congress appropriated $30,000,000 for the Department of Agriculture, in order to import into this country Mexican and other residents of this hemisphere to help to relieve our labor shortage. It has been an increasingly difficult problem to find enough hands to take care of our farms, and in many places our agriculture suffers tremendously from the shortage of manpower to operate farms.

I know I speak for the many independent farmers in this country who have found it increasingly difficult to keep step with the necessity of wartime production to permit this country to fill its quota of products to feed the United States and the world. As a matter of fact, it was necessary from time to time to grant deferments from military service to persons engaged in farming, because without such deferments we could not possibly keep our farms.

By increasing agricultural production, we will make a decided contribution to our war effort. We have called upon our youth to work on the farms while on vacation from school and at other odd times. But here are men, women, and children who will undoubtedly utilize the opportunity of working on our farms, if we give them the chance of leaving behind their enemies who are seeking to exterminate them. It will not cost us one cent in appropriations. Why not try the experiment of permitting entry to the United States of any fit and law-abiding alien who will undertake the work of our farmers?

The resolution I have introduced may not be a complete solution to the problem, and while I do not contend that it will put an end to Hitler's destruction of the many racial and national groups of Europe, it will go a long way toward the principle which is so thoroughly American—the saving of human lives.

We shall also thereby give an example to the countries of Central and South America, who will, I feel, likewise open their doors to the victims of persecutions and rescue them from their destruction, if we show the way.

Report on the Aleutian Islands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report made by me to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Hon. CARL VINSON,
Chairman, Naval Affairs Committee.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to orders of the committee, the undersigned proceeded from Seattle on Tuesday, January 24, 1944, on an inspection tour of the Aleutian naval bases west of Dutch Harbor.

I proceeded by Naval Transportation Service from Seattle up the Pacific coast, over Canadian territory, to the base at Annette Island, southeastern tip of Alaska Territory. The Navy maintains a naval air facility on Annette Island. Lieutenant Commander Snyder is in command. This facility maintains patrols generally doing what would be normal Coast Guard work in the area. Much of the work is the handling of military transients. The facility maintains several quonset huts for that purpose.

The Army field at Annette is an excellent one and within easy reach as a gas facility and alternate field for planes going north from Seattle, and is on American territory. The main complaint of the men, both Army and Navy, on the island was the utter lack of any recreational facilities. The only town of any consequence was the Indian village of Metex which has long since been declared out of bounds. The Navy facility had under its command several trained pilots who, by their own confession, had very little to do inasmuch as patrols were limited and the general pressure of enemy activity in this area has long since been removed.

Annette Field is an air facility, however, that should be properly maintained at all times because of its importance as an American way point on the coast air line north, now and post-war.

The Sitka naval base was passed up due to bad weather but conversation was had with several officers who had recently returned from the base and all were of the opinion that the Army-Navy facility there was much too large; that the expenditure of money had been excessive and extravagant and that it should be reverted back to a section-base status. Admiral F. J. Whiting, commandant of the Alaska section, had already surveyed the situation and was making moves toward this end, both in way of reduced personnel, and in the removal of materials needed elsewhere. The Army has expended many hundreds of thousands of dollars in building breakwaters and levees to small islands beyond the Sitka base. The desirability of same is doubtful. A Coast Guard Patrol station, in my opinion, should serve the purpose with a reasonable Navy section-base status on Sitka proper. Admiral Whiting is thoroughly cognizant of the situation and is taking steps to correct the situation. Whiting's recommended personnel cut for the base is well within line of the above impressions.

Left Annette Wednesday, January 25, by N. A. T. S., direct over the Gulf of Alaska, in a land plane for Kodiak Naval Base. Arrived at 0400. Weather conditions again were bad with the thermometer below zero, a blizzard in progress and a 60-knot-an-hour wind. The landing strips at Kodiak, however, are more than adequate since my last visit to the island, and aids to navigation allow landing of large land planes in almost any type of weather if ceiling is available. The naval air field at Kodiak Island is one of the most adequate of any of our naval bases if not one of the finest in the Pacific. Present runways are sufficient to take care of any type of plane built. The base has grown considerably since my inspection of a year ago but finds itself in a somewhat comparable position to other eastern Alaskan bases; namely, that the war has moved westward. It is, therefore, recommended that no further new projects for the development of the base be made without careful scrutiny as to their necessity. The main activity was the handling of aircraft on the north and south Aleutian run and a great number of personnel moving in and out. Two excellent officers are in charge, Captain McDade, the commander, and Commander Rice, the executive officer. For example, regarding the necessity of maintaining facilities to handle transfers in this area, I found two full companies of Seabees at Kodiak awaiting transportation out. McDade and Rice expressed the opinion that their main job now was to make the base as ship-shape and as efficient as possible. This air facility should be maintained to its fullest extent because Kodiak Island, like Annette, will always be an important waypoint over the northern air route.

Storage facilities here are of the finest in Alaska. The supply department is doing an excellent job in maintaining backlogs of supplies for all activities to the westward. One of the most vital services to be put to use by the base is a full utilization of its airplane repair facilities. Kodiak has excellent repair shops, hangars, and power facilities.

Several hundred permanent personnel are maintained on the base. This amount seems reasonable for adequate maintenance.

At Kodiak there appeared much wasted Army personnel. It is hoped the Army quickly moves on this matter, in view of manpower need. These are trained men, many of them stagnating there. Transportation is, of course, a problem.

The Kodiak Air Field has plenty of hangar space and future construction projects do not seem desirable at this time. Such is also the opinion of the competent officers there.

It may be well to note some comments regarding a complete inspection of ship service in this area. It was well stocked and the ship service officer and myself counted at least 50 separate items available to the men there which are not available in the States. This, of course, is as it should be.

Recreation facilities were in fair abundance but the men are pretty restricted during the winter months. This base, as well as other bases on the chain, was equipped with a gymnasium, a sun room, and a steam room—which were used constantly. Lieutenant Nielson, a reserve officer who had been in charge of a Boston athletic club, has done a great deal to stimulate interest in the physical welfare of the men. This is excellent utilization of ability and experience. The officers had also installed, in order to utilize a certain amount of waste time, what they call Kodiak University. Officers stationed on the base from Reserve groups who had been either teachers or had some specialty in civilian life, taught night classes. The classes were open to all and were well attended. The base had a local radio station from which it broadcast music, news as picked up by short wave from Pacific coast stations, and good use was made of local talent on the base. Radio scouts might do well in some of these Aleutian bases. The three small movie houses were crowded every evening. This station had solved its problem of keeping the men active both on and off duty in the best possible way available. No civilian population exists on the island, except the small town of Kodiak. Very little exists there. Activities on the base were such that I was told the men expressed no desire for leave to go to this town.

No venereal-disease problem exists at all. As a matter of fact, the health of the men along the whole naval activity of the Alaskan and Aleutian chain is better than anywhere else in the world. This is, of course, due to the climate and the lack of carrier germs.

An interesting feature of recreational activities was observed in that during the months of snow a ski lodge was built on one of the mountains outside the base and a Red Cross girl who had been a ski instructor was assigned to give men ski instructions. The very few hospital cases at Kodiak as well as other bases were mainly accidents from skiing, slipping on the ice, etc.

Admiral Whiting met me at Kodiak and, as before pointed out, he had been on an inspection tour with almost the same purpose in mind as the remarks of this report. He is an able and practical officer.

The Navy is further utilizing, on the Kodiak base, the services of Reserve officers who are very familiar with Alaskan problems, both air and sea. For example, the able air transportation officer at Kodiak, a key point in Alaskan air transportation, was Commander Herb Munter, one of the oldest and most experienced of all Alaskan flyers. This personnel utilization can be multiplied many times in the area.

Admiral Whiting and I flew direct from Kodiak to Adak in a DC-4, nonstop. For pure transportation work, all experienced air officers agree, and this nonstop flight bore out, that the use of large land planes which can fly long distances over Alaskan and Aleutian weather are most desirable. The "chain" is becoming literally not only the main air highway via the great circle route to Asia but also probably one of the finest air road beds in the world.

Several discussions were had on this point regarding N. A. T. S. service. Admiral Whiting and N. A. T. S. officers were in the process of working out main routes and shuttle service, a very fine system of air transportation from Seattle all the way to Attu. Pan American Airways, under contract, is flying part of the route. Northwest Airlines, under Army contract, is flying the inside route and from Anchorage clear on out to Adak along the chain of Naval bases. These private air carriers are doing an excellent job and should be encouraged in every way, not only for the purpose of keeping this in private hands when they can serve the war effort successfully, but for the purpose of giving commercial air lines the so-called know how of this terrain in order that in post-war aviation they may be in a position to take best advantage of world air development. Both Army and Navy transport service should only be used where commercial contract carriers are not available.

At Adak I was met by Admiral Frank J. Fletcher, the commandant of the Northern Sea Frontier. Adak is the main advanced base in the Aleutians. It is an amazing place which has been built up to fighting strength in 1 year. It might be well to note here that this tremendous construction job at all these northern bases west of Dutch Harbor has been accomplished by the Seabees. One can only appreciate what has been done by visual observation. They have gone out on these barren wastes, pitched tents, and, starting from scratch in the sleet, slush, rain, cold, and snow, have built some of the finest air fields, air facilities, piers, etc., that exist anywhere in any advanced base in the world. I spent some time with the Seabee unit at Adak. I found them commanded by able engineers and composed of the most varied assortment of men that ever donned a uniform. They can do anything and build anything and are willing to do so on a moment's notice. Their activities range from driving "cats" and bulldozers, mending furniture in a nurses' home, stevedoring on ships, digging pits, gravelling roads, exploring for wild game and fish, to interior decorating in the officers' office.

For instance, at Adak they have drained a small lake and provided for a fleet anchorage which will take care of anything we will ever use in the Aleutians. They have just about completed a Navy air field. They have built roadways and all the other things necessary for this vast naval facility, all in the period of 10 months starting from scratch.

They happen to be the healthiest and happiest crew of men of any corps, and I may say also the hungriest, which is only natural after this outdoor work. It might be interesting to the committee to know that at one dinner with them we had soup, turkey, asparagus, mashed potatoes, dressing, bread, butter, cookies, salad, ice cream, and coffee, all in generous helpings and many of them took a second, along with music and free cigarettes. Some ingenious Seabee had rigged up a phonograph with loudspeaker, along the lines of Musack system so that every mess hall had as fine music as they wanted. This ingenuity is typical. The cost to the Government is nil. In my opinion, from observation not only in the Aleutians, but over a period of many war months in the Pacific, the courage and accomplishments of the Seabees is one of the bright spots of efficiency in war.

It was found that there had been no court-martials and only three mast cases in 3 months, and not one man on report in 3 weeks.

Adak has the best harbor in the Aleutians. Why the Japanese did not establish themselves there is a military mystery. Possibly the best explanation is that for many years on all of our maps we designated Kiska as a "Naval Reserve—Keep Out," and, therefore, the very subtle way of Japanese thinking must have led them to Kiska instead of to one of the finest potential bases in the Aleutians.

The Army airfield at Adak is a unique one with a very long runway. This was accomplished by a very bright young engineer who discovered a lagoon with a narrow entrance from the sea and merely drained the lagoon by building a dam at the entrance. They drain the water in or out at will leaving a very fine hard-surface airfield. Army activities at Adak are numerous but are necessary here inasmuch as it is an advanced base and still subject to enemy surveillance. The Northwest Sea Frontier is in the able hands of Admiral Frank J. Fletcher, whose reputation as a hard, practical fighting man has long been established in the Navy. He is an inspiration to the drab life of the men on the "chain," and since the beginning of the Paramushiro bombing both by air and by sea he has the morale of the men in excellent shape. In other words, after 2 years of intense hardships and tedious, almost unbearable living conditions, the men now feel that they are a definite part of the offensive war against Japan. Typical of this spirit is the little military radio station on Adak, which begins is radio day by announcing, "This is station on the northern highway to victory."

Ship service in this advanced base is well stocked. There is a shortage of liquor and beer due, I am told, to transportation problems. The officers' clubs are only open as a consequence approximately 2 hours a day. This should be corrected. The logistic problem in supplying this area is tremendous, although surely living conditions and the type of area involved should give these Aleutian bases every priority.

Both Navy and Army are building good sound dockage in Adak Bay.

Hospital facilities at Adak and on the chain are ample. The only women on the entire chain are the nurses assigned to the hospitals. The usual set-up is quonset Pacific huts and the doctors in charge appear well satisfied. The flow of medical supplies was always adequate. Four hundred major operations have been performed on Adak alone in the past year.

The Army and Navy appear to be working in complete unison. The Army being snowed in at the time, bulldozers were making progress to open their roads. The importance of this equipment in Alaska might be illustrated by the remark of one Seabee working on a closed road, "If it weren't for these damn 'cats' there wouldn't be any way in the Aleutians."

Constant conferences go on between Army and Navy commands at all times both on strategy and internal matters. The only friction I found between Army and Navy on the whole trip existed over locations in which to establish facilities. If the Navy had taken one portion of the island and the Army had a position not as valuable, or vice versa, there was always some conflict by virtue of the fact that one of the services would want to move in. This was true for instance on Adak, where the Navy had established a radio range and the Army seemed to think there was no place else available for an ammunition dump. The reverse was true at Attu. These things, however, are very minor matters compared to much of the confusion that existed in the earlier part of the war in the area, and in every case the officers in charge of the matters involved sat around a table and worked them out without trouble. A lot of this results too from the fact that where there is only so much land available a scramble exists. However, any present lack of unison is negligible and never goes beyond the conference stage.

Mail facilities to the men are normal; however, a revamping of N. A. T. S. service providing direct contact from Adak with Anchorage with shuttle service to the southward through Kodiak, Cold Bay, and Dutch Harbor would provide better facilities through to most of the men. I have had conferences since my return upon this proposal and such service is being worked out. Admiral Whiting has some good ideas on this.

The constant complaint along the whole chain and in the Alaskan area was the feeling with many of the men who had been stuck there for many months that surely something should be effected to effect transfers and reliefs. It is agreed that the type of service in the area justifies a better turn-over of replacements. Although the Navy normally attempts to effect relief in most areas after 18 months, as a general practice, the hardships of the Aleutian service would seem to justify a maximum of no more than 12 months. Relief should then be effected, transportation permitting.

Recreation-wise, keen disappointment was expressed in many instances by the men over the type of U. S. O. shows given them. Very few have showed up and those haven't been up to the standard or anticipation of the men. Whether or not advanced reports regarding U. S. O. shows are too optimistic or whether the type of show being sent to the Aleutians is not up to standard should be investigated. Because of transportation difficulties, the best type of U. S. O. for this area would seem to be individual artists and stars that could be transported with minimum space.

I proceeded after 3 days to Attu with an excellent break in the weather giving us opportunity to make complete air pictures of the excellent chain of air fields and bases between Adak and Attu. Reconnaissance was made of Kiska and Amchitka. These fields are on comparatively flat islands with long runways and the only problem existent is the supply difficulties.

Since the removal of the Japanese from Attu, both the Navy and the Army have made tremendous strides in the development of the base. The Navy has an excellent air field, with adequate strips for landing of the type of aircraft now used in the area. It is hoped that further development of the Navy field will be such to allow the Army to participate in joint use. The weather on Attu is the most changeable of all islands on the Aleutians.

Attu will be the post-war spring board for American air routes to the entire Orient. The expenditure of money on any field here will have recurrent value for the commercial and military for many years to come.

Attu has a fair harbor. Docks exist to handle cargo ships and the base has potentialities. The men stationed there live a similar life to those on the chain, although the weather is a bit more rugged. Inasmuch as it is the most advanced and newest base in the area many things are needed. For instance, the few nurses on the island at the naval hospital were completely without adequate furniture. This was being sent to them from Sitka. Gymnasium facilities were not adequate.

These men participate on these long flights, and facilities for their personal care at the end of the flight should be constantly watched. For example, the group itself had no gymnasium equipment at their section base. I made a personal note of this and reported same to the Seattle area and was advised that they would immediately send out proper equipment. The cost of the same is minute as compared to keeping a valuable flier in physical condition.

An acute shortage of lumber existed, so much so that a great deal of unauthorized appropriating was going on between divisions for any type of lumber they could lay their hands on. Much difficulty existed through the entire chain in trying to get finished lumber. This condition was also reported.

At the Attu field they had recently installed Barto lamps. All aviators and officers were high in their praise of their value.

The Japanese base on the northern side of the island has already been abandoned as being not as feasible as the present location of our base. They again picked a mediocre area.

I spent 4 days on Attu and had opportunity to talk to a great number of men and officers and fliers. The morale of the men was pretty much keyed up at the time.

The return trip was made through to Adak and then by smaller plane from Adak to Dutch Harbor where we encountered the most favorable weather but finally made the Dutch Harbor airport.

At Dutch Harbor I found great development since my last visit, and here again is a base which is making itself shipshape with no enlargement contemplated. There appeared to be many more Army men stationed there than needed, including infantry.

The airfield at Dutch Harbor is not as we would all like, but topographical conditions are such to make it almost impossible for any enlargement of the same.

The submarine base at Dutch Harbor has proven to be very valuable. Storage and supplies at Dutch Harbor were found to be good, and task forces or military movements based to the westward will find facilities ample and efficiently administered. Captain Lanny Conn is commandant. The submarine-repair facilities at Dutch Harbor should be zealously kept up. As the war moves westward, Dutch Harbor, like Kodiak and Sitka, can stand a reduction of personnel.

After weather delay in Dutch Harbor I proceeded again to Kodiak and then across the Gulf of Alaska to Annette Island. The weather did not allow the Navy plane to proceed further south, so through the courtesy of the Army I hitchhiked on an Army transport to Seattle.

Respectfully submitted.

WARREN G. MAGNUSON.

SPECIFIC RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Personnel should immediately check on shortage of cooks for bases west of Dutch Harbor. Common complaint, cooks not available.

2. Supplies and Accounts should make immediate check of continuing shortage of drag lines in area.

3. Much of the equipment, particularly for construction work not fully utilized because of lack of spare parts. Trucks, bulldozers, and like shipped to area in good shape but not sufficient spare parts accompanying.

4. Question of finished lumber supply important. Most lumber coming up is 12 by 12, and no tongue-and-groove lumber for necessary minimum housing. Lumber situation causing many hardships. For example, no lumber available at Attu for sentry houses.

5. All outside recreation such as U. S. O. shows sent to the area should be sent to westward first and work back to the chain, otherwise many of them never get out to advanced bases.

6. Adequate supply of beverages, hard and soft, is too spasmodic. Type of life should give this area priority.

7. Steps should be taken to attempt to get more barges in the area.

Other general recommendations contained in body of report.

House and Senate Investigating Committees

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, recently when I stated unless the Senate and House discontinued the practice of ordering special investigations, the people would cease to look upon the Congress as the legislative branch of the Government, but would term it the department of investigations, I had in mind the many resolutions passed by both Houses.

Since that time, Mr. Speaker, I have had compiled a list of committees granted special powers in both Houses of Congress that are active today. The Senate has passed no less than 38 resolutions and the House 30 resolutions. Many other resolutions are pending in both branches of Congress for investigations.

What disturbs me most is the duplication of effort. We have committees of the House duplicating the work of the Senate, and committees of the Senate going over the same ground covered by House committees.

I am going to name some, where there is a House and Senate committee covering the same field. Some of the subjects covered are production, distribution, and consumption of food; obtaining data for appropriations committees; Indian affairs; radio; investigating war contracts, Navy, military, and merchant marine; public lands; conditions in Puerto Rico; small business; civil service; national defense programs; post-war policy and planning, both economic and military; conservation of wildlife; and petroleum, and aside from that there was a time when both the House and Senate had committees investigating airplane disasters. Then, again, there has been some duplication by Senate committees of the work of the Dies committee, such as investigating civil liberties.

How can we justify our criticism of duplication, waste, and extravagance in the executive departments when we practice what we complain of?

I concede there are times when special investigations are necessary and prove to be of great value.

Of course, it is too late now to act on this suggestion during this Congress, but I say in future an effort should be made to have an understanding with the Senate whereby joint committees could be appointed and not have one branch duplicate the work of the other. Time and again I have seen the high-ranking officials of the Army, Navy, Maritime Commission, and other war agencies before a Senate committee one day and a House committee the next day going over the same subject. These officials are charged with the responsibility of prosecuting the war and should be at their desks just as much as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I have another suggestion which might well be considered. Special committees and authority to investigate by standing committees are created by a resolution reported by the Rules Committee. Seldom does the House, in creating this authority, thoroughly discuss the question of expenses. If it does, never do I recall where a limitation was placed in the resolution. In other words, the sky is the limit if the House so desires. It is my thought when a resolution is brought in by the Rules Committee a limit of cost should be included. That would not mean the entire amount would have to be appropriated but it would serve as a warning to the Committee on Accounts, beyond that limitation you shall not go. It would also serve as a warning to the committee they must stay within that amount or return to the Rules Committee for a further authorization. As it is now the Accounts Committee feels, as an agent of the House, it is required, when the House creates a special committee to investigate, to appropriate funds. In this way, if a committee reached the limitation, the House would have a right to determine whether or not it desired the committee to continue its activities. For one, I would like an opportunity to vote on the continuance of some of our present investigating committees. There is a difference between voting to extend authority to a committee and voting funds for expenses of that committee.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the time has arrived when we should proceed with caution and not create any more investigating committees unless absolutely necessary.

Below will be found a list of House and Senate committees active at the present time, together with the amount of money appropriated for each for expenses.

W. P. B. Explains Magnesium Cut-Back in Production at D. P. C. Plant in Nevada

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that the following exchange of letters between myself and Philip D. Wilson, director of the Aluminum and Magnesium Division of the War Production Board, is of sufficient importance to include in the RECORD. It is self-explanatory, citing W. P. B.'s reasons for a recently ordered cut-back in magnesium production at the D. P. C. plant of Basic Magnesium, Inc., at Las Vegas, Nev. Following is my letter to Mr. Wilson, sent a few days after a speech by Senator PAT MCCARRAN, of Nevada, in which the Senator objected to the cut-back order:

APRIL 13, 1944.

Mr. PHILIP D. WILSON,
Director, Aluminum and Magnesium Division,
War Production Board,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WILSON: I have noted with considerable interest the remarks of Senator PAT MCCARRAN, of Nevada, made in the Senate Saturday, April 1, in regard to a proposal of the War Production Board to cut back production at the Las Vegas, Nev., plant of Basic Magnesium, Inc., a Defense Plant Corporation project.

Senator MCCARRAN charges that if there is to be a cut-back in magnesium production, it should be instituted at D. P. C. plants in Michigan, operated by Dow Magnesium Corporation, a division of Dow Chemical Co. The Senator also charges, directly and by repeated inference, that W. P. B.'s decision to make the cut-back at the Las Vegas plant was influenced by the fact that perhaps certain officials of W. P. B. were former employees of Dow and thus partial to Dow interests.

I am only interested in the actual facts of the situation, and not at all in personalities as such. Furthermore, it doesn't seem strange to me that W. P. B. may indeed have had the advice of some former Dow people, although I do not know at all that this is true. In fact, I am informed it is not true. Nevertheless, if you want to know about automobiles, you go to the automobile people, and it would be the same with magnesium.

After all, Dow was the only producer of magnesium metal in this country prior to the present war, the firm having spent thousands of dollars in experimentation over a period of 25 years, perfecting its magnesium processes at a time when the rest of the Nation's metal industries apparently didn't feel that there was much of any commercial future for this new material. If Dow knows more about making magnesium, and can make it more economically, it is because this firm learned the hard way, and kept at it the longest time.

Nevertheless the facts should be able to speak for themselves and, in view of Senator MCCARRAN'S comments, what I should like to have from your office is:

First, the complete factual background which led to the cut-back order for Basic Magnesium, Inc.;

Second, any remarks you care to make regarding Senator MCCARRAN'S charges that personalities entered into the decision.

Third, any further information you can give me that is pertinent to the case.

Most sincerely yours,

ALBERT J. ENGEL.

Following is Mr. Wilson's reply, specifically answering Senator MCCARRAN'S charges and giving the factual background which led up to the cut-back order at the Government plant in Nevada:

APRIL 17, 1944.

Hon. ALBERT J. ENGEL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ENGEL: You have asked me in your letter of April 13, 1944, to comment on the remarks of Senator PAT MCCARRAN, of Nevada, made in the Senate on April 1 concerning a proposal of the War Production Board to cut back production in the Las Vegas, Nev., plant of Basic Magnesium, Inc., a Defense Plant Corporation project. You have particularly called my attention to the Senator's charges, directly and by repeated inference, that the War Production Board's decision to make the cut-back at the Las Vegas plant was influenced by the fact that perhaps certain officials of W. P. B. were former employees of Dow and thus partial to Dow interests.

With regard to the Senator's charges, I told him prior to his making his address to the Senate that neither I nor any member of the Aluminum and Magnesium Division, or to the best of my knowledge and belief any member of the War Production Board, had ever worked for the Dow Chemical Co. or had been "members of boards of directors of present or prospective competitors of Basic Magnesium." Senator MCCARRAN also remarked that "a man who in years past has served private industry, and who now seeks to serve private industry in some capacity by reason of his place on the War Production Board, is not serving his country as he should serve it. If he were in some other countries I might mention at this time, not only would his services not be called for in the Government, but in all probability he would be stood up against a wall at sunrise." I am glad to say that in no instance have any of the men responsible for planning the programs of the Aluminum and Magnesium Division been seeking to serve private industry or been influenced by "how the particular enterprise which they served in years past can be successful against its competitors in the post-war era."

You asked for the complete factual background which led to the cut-back order for Basic Magnesium, Inc. Curtailment of the Basic Magnesium plant is part of a general program involving the complete shut-down of two other magnesium plants and the partial curtailment of three more, affecting a total of 6 of the 15 plants now producing magnesium in the United States. The Aluminum and Magnesium Division originally developed its magnesium-production program to provide adequately for the stated requirements of the armed services. The program was expedited in every way possible and we now find ourselves in the comfortable position of being able to provide not only all of the magnesium which is demanded by the war effort and essential civilian requirements but of having a productive capacity substantially in excess of those requirements. This surplus capacity situation has come about wholly through the inability of the armed services to use as much magnesium as they originally stated to us would be necessary. Production was continued without curtailment until a substantial stock pile of magnesium metal had been accumulated and the decision to cut-back production was reached only when it became obvious that the ever-growing surplus was becoming unnecessarily large. The policy of the War Production Board does not permit the continued expenditure of labor and materials in continuing production of any commodity beyond the point where it can be considered essential to the successful prosecution of the war.

The individual plants which were selected for cut-back were those which in our best judgment would contribute most by their curtailment to the war effort, whether the saving might be in labor, transportation, fuel oil, coal, or other essential materials. In the case of Basic Magnesium a careful determination was made as to the labor which could be released in the Southwest where manpower is critically short, of the saving in the consumption of critically needed fuel oil in that same area which could be effected if the electric power consumed by the Basic Magnesium plant were released, of the transportation which would be saved by eliminating the movement of large tonnages of peat moss from Canada, and of the magnesite and calcined magnesia used for feed from the mines at Gabbs, Nev., 350 miles by road to the plant, and furthermore of the amount of chlorine, critically needed in the war effort, which could be released for use elsewhere if it were not consumed in the Las Vegas plant.

These investigations showed that approximately 1,500 less men would be needed at Las Vegas and 100 less men at Gabbs if operations at Basic Magnesium, Inc., were curtailed by 40 percent. It was further determined that between 120,000 and 135,000 barrels of fuel oil could be saved each month if the amount of electric power used by 40 percent of Basic Magnesium's capacity were released for transfer to California, thus making possible the closing down of certain fuel-oil consuming power units in California.

Changes in the Las Vegas plant which are now being made will result in the elimination of Canadian peat moss from the process to the extent of 50 to 60 percent of its total capacity. By curtailing production in the amount of 40 percent the elimination of most if not all of the peat moss used in the operation will result, thus making unnecessary the transportation of some 1,200 tons per month of peat moss from Vancouver Island in British Columbia to Nevada. The proposed curtailment also will make it unnecessary to move about 5,700 tons of magnesite and calcined magnesia per month, 350 miles by motortruck from Gabbs to Las Vegas. The additional chlorine which will be made available under this program for the requirements of the Chemical Warfare Service will amount to approximately 1,400 tons per month.

As regards the labor situation, we have been advised by the W. M. C. that the 1,600 men who might be released in Nevada could be used most effectively in group 1 labor areas of Los Angeles, San Francisco, and other centers of labor shortage. They further state that the proposed curtailment would relieve the heavy drain on the labor market in that area caused by the continued recruitment of replacement labor for the Basic plant.

As regards the saving of fuel oil, a survey by the Office of War Utilities indicated that 135,000 barrels of fuel oil per month could be saved continuously through 1944 and 1945. This was confirmed by the Director of the Division of Power of the United States Department of the Interior in a letter, dated March 24, 1944, which he addressed to Senator McCARRAN, in which he stated that the energy released by a 40-percent reduction in production at Basic Magnesium could be used to replace oil-fired steam generation in California throughout 1944. His letter stated that this would result in an oil saving of some 1,400,000 to 1,600,000 barrels, or an average ranging between 3,800 barrels and 4,400 barrels per day over a 12-month period. He further stated that the average daily demand for fuel oil in the Pacific coast area is approximately 540,000 barrels and that the average daily production is 420,000 barrels, indicating a daily deficit of 120,000 barrels.

A careful comparison was made of the savings which would result from a curtailment of 40 percent in the production of Basic Magnesium, Inc., and from the curtailment of 50 percent of the production of the Marysville, Mich., plant owned by the Defense Plant Corporation and operated for D. P. C. by the Dow Magnesium Corporation. The labor which would be saved by such a cut-back at Marysville and at the Ludington, Mich., feed plant would amount to approximately 400 men in a group II area. Approximately 19,500 tons of coal coming from Kentucky and West Virginia would be saved monthly by such a curtailment. The transportation of 7,800 tons of magnesium chloride feed per month from Ludington, Mich., 250 miles by rail to Marysville, Mich., would be eliminated. The over-all cost of the magnesium produced at the Marysville plant is approximately 2 cents per pound less than the cost of magnesium of equivalent quality produced at Basic Magnesium, Inc. Taking into consideration all of the factors involved, it appeared to us obvious that a greater saving for the war effort could be accomplished by a reduction at Basic Magnesium than at Marysville, Mich. No consideration whatsoever was given to the post-war competitive position of either plant. As a matter of fact both of them are entirely owned by Defense Plant Corporation.

As regards post-war competition, however, the wholly owned plants of the Dow Chemical Co., which before the war was the sole producer of magnesium in the United States, have a combined capacity of 36,000,000 pounds of magnesium per year. The rated capacity of Basic Magnesium is 112,000,000 pounds per year and if operated at 60 percent of this capacity, Basic would produce 67,200,000 pounds per year. This rate is nearly twice the combined productive capacity of the privately owned plants of the Dow Chemical Co. It is true that the Dow organization through Dow Magnesium Corporation is operating for the Government other plants with a combined capacity of 162,000,000 pounds per year. These plants are, however, owned outright by the Government and unless the Government should be willing to sell them to the Dow Chemical Co. after the war that company would be left with a very minor part in the whole magnesium picture. It would seem that Basic Manesium, Inc., operating at a rate of more than 67,000,000 pounds per year and with a potential capacity of 112,000,000 pounds per year, should be able to compete effectively against the Dow Chemical Co. with a capacity of 36,000,000 pounds per year.

Senator McCARRAN has emphasized the fact that what is known as the Vernon plant, an aluminum plant in southern California, should be closed down with the release of some 3,000 men in the critical Los Angeles labor area instead of curtailing Basic Magnesium. Senator McCARRAN is not fully informed regarding the facts of this case, since the aluminum ingot plant to which he obviously refers is located at Torrance, Calif., and employs about 600 men. The plant at Vernon which employs a very much larger number of men is an aluminum fabricating plant that produces aluminum forgings, castings, extruded shapes, tubing, and other fabricated products used almost entirely by the aircraft plants in that immediate section of the country. Even if it were practicable to close down both the Torrance and the Vernon plant, it would be highly uneconomic to ship the fabricated material from far-distant plants to the aircraft plants in southern California which use it. However, the over-all situation in aluminum ingot and fabricated products will not permit of any curtailment of the activities at either Torrance or Vernon.

I trust that this letter will answer your questions satisfactorily. Please do not hesitate to call upon me if you would like any further information in this connection.

Very truly yours,

PHILIP D. WILSON,
Director Aluminum-Magnesium Division.

I believe any fair-minded person reading Mr. Wilson's letter, will agree that it constitutes a sound and comprehensive reply to Senator McCARRAN's charges.

Maintenance of a Lasting Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVE E. SATTERFIELD, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, as the struggle between the Allies and Germany reaches a climax it is apparent that the United States cannot remain aloof from the new world order that is in the making. Regardless of how the war might turn out, the world as we knew it in 1939 has vanished. The realization is upon us that whatever we attempt to accomplish in the way of a lasting peace will be met with failure if the basis of our effort in that direction is limited to platitudes about international cooperation or the restoration of the status quo. If the concerted action of the Allies is to be rewarded this time they will have to demonstrate now and from here on that they are resolved to preserve three essentials of democracy: The first, respect for the integrity of the individual; the second, government responsibility to the people; and the third is, the adoption of some international organization of representatives of Russia, Great Britain, China, and the United States, the purpose of which will be to maintain by force, if necessary, the peace of the world.

The League of Nations provides a background of rich experience for future international organization. Such an organization should be given compulsory jurisdiction in the settlement of disputes, It should have at its disposal an international police force, preferably an air force, and it should be provided with effective machinery for economic cooperation. To succeed, it will require in a much larger measure a willingness on our part to greater sacrifices of national sovereignty, and much more international planning and control over armaments than has hitherto been developed.

There is a growing demand for a planned international order, certainly so far as such a system will serve to prolong peace. Americans of whatever political persuasion will endorse such a plan, but to develop a planned international order for this purpose there is no way under the sun to do it except by giving authority to governments. We must codify a system of world law, and in no other way can a world code be fashioned. Our people hesitate to make such a commitment because deeply ingrained within them is the fear of depotism. This is the crux of the whole matter. This fear is the background out of which Democrats and Republicans alike pluck their varied contentions. It is the lute upon which a colossal discord is played. This conflict between the desire for international order and the desire for freedom creates the dilemma of democracy. We cannot have our cake and eat it, too. This dilemma must be solved if we are going to achieve a new democratic order in our international relationships.

There are unmistakable signs that the Republican and Democratic Parties are getting ready for the orchestration. The coming national election sets the stage and guarantees packed houses for the innumerable maestros who, all over the country, will be conducting violently amid great sound and fury. For example, last week the chairman of the Republican National Committee was encouraging his party by predicting a wholesale desertion of the Democratic Party in November by foreign-born voters in protest against some of the administration's wartime policies which were not in harmony with the interests of their former countries. Members of the Democratic Party will no doubt publicly proclaim the momentary advantage, at least, of other racial groups who are thinking solely of the interests of their native countries. Polish-American people are bitterly resentful against Russia for its aggressive plans against Poland; Italians in crowded cities of America are complaining because for the moment in Italy we have recognized a Fascist leader and the King; Jews are not quite happy because of the British white paper, and the military situation which affects the Zionist movement in Palestine, and some Irish citizens are unhappy because the administration is in accord with the British in their demands on Eire. These are only a few of the antagonistic elements in the country.

So, will begin this unmusical rendition. The country heard it played in 1919. There will be the usual variations. It will be rendered in every key and octave depending upon how it harmonizes in different sections of the country. It will rumble in some quarters with dislike for the British. Its high notes will introduce the new social order. It will register the controversy on trade agreements and economic reconstruction. It will depict all differences and shades of opinion. The concert will be interrupted only long enough to count the votes, and then it will continue to play, but this time the performance will in all likelihood be transferred to the floor of the United States Senate.

The score will have been written. It will have been tried out in the countryside, in every buggytown and great city in the country. As a musical hit it will be a dismal failure. Its utter lack of harmony will kill its sales here at home and we could not give it away to our erstwhile allies.

We have known all along that there were bound to be differences of opinion between Russia, Great Britain, and ourselves, when we got around to forming some sort of international order. To surmount that difficulty is enough, but with the knowledge of our failure in President Wilson's time to effect a lasting peace, it is unbelievable that we shall be so stupid this time.

Secretary of State Cordell Hull in June of 1938 made this statement:

> The most important problem now confronting the human race is that of establishing throughout the world, as the foundation of further progress, an unshakable regime of order under law.

The foregoing is a principle to which everyone will subscribe. Munich and all subsequent events in Europe have demonstrated that if civilization is to progress we must have order under law. How can we expect Secretary Hull to hope to successfully advocate this principle without unity of thought and purpose on the part of the people of this country? How can we reasonably expect a just and enduring peace unless every citizen not only subscribes to this principle but is prepared and determined to unselfishly lay aside every consideration which could impede us in our quest for a lasting peace. If representatives of the United States at the peace table are going to demand an unshakable regime of order under law we shall have slight chance of success in achieving so desirable an end unless we Americans have given unassailable proof to the world that we are willing to implement such a move. To do this calls for unprecedented action. We cannot hope to avoid the same fate which befell the League of Nations unless as peacemakers we carry to the peace table the positive and unquestioned backing of both the Democratic and Republican Parties on questions of foreign policy. Peacemakers cannot begin to function unless there is unanimity and accord among those whom they represent.

In January of 1918, with U-boats sinking tons of Allied shipping each month and when the Germans were bringing up their big guns to shell Paris, President Wilson announced his 14 points. Twenty-six years later with the Germans holding their own in Italy, the invasion of the Continent not yet begun, Secretary of State Hull announces his 17 points of American policy. There is universal agreement on the points enunciated by the Secretary of State. There is universal complaint because no plan is set forth by which these laudable points may be obtained. Simply winning the war in Europe will not achieve them. We learned that when we were victorious in World War No. 1. Everywhere Mr. Hull's call for international organization backed by force has met with warm approval.

As never before the people of our country wish to avoid the old days of international anarchy. If American opinion is not to recoil after the war from the realities of international politics and once more attempt to escape in isolationism, we have got to begin now to follow a course of unity of thought and action. If we are to convince the representatives of other Allied countries at the peace table that we are in earnest we have got to present a solid front on foreign policy. If we are going to put the breath of reality into Mr. Hull's 17 points, we must adjourn politics at the point where the waters of the Atlantic lave our beaches. Peacemaking is team work and unless we can coordinate the play of our own team we can scarcely hope to play well in the international matches.

The first step in this direction has already been taken by Mr. Hull. He has requested the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to designate a subcommittee to consult with the Department of State on problems connected with the establishment of an international peace organization. A like committee will be appointed in the House, and these committees will be of great value in carrying the congressional viewpoint into the task of working out a peace policy. This is not enough. The Congress, and particularly the Senate, should be a sounding board from which the will of the people in this matter should be projected. There will be little to project if in the coming campaign prejudice in its myriad forms, ambition, avarice, personal animosity, and party opposition, are played upon.

There are in the country today some militant groups creating an interest in and appreciation for the necessity of a just and lasting peace. If in time they are joined by a sufficient number of equally determined people we cannot lose the peace, and we could witness the Republican and the Democratic Parties whose conventions are soon to be held and whose platforms are yet to be completed, each adopting a similar foreign-policy plank, the effect of which would do much to silence the increasing din of political debate concerning the establishment of an international peace organization. The leaders know that the majority of Americans everywhere are determined that the conflicting contentions of the romantic, the designing, and the far-seeing and sincere politicos shall not result in throwing them to the wolves of isolation again. There is danger that this majority may well become a minority or its voice may not even be heard if we jam the radio and fill the columns of our newspapers with heated controversy on this subject. We must seek unity of thought, not division, for if we are divided here at home, we certainly will not be able to safeguard the peace.

The leaders of the major political parties need only to hear the voices of their masters, and if the people will speak they could by convention time envision the Democratic and Republican Parties vacating a field of impassioned and irresponsible debate to listen intently and with respect, both ears to the ground. If the voice of the people is strong and insistent, a political millennium is not impossible. Americans know that thus far our foreign-policy commitments, when made, have never had the virtue of permanency. God speed the day when political parties and citizens at long last recognize the fact that if we are to achieve in post-war international planning we shall be compelled to declare a moratorium on partisanship. This is our testing time.

St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit to the House resolutions adopted by the St. Lawrence County Board of Supervisors, the Northern Federation of Chambers of Commerce, and the West Parishville Grange 542, Potsdam, N. Y., urging the passage of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project bill, of which I am a strong advocate:

Whereas the American portion of the international section of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project lies wholly within the bounds of the county of St. Lawrence, in the State of New York; and

Whereas our St. Lawrence County people have constantly before them the magnificent spectacle of the mighty St. Lawrence rushing past them to the sea, unharnessed and mostly unused, a tragic spectacle of waste during this period of needed conservation of our natural resources and their best adaptation to the uses and needs of us all; and

Whereas it has been with much satisfaction that we have learned of the unanimous adoption—March 15–16, 1944—by our New York State Legislature of the concurrent resolution favoring prompt development of the St. Lawrence River power resources; and

Whereas all the people of the county of St. Lawrence are first, last, and always for the development of the St. Lawrence River at the first opportune time, which time we believe to be in the coming years of post-war reconstruction; and

Whereas the Aiken bill—United States Senate No. 1385—authorizes such development at such time: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Board of Supervisors of St. Lawrence County urges the passage of the Aiken bill (S. 1385) and respectfully petitions the chairman and members of the Commerce Committee's subcommittee now having it in charge to take prompt and favorable action thereon; and further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Senators John H. Overton, George L. Radcliffe, James M. Mead, Arthur H. Vandenberg, and Harold H. Burton, chairman and members of the subcommittee of the Commerce Committee, also to Senator Robert F. Wagner, Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, Congressman Clarence E. Kilburn, and to Senator George D. Aiken, sponsor of the bill.

Whereas the Northern Federation of Chambers of Commerce and its membership are vitally interested in the development of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project; and

Whereas the development of the St. Lawrence River will remove the last major obstacles to deep-draft navigation throughout the Great Lakes system to the Atlantic Ocean and the ports of the world; and

Whereas the same development will simultaneously make available 1,100,000 horsepower of low-cost hydroelectricity under a self-liquidating State power project; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of New York on March 15–16, 1944, by unanimous vote adopted a resolution declaring that this State urgently requires the prompt development of the St. Lawrence to furnish low-cost power to millions of industrial, rural, commercial, and domestic consumers; and

Whereas the Aiken bill, S. 1385, is now pending before the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, under which those benefits may be realized without further delay: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Northern Federation of Chambers of Commerce of the State of New York, representing a score of separate communities and civic and trade organizations throughout the St. Lawrence Valley, declares its unqualified support of this project as an imperative necessity for post-war reconstruction in this area and for the future balanced growth and development of the entire Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That we appeal for the immediate enactment of the Aiken bill, S. 1385, authorizing the St. Lawrence seaway and power development as a post-war project and strongly urge the United States Senators and Representatives of the State of New York and the Congress of the United States to give this measure their active support.

Resolved, That West Parishville Grange 542, Potsdam, N. Y., at a meeting April 11, 1944, are in favor of the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway and that a copy of this resolution be sent to Congressman CLARENCE KILBURN and Mr. John C. Tulloch, secretary of chamber of commerce, Ogdensburg, N. Y.

Bypassing Our Isolationists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Charles A. Merrill, from the Boston Sunday Globe of April 16, 1944:

Sufficient time has now elapsed since Wendell Willkie kicked his own hat out of the ring to view this political event in the right perspective. It is perhaps true that Willkie did not help his chances by throwing his weight around in a rather spectacular manner. It may well be that the electorate, after 12 years of dynamic leadership, is inclined to shy away from an aggressive personality. Certainly, the whole Willkie campaign was in the hands of amateurs. But whatever the explanation may be, it surely cannot be assumed that, because a limited number of voters of one party in the traditionally isolationist State of Wisconsin were reported against Willkie, the American people are prepared to support isolationism after this war, and to repeat the tragic experience of a quarter-century ago.

It is certain that many thousands of Republican and independent voters were disappointed when Willkie conceded defeat. They saw in the Willkie candidacy a chance for continuity in our foreign policy, without committing the country to the fourth-term precedent. It is almost inconceivable that the people will place in the White House any man who will not pledge himself to work for collective security.

SECRETARY HULL'S REASSURANCE

It is highly improbable that any candidate for President is going to have to worry about the America Firsters. The present administration has been vulnerable, not because its foreign policy has been too bold, but because it has been too timid. Fortunately, Secretary of State Hull has now made it clear that our Government has no intention of appeasing neutral nations which play ball with the Axis, that it stands foursquare for a post-war policy of international collaboration, and that the French Committee of National Liberation is to be given a chance to set up a civil government in France after the Nazis are driven out.

During the past week, while our Air Forces have really been turning the heat on nazidom from the air in advance of invasion, our foreign policy has stiffened and clarified. Warning to Sweden on exports to Germany followed protest to Turkey on chrome shipments to the Reich and a word of caution to Spain about her reported plan to seize Allied oil stocks in Morocco. The word from London is that plans for setting De Gaulle's committee up in liberated France, with no Allied military control in any territory where military operations have ceased, are virtually completed. Here is a good omen, signifying the confidence of our side that it is going places.

Best of all, Mr. Hull has invited the United States Senate, which shares the treaty-making power with the executive branch of the Government, to appoint a bipartisan group of its members to consult with the State Department in planning the peace, and has signified the intention of asking the lower branch of Congress to sit in on these discussions.

This is a good start. Nothing could better demonstrate the effectiveness of our democracy than bipartisan agreement in the coming election campaign on foreign policy, giving assurance to our allies that America knows it is fighting for a constructive purpose, that continuity is in the cards. If Mr. Hull's gesture is accepted by the opposition, the prospects of an enduring peace will be advanced.

It is impossible to improve upon Mr. Hull's own statement of the case. "Once before in our lifetime," he said, "we fell into disunity and became ineffective in world affairs by reason of it. Should this happen again it will be a tragedy to you and to your children and to the world for generations."

Trial and error—this is the way democracy learns its lessons and profits by them.

OUR FATAL MISTAKE

Now is the time to reflect on the magnitude of our failure 25 years ago, and to be conscious of how and why we failed. Doing so points up the great opportunity which is ours today. Indeed, it is clear that the circumstances are much more propitious at the present time than they were then.

We must make allowance for the fact that, when he undertook to negotiate peace terms, President Wilson was a sick man. Regardless of that, viewing the matter impersonally, we are now able to detect certain mistakes that were made.

Then, as now, we had given allegiance to a set of lofty but vague principles—Wilson's Fourteen Points, the Atlantic Charter. How alike they seem—"Open covenants openly arrived at"; "Freedom of navigation"; "Removal * * * of all economic barriers"; "An independent Polish state" * * * "No aggrandizement, territorial or otherwise"; "No territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people"; "Fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field"; "Abandonment of the use of force."

According to Mr. Mark Sullivan, one of Wilson's great weaknesses was inherent in his career, in his training. "He dealt with ideas," "handed down principles," and refused "to discuss details until the principle was agreed to." The same weakness could afflict our foreign policy today. As a matter of fact, in some of its clauses, Wilson's Fourteen Points were much less vague than the Atlantic Charter. This is why Mr. Hull's specific statements, especially with reference to France, are important. We must this time, in advance of the peace, set forth definite plans for organizing it.

The really fatal mistake 25 years ago was permitting our foreign policy to become a bipartisan issue. President Wilson asked for a Democratic Congress. This was asserted to be a challenge to the patriotism of many thousands of Republicans. Moreover, when as a result of mistake No. 1 the Republican party became the majority party in the Senate, Wilson committed error No. 2, ignoring this party and appointing a delegation to accompany him to Paris composed entirely of Democrats, with the exception of one man who was not prominently identified with the Republican party.

UNITED WE STAND

Mr. Hull, by inviting the Senate to appoint a bipartisan committee to confer with the Department of State, gives notice that the administration considers the future peace of the world too important to be kicked around as a party issue.

The chances for collaboration between the White House and Senate in seeking collective security are much better today than they were 25 years ago. Instead of witnessing the discouraging spectacle of more than one-third the membership of the Senate signing a round-robin resolution against the League of Nations, we have today a Senate which passes the Connally resolution with only five dissenting votes, and a House which has gone on record for the Fulbright motion by just as impressive a majority.

How amenable our allies will be to the principle that only a coalition of great powers (organized on a democratic basis with recognition of the rights of small nations) can guarantee an era of peace remains to be seen. Stalin is doubtless as hard-boiled as was Clemenceau, and Churchill's loyalty to the ideal of empire may be as obstructive as Lloyd George's political opportunism. Russian policy seems to be aiming for a vast sphere of influence in eastern Europe. The British Foreign Office, witness India, thus far reveals no liberal tendencies. But there is this to remember: Russia, for a decade and a half, has been a stanch advocate of collective security. She may not be sold on the idea of destroying Germany, but she has her own ideas about controlling German heavy industry, which means the power to make war. She is beginning to thumb her nose at Japan. As for Britain, she did not emerge from World War No. 1 the dominant power in the universe, and she will emerge still further weakened from World War No. 2. It would seem as if England and the British Commonwealth of Nations would need collective security as much as we need it.

Our job, however, is to bypass our own isolationists, and by bipartisan consent to agree not to disagree among ourselves on American foreign policy. Divided at home, we cannot hope to advance the cause of unity abroad.

We should let the whole world know in the coming election campaign that, in relation to foreign policy, united we stand.

Do We Have a Positive Foreign Policy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered on the Town Meeting of the Air program on April 13, 1944:

DO WE HAVE A POSITIVE FOREIGN POLICY?

The answer to the question under discussion tonight depends on how we interpret the term "positive foreign policy." If we mean that the Government of the United States has on occasion proclaimed certain lofty and, I think, thoroughly sound aims and principles, then unquestionably the answer is "Yes."

If, however, we mean there is evidence it has reduced the general aims to specific objectives and policies which it is actively pursuing in the same bold, resourceful, all-out way in which Admiral Nimitz, for example, is pursuing our military policy in the Pacific, then the answer of millions of thoughtful Americans is a reluctant "No" or "We hope so, but doubt it."

After Congress passed by large majorities the Fulbright and the Connally resolutions, and Secretary Hull returned with the Moscow joint declarations, hopes for a decent peace ran high. Then, when little or no follow-up was observable, and in fact relations seemed to be rapidly deteriorating, a serious let-down occurred.

It may be the doubts are in part a legacy of the 10 years before Pearl Harbor when we declared a sound policy with regard to Japan, but didn't follow the policy. We called Japan's actions by their correct name—ruthless aggression—and then we armed her so she could continue it. We supported that which we ourselves condemned.

Anxiety arises now not because most Americans don't believe in the principles and policies enunciated by our greatly respected and honored Secretary of State. Most people, I think, do believe in them; but they have been forced by what they see and read to wonder if the whole administration is united and coordinated in actually conducting our foreign relations in accord with the declared policies.

There is a growing fear that instead of gradually extending our principles of cooperative teamwork to Europe, we are taking over Europe's traditional principles and practices for America, the same short-sighted expediencies, the same diplomatic maneuverings and intrigues, the same power politics that we have always condemned so bitterly in others.

There is an uneasy belief that while we are assuming an ever-larger share of military responsibility all around the world, we are not exercising political initiative commensurate with our Nation's real strength and influence, both material and moral.

Thousands of people have talked with Americans returning from north Africa, or Italy, who are bitterly critical of what they openly call our indecision, our procrastination, our lack of direction and positiveness in exerting leadership there.

Americans also wonder why we seem so often to be at least one jump behind Russia and England. Those nations appear to know just what they want and how they intend to get it. Their leaders do not hesitate to state their war aims, in concrete, precise terms, and to promote them with vigor. Why should we hesitate to be equally forthright and energetic about ours?

Recently I heard a member of the State Department say, "Our policy is not action; it is reaction. We wait until the other government acts, and then we just react."

Almost 6 months have passed since the four powers at Moscow declared that they recognized "the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization * * * for the maintenance of international peace and security." That is a positive policy—if it is pushed. Unfortunately, we have seen almost no evidence to that effect.

Instead we read of meetings here and there to discuss post-war aviation, education, oil, monetary arrangements, and so forth. Then we hear unilateral announcements of how the Italian Navy is to be divided up. Inevitably, people wonder "Are these piecemeal dickerings to take the place of creating on a solid foundation the machinery for establishing and maintaining international peace and security?"

Whether or not such doubts are justified is beside the point. They exist, and they are dangerous. Failure by our Government to take the people into its full confidence is inevitably interpreted as meaning either that it does not have a positive foreign policy, or that if it does, it is not working at it very hard or effectively. Either of these interpretations leads to an almost fatal cynicism.

More and more people are saying, "Well, we'll go ahead and win the war all right, but the peace is already lost."

Because of the danger in such a national mood, some of us new Members of Congress recently sought opportunity to express our alarm to the Secretary of State. We have proved by our votes that we want to keep foreign policy out of domestic politics, that we want the two parties to work out together a sound, continuing national foreign policy—neither Democratic nor Republican, but American. We wanted not to oppose, but to support such a policy, if we could be sure that the whole administration is really in earnest about it.

Mr. Hull, with a candor that to me was most reassuring, described to us some of his policies and his efforts to further them. I could only wonder why they have not been talked over with the whole Nation with equal frankness and long ago.

Some of us urged him as strongly as we could to tell the same things to the people fully, freely, and frequently. It is not enough just to take a few Congressmen partially into his confidence. There are 135,000,000 Americans to be consulted. This is their war, their money, their sons, and their peace; and they will not subscribe to settlements which they have had no chance to debate with understanding.

I am glad beyond words that last Sunday, Secretary Hull did that in part, making the most comprehensive, concrete, understandable, and convincing statement to date of America's foreign policy. It was a long step in the right direction. I only wish he had gone further, or that he will in the near future, even with regard to points on which we do not yet see eye to eye with some of our allies. We are not improperly criticizing another nation's position when we declare ours. We do not need even to refer to the other nation's position. The American people are quite able to draw correct conclusions regarding the other nation's policies if they are given an opportunity to understand our own. If ours are sound, the people will approve them, and thereby greatly strengthen the hands of our Executive, whoever he may be. If they do not approve, far better for everybody to find it out now, not later.

The only possible way to meet the widespread criticism that our foreign policy consists largely of vague platitudes and generalities is first, to make sure that it does amount to more than that, and then to give the people more information about it.

It will be objected that to do so might alienate the support of some of our allies. My answer is, "Yes, it might; but not to do so is certain to alienate the support of our own people." Which support is the more essential? What will it profit us or anyone else to work out a perfect agreement in Europe and have it rejected here at home? How can anyone expect other nations to negotiate freely and frankly with our Government until they know whether its proposals have the support of the American people? And how can they discover whether its proposals have the support of the American people unless the proposals have been frankly discussed with and by the American people?

To have a positive foreign policy is not sentimental idealism, or utopianism on our part. It is stern, inescapable necessity if we ourselves would be free, prosperous, and secure. To try to stand alone in this jungle of a world is to be overwhelmed.

A positive policy does not mean we are to threaten, or to give moral lectures, or to insist that all settlements of all disputes be in accord with our views; but rather on a perfectly hard-headed basis to try to show all nations, including our own, that any gains one nation makes at the expense of others' fundamental rights will be short-lived and through building up enmities give it less rather than greater security.

It means striving to get immediate settlements of this boundary dispute or that minority problem, yes—but even more to establish international machinery by which to settle all disputes by peaceful means. Such a mechanism must (1) provide every nation the prospect of being able to get a reasonably equitable adjustment of its legitimate grievances so that it won't need to go to war; and (2) have available enough military force and enough unity of purpose to make any lawless nation know in advance that it can't win if it does go to war.

The first objective of our foreign policy must always be our security. Whatever maintains world order and peace gives us security. Therefore, it is not enough that America just be willing to collaborate with other nations if and when they want to get together to establish order and maintain peace. We must tirelessly take the lead in getting them to get together, partly because no other nation can take the initiative—no other nation has such a heritage of trust and good will throughout the world; and partly because the stakes for our own future are so high we dare not allow things to go by default.

It may be that we will fail; but at least no other course can succeed.

We are in one of the most crucial moments of history—just before the invasion of Europe. Somehow we have not yet mobilized fully the hearts of this people or achieved the unity, the self-discipline, the willingness to sacrifice, that we know down deep in us we are capable of. Perhaps it is because we have not yet found a cause big enough to justify such great sacrifices.

Surely, as never before this Nation and the world need "under God, a new birth of freedom"—fresh, challenging statements of a positive, practical, inspiring, and convincing peace policy to which all men everywhere who understand and love freedom can dedicate themselves with confident hope. Secretary Hull has made a good beginning. Let it be done again and again, expanded, amplified, and striven for by all of us until finally accomplished.

Resolution of West Frankfort Chamber of Commerce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. W. (RUNT) BISHOP

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following resolution, as adopted by the board of directors, West Frankfort Chamber of Commerce, regular monthly meeting, Monday, April 3, 1944:

Resolved, That whereas a bill, known as the Boren bill, H. R. 4184, has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative LYLE H. BOREN, of Oklahoma, for the repeal of the Land Grant Acts insofar as the railroads operating under the Land Grant Acts are required to transport a large volume of Government traffic at less than normal rates paid by other shippers; and

Whereas the rates required by the Government under the Land Grant Acts is discriminatory to other railroads, who do not come under the Land Grant Acts and the public shippers in general. The Land Grant Acts as far as railroad shipping rates are concerned should be repealed.

Whereas among the organizations of shippers, farmers, and commercial interests who have expressed their support of the repeal of the Land Grant Acts; and

Whereas the National Industrial Traffic League, the National Association of Shippers Boards, which compose it, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the American Farm Bureau Federation and others support the repeal of the Land Grant Acts; and

Whereas truck lines, short-line railroads, and labor organizations of railroads, the American Trucking Associations, the Mississippi Valley Association also support the repeal of the Land Grant Acts;

Therefore: The reason for repeal. To sum up, the land-grant rate reductions should be repealed because—

The Government has long since received full consideration for the lands granted many times over in the settlement of the continent.

Building of the Nation.

Increase in wealth and taxable resources.

Enhanced value of its own lands.

Reduction of transportation costs; be it, therefore, further

Resolved, That the Board of Directors of the West Frankfort Chamber of Commerce urge the support of the Boren bill, H. R. 4184, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to Representative BOREN, chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and each of the members urging the favorable action on H. R. 4184; and further, that a copy be sent to the Honorable SCOTT W. LUCAS and Hon. C. WAYLAND BROOKS, of the United States Senate, and a copy also be sent to the Honorable C. W. BISHOP, Representative from the Illinois Twenty-fifth District, urging the support of H. R. 4184, and that Representative BISHOP present this resolution to the House of Representatives in session for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Respectfully submitted.

LEO MCDONALD,
President.
DELTA C. LOWE,
Executive Secretary.

Religious Book Week

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I call attention to Religious Book Week which is sponsored by the National Conference of Christians and Jews. It will be celebrated this year from May 7 to 14. It is interesting to note that this week also marks the anniversary of the public burning of the books in Berlin by the Nazis that took place on May 19, 1933, and we have since seen some of the consequences of the spirit which led the "master race" to perpetrate such a crime. It is eminently fitting that in the United States we dedicate this anniversary to books with a spiritual background.

A committee of 24 clergymen, authors, and librarians have selected the titles included in the 1944 Religious Book Week list. Representatives of each of the three religions have made selections for members of their own faith and in addition a good-will list chosen by a Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish committee has also been published.

I should like to quote the introduction to the listings written by Dr. George N. Shuster, president of Hunter College in New York City, one of the outstanding Catholic layman of our time. I quote:

Last year's Religious Book Week was a great success. What I recall most about it, perhaps, is that all the volumes listed were eventually presented to Sara Delano Roosevelt House at Hunter College through the generosity of the publishers at the request of the national conference. Looking over the titles again the other day, I was struck by the fact that many have worn very well indeed. These are not books for a week or a month only. They were written out of deep conviction and strong feeling. Each of them preserves some light from one of the three religious faiths which underlie our western civilization. Yet there is nothing in any of them which will wound or insult those who do not agree with the author. In short, these are books professing positive values with courtesy and discernment.

Literature is one of the essential aids in the building of democracy. And democracy is, above all, a code of mutual respect and services. It is not a creed in its own right but is rather a commitment of the belief that the social lives of men can be regulated amicably through the law. I believe that each of the great religions can strengthen the intensity of this commitment in its followers for reasons implicit in the religions themselves. But each will, of course, do so only through emphasis upon the validity of those ethical impulses making for a better social order which it shares in common with others. That is why I am happy in the knowledge that at Sara Delano Roosevelt House, which is itself dedicated to the fostering of those impulses, we are privileged to have the custody of so many books serving the same ideal.

Letter From Constituent Suggesting Amendments in the Operation of the Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH E. TALBOT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a letter received from one of my constituents, suggesting amendments in the operation of the Price Control Act.

These suggestions are made by a man who has been in the retail business in Connecticut for many years. They are the conclusions and recommendations of one who runs up against O. P. A. every day of his business life.

I sincerely trust that the members of the Banking and Currency Committee will particularly note the contents of the letter.

The letter follows:

AMENDMENTS SUGGESTED IN THE O. P. A. ACT

APRIL 13, 1944.

Hon. JOSEPH E. TALBOT,
Representative from Connecticut,
Washington, D. C.

1. That the act should be extended for 1 year.

2. That the purposes of the act be clarified that the O. P. A. be limited solely to the prevention of speculative, unwarranted, and unreasonable increases in prices and not permit it to try to change or reform the ordinary existing methods of distribution of goods.

3. That retailers should not be held responsible for and be required to absorb increases in prices by freezes or otherwise below their historic customary and usual mark-ups on merchandise coming under price control.

4. That on all orders or changes in orders, O. P. A. be required to consult with representatives of the industries and trades affected, and that such representatives should be selected by the industries and trades themselves rather than by the O. P. A., and that when the O. P. A. arrives at a conclusion not in agreement with the recommendations of the representatives of the industries or trades affected, the O. P. A. should make a report to such committee stating fully the facts and reasons therefor.

5. That different ceiling prices for different classifications of retailers selling the same goods should be eliminated.

6. That the authority given to the O. P. A. in the original act to buy and sell commodities, which power has not been used, should be eliminated and that the O. P. A. should be confined solely to the function on control of prices as needed under the purposes of the act.

7. That whenever changes in business practices, cost practices, etc., are written into any order, the burden of proof of the need for such changes be upon the O. P. A.

8. That highest price line limitations should be definitely prohibited.

9. That price control must be simplified. At present, retailers in the variety trade alone are subject to over 1,000 price orders and amendments. It is impossible for any single store operator to keep up and make sure that he is in complete compliance on all of these orders.

10. That the O. P. A. should be required to grant or reject protests within 30 days and not be allowed to let them drift along indefinitely.

11. That provision should be made for judicial review by local Federal district courts of all price regulations, including the power to determine the validity and legality of such regulations, and to grant relief, and that the court may in its discretion rather than as at present understood by the O. P. A. to be required to issue a permanent or temporary injunction.

12. That the defendant in an O. P. A. case may plead that an order is capricious, unreasonable, or impossible, and have a judge or jury pass upon not merely the legality, but also upon whether the violations were willful.

I very strongly insist that as my elected representative in the Congress you use every possible influence you have to bring about the common sense, American way of business regulation in the O. P. A.

Yours very truly,

THE HEATON-BARNETT CO.,
W. B. BARNETT, Treasurer.

St. Lawrence Seaway-Power Project Endorsed by Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say something today about the Honorable Cordell Hull, our Secretary of State, and a distinguished member of the President's Cabinet. Mr. Hull has taken the forthright and courageous position in writing Senator BAILEY, of North Carolina, chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, that his Department favors the Aiken bill, S. 1485, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, for the St. Lawrence seaway-power project. This is a companion bill to the one I introduced in the House of Representatives, in the Seventy-seventh Congress, and reintroduced in the Seventy-eighth Congress, and known as H. R. 2280. Extensive hearings were held in the Seventy-seventh Congress, and the bill was reported out of the committee favorably by a 2-to-1 vote. Incidentally, I was and still am a member of the House Rivers and Harbors Committee which conducted the hearings in the Seventy-seventh Congress. In the Seventy-eighth Congress, no further hearings were held, because the committee desired to report out a committee bill with no controversial items, and because the subject matter had been heard previously.

The rivers and harbors bill of the House is now pending in the Senate, and Senator AIKEN is to be commended for asking for hearings on his bill, so as to incorporate it in the bill now before the committee of the Senate. His bill provides both for navigation and power development. His section is interested in power development at Massena, N. Y., and the Midwest is concerned in the navigation features of the bill. It is therefore a bill of national and not of sectional features. It ought to receive favorable action by the Senate committee.

In the report of the Secretary of State, which ought to be read by every Member of Congress, and by every American citizen, he says:

> The enactment of this bill would now provide the authorizations for undertakings which would make an important contribution to the post-war period in providing for the expansion of water-power development, and for greater efficiency in transportation.

I think it well to quote in full his report to the Senate Commerce Committee. He says:

> The bill would approve the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence agreement between the United States and Canada signed at Ottawa on March 19, 1941, providing for the construction of dams and powerhouses in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River and the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway. The bill would authorize the President to fulfill the undertakings made in that agreement on behalf of the United States. The construction would be undertaken under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers. The bill would provide for an agreement between the Federal Government and the power authority of the State of New York for the transfer to the State of the power facilities and the right to use the United States share of the waters at the project for hydroelectric purposes, such arrangement not to become effective until approved by the Congress.
> I suggest that S. 1385 be amended to authorize construction as a post-war rather than as a wartime project. This could be done by deleting the word "immediately" in line 12, page 2 of the bill, as well as the phrase "and shall be diligently prosecuted with a view to making essential facilities of said project available for national defense uses at the earliest possible moment" in lines 16 to 19 on the same page. Consideration might well be given to the desirability of describing the terms of the arrangement with the power authority of New York by means of a formula rather than the statement of a particular amount.
> Subject to the foregoing suggestions, I recommend the enactment of S. 1385. I believe that it would be desirable to assure the availability of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and power project for early post-war construction. The enactment of this bill now would provide the authorization for undertakings which would make an important contribution to the post-war period in providing for the expansion of water-power development and for greater efficiency in transportation, as well as in providing employment on useful and essential public works during the period immediately following the war.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and power project has been supported by leaders in the United States for many years without regard to political affiliation. It is my earnest hope that Senator Aiken's bill authorizing this great project will be enacted into law.

I concur in the recommendations made by Secretary Hull. This bill ought to be enacted into law, and I shall do everything I can to that end. Secretary Hull properly ignores the opposition which testified for months before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives, and urged that this ought to be a treaty, ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, rather than by a majority vote of the House and Senate on the pending legislation. The able and alert Adolf Berle, representing the State Department, before the House Committee, demonstrated clearly in his testimony, that the treaty method was not necessary, and that the adoption of legislation by both the House and Senate was proper and legal. The opponents of this measure, who are powerful and numerous, want the Senate treaty method followed, because it requires a two-thirds vote of the Senate, rather than a majority vote on bills of the character now pending. Their only object in the present objection to the present bill is the hope that there will not be a two-thirds majority in the Senate, instead of a majority as provided in Senator AIKEN'S bill. No one should be misled by this false propaganda. Mr. Berle in his testimony in the House committee in the Seventy-seventh Congress demonstrated the correctness of the procedure in the Aiken bill. Don't be misled by the powerful lobby opposed to this bill.

Then, there is the matter of supporting legislation that is of benefit to America, rather than to a particular section of the United States. As a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, I supported that bill, of vital importance to the West and the South, but not of direct benefit to my section of the United States. But the projects were worthy and had the investigation and benefit of the favorable recommendation of the Army engineers of the War Department. That is one of the most efficient bureaus in our Government. So, I have supported the Army engineers' recommendations because they know more than I do about these problems. General Robins of the Army engineers wholeheartedly indorsed the St. Lawrence seaway power project. It ought to receive the endorsement of Congress now.

Back From Hell

REMARKS

OF

HON. LA VERN R. DILWEG

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. DILWEG. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last, Richard I. Bong, a 23-year-old Wisconsin-born pilot, was promoted from captain to major for outstanding service to his country. All the world hails this young hero as America's No. 1 ace, for on that day he shot down his twenty-seventh enemy plane and became the top combat fighter pilot in America's history. Wisconsin is proud of Dick's outstanding performance.

The same courage and dogged determination displayed by Captain Bong, now Major Bong, in achieving his enviable record brought Corp. Irvin Sheedy, of Green Bay, Wis., back from hell on Buna, New Guinea. On the night of December 8, 1942, a Jap grenade exploded between his legs, hurled him into the air, breaking both of his legs below the knees, chewing up his arms with shrapnel and peppering smaller fragments into his chest and eyes. Later, at a Port Moresby hospital, surgeons shook their heads as they went to work. Sheedy had a compound fracture and shattered ankle in his right leg, and the muscles and nerves in both legs were greatly torn. The grenade had shattered the nerves and muscles in his left forearm. There was a bullet wound back of his ear, and 57 shrapnel wounds on his face and body. He got malaria in the hospital in Australia. From Port Moresby he was brought to Staten Island, N. Y., then to Walter Reed Hospital here, and finally to Forest Glen, Md., the convalescent annex to Walter Reed. Today, this Irish infantryman is as good as new. I consider it a privilege to extol these American heroes from the well of this House.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article appearing in the American Herald on March 27, 1944, which describes in detail the grim tale of this night of hell on December 8, 1942:

BACK FROM HELL

(By Burris Jenkins, Jr.)

JAPS COULDN'T STOP AN IRISH INFANTRYMAN

They were all dead.

The whole detail was dead. * * *

Lying there in the thick dark, with both legs broken and shrapnel all through him—even in his eyes—Corporal Sheedy is sure his 15 men must be dead and he is long past the point of being afraid of even caring what happens to himself.

He can hear Japs moving in the dark around him, although he can't see much from where the grenade has blown him into the heavy undergrowth, but he can hear the Japs grunt and squeal like wild pigs as they plunge bayonets into bodies of his men.

Actually, only 11 of those men are already dead. Five, like himself, still breathe.

Of these, one cries out a little as a bayonet goes into his back. The Jap stabs him seven times more. Miraculously, this man still lives. Another, stabbed twice, makes no outcry and the Japs leave him for dead. He, too, is alive today.

Feet tread on him

More than once stealthy footsteps approach Sheedy and feet tread on his arm, half-covered under the broad leaves of jungle foliage, but Sheedy doesn't move and the Japs go away without as yet discovering him.

From the sounds, he knows they are going through the packs and clothes of the dead men. And then they sit down a few feet away to open and eat the captured United States rations. He can hear their slimy mouths smack over the food and the sound and smell of them are sickening.

Prayers die half-uttered on his tongue now as consciousness comes and goes in waves, like a recurring dream.

Time was, in the heat of early combat, when prayers and curses mixed heedlessly in his mouth, but that was long ago, when he still knew what it was to feel fear—42 days ago, to be exact—and when Irvin Sheedy, of Green Bay, Wis., carried 197 pounds of fighting Irish blood into Oro Bay on New Guinea with an infantry regiment of the Thirty-second Division.

That was a time when they foolishly expected the little brown men to be push-overs for a 'handful of Americans. Corporal Sheedy, himself, led part of the attack during the first 3 days until they struck overpowering Jap resistance at Point Inundara.

Hit for first time

From then on it's blood and heat and hog wallows, sweat and dysentery and scarce food and no sleep and limited water, until Sheedy's 197 pounds dwindle to 140 and below. * * *

And then he gets hit the first time. * * *

It doesn't amount to much—just a bullet grazing his back on Christmas Day, the day they took the Buna airport, and Sheedy and a bunch of his men are behind a little knoll near the swamp beyond which what's left of his infantry regiment is closing in on the triangle of Buna Mission.

A machine gun opens up and Sheedy feels something hit him in the back, but he doesn't know that it's a bullet until the man near him sees the bullet tear through the shirt between Sheedy's shoulders and splash the mud between his feet.

"You're hit!" the man tells him.

Dash for shell hole

Sheedy feels no pain, but decides it's a good time to withdraw to safer territory. He and his squad dash for a shell hole and lay up for the night. It is already getting dark. They establish a line and Sheedy decides his wound can't be serious enough to bother with.

Advancing again in the morning, two enemy pillboxes, armed with 4-inch AA guns, hold them up for awhile. Supported by a platoon of Australians attacking from the left, it takes until 4 p. m. to knock out the pillboxes. That was December 26.

On the 27th, Sheedy's second lieutenant commanding officer assigns him a detail to search and bury the dead Japs behind them, and afterward he moves on up with the others without encountering much opposition.

He hears the Japs

On the morning of the 28th the opposition stiffens, and with part of his company and part of another, Sheedy's outfit succeeds in cutting off about 60 Japs, but some of these get away.

That night Corporal Sheedy is placed in charge of an advance outpost of 15 men.

The evening remains hot and quiet until 9 o'clock. Sheedy has just changed guards and is walking back from the field telephone to where his men are spread out in foxholes in the dark ahead of him when off in the jungle to his left he hears the squealing and jabbering of the Japs who had escaped them, preparing an attack.

Sheedy empties one clip of 20 rounds from his tommygun at the invisible enemy, mostly with the intention of arousing his men to the danger. His warning is only partially successful. The first rush of Japs is stopped, but many of his men are hurt. On the second attack more of his men are hurt and more Japs get through.

On the third attempt, Sheedy is standing, legs apart, looking toward the oncoming Japs over his tommygun when a grenade explodes between his legs, hurling him in the air, breaking both legs below the knees, chewing up his arms with shrapnel and peppering smaller fragments into his chest and eyes.

Hit, he "sees stars"

Assured in his own mind now that his 24-year-old life is finished—as he has been convinced so many times in the past month and a half—Sheedy is not motivated by fear at all, but only by what he calls an ugly feeling—a desire to take as many Japs with him as he can before he dies—that makes him roll over on his stomach, grope for and find his weapon, and with numb fingers blaze away in reckless hatred with his tommygun until another bullet breaks his right leg for the second time, and then something hits him in the head.

For a moment Sheedy "sees stars," just like any blow on the head. He doesn't realize that a bullet has grazed the mastoid bone on the left side of his head to pass through the lobe of that ear in one of the closest shaves any living man got in this war.

When his head stops swimming everything is still about him except the faint noises of Japs moving among the bodies and the snickering sound of their obscene bayonets.

He doesn't dare move

For many hours Sheedy lies motionless through waves of consciousness, listening to the Japs, like jungle beasts, moving among the bodies of fallen enemies. Even when he doesn't hear them any more, he doesn't dare move. The four other living Americans in the outpost don't dare reveal themselves to each other either.

It was 10:30 when the third Jap attack wiped out the detail. At daylight a United States patrol comes out looking for survivors, but not expecting to find any. Among the 1. dead Americans they find 22 dead Japs.

They don't find much left of Corporal Sheedy—with 57 wounds in his body—except an irrepressible Irish heart and sense of humor.

"Wait'll next year," he says, as they carry him a couple of miles to the rear to a portable hospital. "They can't do this to an Irish infantryman."

Placed aboard plane

His wounds dressed, New Guinea natives carry him 4 miles more to another hospital, where what is now only 120 pounds of Corporal Sheedy is loaded on a plane for Port Moresby and a series of bone and nerve operations extending from there to Australia and the States.

An attack of malaria in Australia didn't help his chances any, but he got by in spite of the weeping predictions of a nurse who gave him up for lost one night in Australia.

"Wait'll next year," he says, and now it is next year and Corporal Sheedy, true to his word, is strutting around the convalescent annex to Walter Reed Hospital in Washington on two good legs again and with almost the full use of his shattered arm. He even gets week-end passes, and what he does with his time then is none of your business. Now that his weight is back around 180, he is soon to go back on duty.

An Alien Speaks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

AN ALIEN SPEAKS

(By Abraham Sussman)

Flag of the States—
Banner of the Republic,
Emblem of democracy,
Symbol of the world to be,
I salute you!

I have a confession to make,
A confession and a declaration,
Listen!

I am an alien, that is to say, I am not legally bound to you.
Yet I have been bound to you with the fibers of my soul
Even before I knew you.
Bound to you in love, in admiration.

Believe me!

I have dreamt of you in my little Galician frontier town,
I have dreamt of you under the flag of a dying monarchy,
Under the burden of poverty, under the fear of pogroms.

I saw you in my dreams. You were floating in the stifled air that surrounded me.
At times I thought you were an illusion, a fantasy,
But a distant voice called to me and said:
"She is real, alive, somewhere * * *."

So I left the place where my cradle stood,
Where mother rocked me to sleep with her tearful lullaby,
And I wandered through lands and states
Until I reached your shores.
And I saw you, real, alive—as I saw you in my dreams.

I looked at your stars and I saw a message in every one of them;
A message to me and to the millions like me;
To all Americans, born and unborn.

In your stripes I read declarations, one as mighty as the other.
The Declaration of Independence;
The declaration of emancipation;
The declaration of the rights of labor;
The declaration of equality and tolerance.

I looked at you in meditation,
And I thought you were conceived by men and women of divine vision,
You were born of a holy rebellion against a tyrant,
The realization of freedom's dream.
And so you became a warning to tyrants, a hope to men.

I speak to you as millions before me did,
Men and women forgotten by fate and fortune,
The downcast and outcast of an old world.

Listen, flag of the Nation of nations—
I came to you, a pilgrim in rags,
A wanderer driven by hate and need,
I came with shattered dreams, but undying hope.

I brought to you a rich heritage of ages and generations—
The divine truth of prophets;
The spirit of sacrifice of holy martyrs;
The ballads of ancient bards, the dreams of dreamers.

I came to your shores, not as a soldier of fortune,
But as your knight errant.
To defend you, my protector;
To share your lofty inspirations and your humane ambitions.
I came to be your adopted son.

The other day my fingerprints were taken,
They asked me if I minded; I smiled, why should I?
I have given you my heart—why not my finger-tips?
Today I am an alien.
Tomorrow I shall be a full-fledged, true American.

Flag of States,
Banner of the Republic,
Emblem of democracy,
Symbol of the world of tomorrow,
I salute you!

Patriotic Appeal by William T. Kerr, National President of the American Flag Day Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

OUR ENTIRE NATION, IN EVERY COMMUNITY, SHOULD PLAN NOW AND MAKE AMERICAN FLAG DAY, JUNE 14, THE BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF OLD GLORY, THE GREATEST PATRIOTIC CELEBRATION AND NATIONA UNITY PROGRAM IN OUR COUNTRY'S HISTORY—WE MUST "KEEP THE HOME FIRES BURNING"

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, it is not too early to bring to the attention of the country the approaching birthday anniversary, June 14, of the Nation's emblem, our Stars and Stripes, but as this is one of the most important years in our Nation's history, it is desirous to give this early notice so plans may be made everywhere for Flag Day celebrations all over this land in schools, colleges, universities, women's clubs, service and community clubs, fraternal bodies, religious, civic, and other groups. This has been emphasized by the American Flag Day Association through Hon. William T. Kerr, of Yeadon-Lansdowne, Pa., who founded and organized this patriotic group when a schoolboy in Pittsburgh, Pa., his native city, in 1888, and who 10 years later, in 1898, during the Spanish-American War, was made national president and since then has been for 46 consecutive years, and now is, the active leader and promoter of Flag Day and director general of this organization cam aigning to have the birthday of Old Glory celebrated by the Nation. From the public press, pulpit, and by radio, from parades on Flag Day annually, everywhere the seed sown has borne and is bearing fruit everywhere as one of the strongest appeals and arguments for national unity.

Hundreds of organizations of all kinds now join in this patriotic object, particularly the public schools who promote it daily by their pledge to the flag. Many societies do this whenever they meet. Some require Flag Day observance in their rituals.

It may not be generally known but the American Flag Day Association erected in Schenley Park, Pittsburgh, and dedicated it on Flag Day, June 14, 1927, a granite shrine in honor of the flag's one hundred and fiftieth birthday anniversary that day, the only known monument in the world to any national flag, an event in which State, county, and city officials took part with a great patriotic parade and public meeting in the park. Many newspapers and magazines throughout the Nation have commended and aided their unselfish, patriotic work, for in all their years no one connected with this patriotic association ever received a penny for services. Members of past and present Congresses have been speakers at their patriotic gatherings. Their national president and founder, William T. Kerr, who holds active and honorary membership in numerous fraternal, patriotic, religious, civic, and educational bodies, was formerly a resident in my district and, while I was a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, I was the author of the bill making Flag Day, June 14, a legal holiday in the State of Pennsylvania—Pennsylvania being the first State in the Union to honor Old Glory legally. In their story of Flag Day, Everybody's Weekly, of Philadelphia, the Inquirer's magazine, said of Mr. Kerr's patriotic leadership that he was "devoting a lifetime to Old Glory." The Evening Bulletin of Philadelphia, used almost the same words: "A one-man organization in himself, he has spent since 1898, the better part of a lifetime, to have Flag Day made a legal holiday." As one feature of his efforts, he personally talked with and wrote Presidents and Governors, urging proclamations for Flag Day observance with national success. This year he has requested that American Flag Day be observed for itself on June 14, and a special day of their own, if one is desired, be set for another date as United Nations' Day.

When the city of Pittsburgh, where he was born, had him as their special Flag Day guest, and the mayor presented him with Pittsburgh's golden key to that city, he laughingly said he really did not need it. He was an active figure in the Pittsburgh district until 1928 when the Pennsylvania Railroad sent him to Philadelphia. On his return Flag Day visit to Pittsburgh they had a huge parade of patriotic and civic societies, military and service organizations with city officials and 20,000 school children marched. The Sun-Telegraph of Pittsburgh called him the "father of Flag Day" and Pittsburgh's Post-Gazette said he was "the man individually most responsible for Flag Day."

Many times this patriotic promoter for Flag Day could have profited by political appointment and office because of his wide circle of friends and contacts, but he refused this, preferring to pursue his free efforts among all groups and parties in the United States to popularize Flag Day and if possible have it receive congressional approval if not legal holiday enactment, as was done by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It is no wonder therefore that the Ledger of Philadelphia in extending birthday greetings to him designated him "Old Glory's most ardent champion keeping up schoolboy enthusiasm." He still carries it in his many speaking engagements and writings, into schools, societies, clubs, and even pulpits. Associated in this unselfish, nonprofit, nonpartisan, and nonsectarian but entirely American effort are men and women throughout the United States who are officers and leaders in various groups, by which means the celebration of Flag Day and the pledging of our American flag is being promoted widely. All of these are anxious that Federal, State, and local officials shall do their utmost by early proclamations and planning to make fitting arrangements. Formal request for this purpose, as has been his custom since the days of President William McKinley, has already been made and we are pleased to include the patriotic appeal of their national president, William T. Kerr, that "our entire Nation, in every community, should plan now to make American Flag Day the birthday anniversary of Old Glory the greatest patriotic celebration and national unity program in our country's history—we must keep the home fires burning."

AMERICAN FLAG DAY ASSOCIATION PROMOTING NATION-WIDE CELEBRATION OF FLAG DAY AND FLAG WEEK

(By William T. Kerr, founder, and, since 1898, national president and director general, American Flag Day Association)

YEADON, PA., April 10, 1944.

Fellow Americans, to secure greater national unity, to encourage American patriotism, plan now and arrange to join in national tribute to Old Glory.

STARS AND STRIPES ADOPTED AS OUR BANNER

June 14, Flag Day, birthday of Old Glory, is the anniversary of the adoption by the Continental Congress June 14, 1777, of the Stars and Stripes as the emblem of the United States, symbol of our nationality. A legal holiday in Pennsylvania since 1937 several other States provide by law for proclamations by Governors for observance of Flag Week, June 8–14, especially Flag Day, June 14.

GREATEST UNOFFICIAL NATIONAL HOLIDAY

Yearly it is becoming the greatest unofficial national holiday on our calendar, principally because the American Flag Day Association, organized in Pittsburgh, has promoted Flag Day observance for almost half a century, even before June 14 was called Flag Day.

A WEEK FOR FLAG'S BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION

Flag Week, June 8–14, was inaugurated by the American Flag Day Association, first observed in Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1917, during the First World War, so that our flag's birthday anniversary might be celebrated, if desired, at their own regular meeting places by organizations meeting during that period. Flag Day proclamations have been made by many Governors of States and various Presidents of the United States, especially on our request.

WOODROW WILSON ASKS CELEBRATION YEARLY

But Woodrow Wilson, May 30, 1916, practically made it a continuing unofficial celebration for all time, saying "It has seemed to me fitting that I should call your attention to the approach of the day upon which the flag of the United States was adopted by Congress as the emblem of the Union and to suggest to you that it should this year and the years to come (note the last five words) be given special significance," etc., and he emphasized it in a special formal Flag Day address June 14, 1916.

CALVIN COOLIDGE REQUESTS WE RECALL FLAG'S MEANING

President Calvin Coolidge said in 1927, "It is fitting that we recall (on June 14) all that our flag means to our citizens," etc. President Franklin D. Roosevelt, in 1941, before we entered the war said, "It is especially fitting that we reaffirm our faith in the ideals for which our flag stands and our loyalty to the Nation," etc.

PRESIDENT F. D. ROOSEVELT SHOWS CELEBRATION IS OUR CUSTOM

In 1942 he said, "For many years it has been our custom to set aside June 14 in honor of the flag," etc.

1943 AMERICAN FLAG'S BIRTHDAY OVERSHADOWED

In 1943, however, the O. W. I., last year practically made June 14 United Nations Day, destroying the object of our own Flag Day. When President Roosevelt's birthday, January 30, is celebrated, pictures of Churchill or Stalin are not spread around nor even of Jefferson or Jackson as there are special days for them, and June 14 should be our very own.

UNITED NATIONS DAY SUGGESTED FOR OUR ALLIES

March 25, 1944, we requested our President as we have done every President since William McKinley, to issue Flag Day proclamation, but earlier this war year than usual, to make June 14, its actual birthday, the specific celebration of the American flag and set aside a United Nations Day for our allies.

Our United States boys are fighting, many giving their lives, side by side with those of other nations to preserve our freedoms, they have to save, if possible, their national life, we to keep and hold ours. Old Glory is our very own flag and on its natal day deserves special honor and tribute since it specifically represents all our people, native and foreign born, rich and poor, high and low, of every race, color, and creed, and if special honors are to be given our allies, and they deserve it, another day—United Nations Day—should be set aside, either by the President or Congress.

FLAG WEEK SUGGESTED FOR NEXT WAR BOND SALE DRIVE

As Flag Week is June 8 to 14, we suggested (April 7) to Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, Jr., that as June 12 is the date for the opening of the War-bond sale drive, he use Flag Week for patriotic psychological effect throughout the Nation in their publicity in securing bond subscriptions, bringing practical, patriotic results.

April 10, we have advice this will be done, Field Director R. W. Coyne, of the War Finance Division, says, "The occurrence of Flag Day at almost the beginning of the drive will materially help."

1944 PROBABLY GREATEST YEAR IN OUR HISTORY

This year will be the most trying in all our history. Probably by June 14 nearly every family in the United States will have someone under the Stars and Stripes in some service on land, sea, or in the air. Let's make this the greatest of all Flag Days and honor them.

RELIGIOUS BODIES SHOULD COMBINE PATRIOTIC WITH SPIRITUAL

Religious leaders should preach patriotic, spiritual sermons Saturday, June 10, or Sunday, June 11, and Children's Day programs combine patriotism with religious programs for we are a God-fearing Republic. Always our flag has unselfishly championed the cause of the oppressed. Wherever Old Glory floats there is a shrine.

FLAG DAY CALLS ALL TO LOYAL SERVICE

Here, because the great mass of our people are God-fearing, we have liberty, freedom, and constitutional democracy, making us the greatest republic of all times. Flag Day calls on us to preserve it as our forefathers willed it and enshrine the love for our flag, our Nation, that bulwark, our Constitution, and American institutions in all our hearts in consecrated, loyal, unselfish service to God and country.

Refugees in the Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD a report by Miss Laura L. Margolis on refugees in the Far East. Miss Margolis was a representative of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in Shanghai, directing assistance to men and women who had fled to that city from Nazi Germany. After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Miss Margolis, as an American citizen, was interned by the Japanese. She was recently repatriated.

Our country has every reason to be proud of the fact that its citizens of Jewish faith have been able to develop an organization such as the Joint Distribution Committee. The committee was organized during the last war and for a generation has been the chief American agency giving aid to Jews overseas. Its leadership and personnel have shown not only a sense of personal sacrifice, but a vision and an ability to plan, which will yet save the remnants of the Jewish communities from the holocaust of the present war, and stand out in the annals of great human services.

It is interesting to note that while this committee was established and is supported by men and women of Jewish faith, it has not limited its benefactions exclusively to Jewish victims of war and persecution overseas. It has cooperated closely with such organizations as the American Friends Service Committee (Quakers), the Unitarians, and with Catholic and Protestant organizations everywhere. Frequently Christian as well as Jewish refugees have received the help of this committee.

In Shanghai, a substantial number of the refugees to whom Miss Margolis refers are persons of Catholic and Protestant faith. They are still being assisted by a local committee which represents the Joint Distribution Committee. In the actual rendering of human service, distinctions of creed and nationality have disappeared and men and women of many backgrounds and faiths have served in the common cause of humanity.

REFUGEES IN THE FAR EAST—EVEN AFTER PEARL HARBOR THOUSANDS OF EUROPEAN JEWS IN SHANGHAI CONTINUE TO BE KEPT ALIVE THROUGH MACHINERY SET UP BEFORE THE WAR BY THE JOINT DISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE

(By Laura L. Margolis)

I don't have to tell you how glad I am to be home. I'm still a bit confused, rushing around to say hello to my family and my friends at the Joint Distribution Committee, trying to sort my thoughts and impressions of my two and a half years in Shanghai into some sort of order and particularly trying to get some clothes to round out the wardrobe of a single dress and one pair of worn-out shoes that I came home with. I left America to help refugees and now I return a refugee myself.

I went to Shanghai for the Joint Distribution Committee in May 1941. Manuel Siegel, who remains in internment there, joined me just 12 days before Pearl Harbor. Before he could unpack his bags Japanese warships were firing on American and British gunboats under our windows and we realized that our country was at war.

It's only when people begin asking you questions about how you lived, what you did in an enemy-occupied city, how you were able to help the refugees—and we were able to—that your whole experience shapes itself into some meaningful pattern.

THOUSANDS KEPT ALIVE

I want to make one point very clear: The Joint Distribution Committee and the organization it set up in Shanghai under wartime conditions in enemy-occupied territory has meant the difference between life and death to thousands of refugees there. Our kitchen, now feeding 5,000 persons 1 meal a day, our 5 camps that are housing them in crude but protective barracks, spell hope and life for these people. Our work has never stopped for a single day. That work is still going on.

Our difficulties were so numerous and serious that more than once I felt sure that our whole structure would collapse. Money was always a problem; getting adequate equipment was a major headache for us. Unraveling the red tape, overcoming the apathy of the Japanese occupation authorities was a long-term undertaking in itself.

Just before Pearl Harbor we were feeding 8,000 a day in the Joint Distribution Committee kitchen, giving them a noon meal and an evening meal. But our funds were running low and the expected Joint Distribution Committee allotment for December had not arrived. In fact, it never arrived, because Pearl Harbor intervened.

The declaration of war automatically put the Joint Distribution Committee's arrangement for occupied countries into effect. Here I must explain that before Pearl Harbor the Joint Distribution Committee in New York, foreseeing the possibility of war, had informed all its overseas committees, including ours, that local borrowings should be made against the Joint Distribution Committee's post-war credit if war should come and communications be severed. This credit was for a period of 6 months, at the monthly rate of expenditure then current.

On the basis of this guaranty we called a meeting of a group of prominent Shanghai Jews, explained the plan to them, and appealed for their support.

At first, the large sums we needed were slow in coming. In the meantime we took stock of our funds and decided that, by cutting out one meal a day, we could continue for some time. Cutting out one meal a day was a difficult decision to make, because it meant putting already undernourished men, women, and children on still shorter rations. But it was either that or close down entirely and turn the refugees over to the Japanese.

More meetings followed, this time with individuals. Again we explained the Joint Distribution Committee's arrangement; again we asked for funds, explaining how increasingly desperate the refugee situation was becoming.

The loans grew—not only in number, but also in amount. As a matter of fact, we exhausted the Joint Distribution Committee's credit limit. But we went ahead with our borrowings, feeling sure that, although we had no authorization to do so, the Joint Distribution Committee wanted to help, but because of wartime conditions couldn't communicate its wishes to us. All in all, we were able to accumulate $500,000, and up to the day of my internment I was able to contract a loan. This made my internment easier to bear.

FIVE THOUSAND MEALS A DAY

The Japanese allowed us to borrow from neutrals only. At first the loans permitted us to give one meal a day. When I say one meal a day, you must understand that I mean a meal of one course—a heavy soup that we made as nourishing as we could, or a stew of some sort. Later we were able to add 8 ounces of bread a day. Later, too, we bought a large amount of soya beans, and, with a press that we acquired, turned out enough of the highly nutritive soya milk to supplement the children's diet. At first they refused to drink it, but after a while they got used to it.

When we first began working in Shanghai we found that we were burning money. Our kitchen was an antiquated Chinese affair which was terribly inefficient. Meals cost us 60 cents each in Chinese money—3 cents in American currency. Of this, 10 cents went for food and 50 cents for fuel. Obviously, this extravagance had to be eliminated. This was easier said than done. You just couldn't go out and buy new equipment in a city where every piece of metal was a Japanese prize. But we did manage to locate four steam boilers that belonged to a commercial firm. By much persuasion and wire pulling, we got possession of the boilers and installed them. This gave us a kitchen with a capacity of 10,000 meals a day at a cost of only 10 cents a meal, in Chinese money, of which only 2 cents went for fuel.

Unfortunately our resources forced us to limit ourselves to 5,000 meals a day. We chose only the most needy—the children, the aged, the ill—and fed them. This is a tragic situation. Unless funds can be sent through to the committee that is now operating the kitchen, it means that they will have to maintain this level of inadequate relief; it means giving people neither enough to let them live, nor enough to let them die. In order to keep feeding the people we had to close our two hospitals in June 1942.

I want to tell you proudly that the refugees themselves worked with us, shouldering their responsibilities, rather than sitting idly by and passively accepting our aid.

DEMOCRACY IN ACTION

In January 1942 we called a meeting of the 500 paid refugee workers in our kitchen, two hospitals, and barracks, and explained our precarious financial situation to them. We told them that there would be no money for salaries, that every cent we were raising from day to day had to go into the kitchen. We asked them to please find other jobs. The next day every one of them reported for work. We held meetings with all the other refugees because we felt that they had a right to know the situation. We told them that to work together most efficiently they would have to organize themselves democratically, to elect representatives who would consult with us. Only then would we pull through this crisis together.

We organized ourselves along these lines. We met regularly with these delegates, heard their special problems, and, consequently, found things working out much better. It was as if we were shipwrecked on an island and had organized ourselves into a community government so that we could more efficiently stave off disaster until we were rescued.

THE POOR HELP THE POORER

A great change came over these people as a result of this application of simple democracy. Poor as they were, they recognized degrees of poverty among themselves. I remember that one day a representative came to see me with an idea. He was gaunt, pale from insufficient food, and wearing threadbare clothing. He told me that some of the refugees had thought of giving a party to raise funds for their fellow refugees. That first party led to others. The poor were helping the poorer.

In February 1943 I was interned in the Chapei camp in Shanghai. People want to know why the Japanese waited so long before interning us. The answer is very simple: until then they needed us to help run the varied and complicated affairs of a city as large as Shanghai—under their supervision, of course. By February they had no further need for us, so they interned us. I can't tell you too much about the camp for obvious reasons.

I was given 1 week's notice to get ready and pack. The camp to which I was sent was for women and families. Mr. Siegel was interned in Pootung camp, which was for unattached and single men.

The food was very simple and quite inadequate. We had three monotonous meals each day. If I never taste fish, rice, and cabbage fried in oil again, it won't be too soon. According to Oriental standards, we were well treated.

We had to do all of our own work. The buildings and stoves were furnished to us and we were just dumped in to shift for ourselves. We did our own laundry. We did our own cooking and preparing of food. As for accommodations, I had a cot which was just enough to turn over in, and the space between beds was just enough to get in sideways. The only thing that kept us going was the hope of repatriation.

I feel that I have come out of darkness into the light, that I have come as a messenger from a far world, to tell you that back in distant Shanghai, in the hands of your enemy, there are brave men and women of your blood and kin, who in danger and in difficulty have never lost faith, have never lost hope.

War Prohibition Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article written by Rev. O. R. Miller, D. D., State superintendent of the New York Civic League, which appeared in the Civic Bulletin of April 14, 1944:

WHY PASS THE BRYSON WAR PROHIBITION BILL?

TWELVE REASONS FOR THIS BILL, H. R. 2082

First. Because it will help greatly to protect the sobriety of our soldiers and sailors. Millions of these boys never tasted liquor before they were drafted into the Army. It is hard enough in these modern times for a boy to lead a sober life even with all the home influences of father, mother, brothers, and sisters to help him. Why should the Government make it hard for them to continue as total abstainers in the Army?

In World War No. 1, under the approval of President Woodrow Wilson, Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels and Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, war prohibition was passed by Congress, "for the duration." It was made a crime to sell or give liquor to any soldier or sailor anywhere in this country, or in any foreign country by anyone connected with our Army or Navy. That produced the finest and most sober Army in the history of the world.

The passage of the Bryson war prohibition bill will protect the hundreds of thousands of soldiers now in this country training to go abroad, as well as protect the many thousands who are continually coming back to this country on furloughs from war fronts.

Second. Because sober soldiers make better fighters than drinking soldiers.

President Ray Lyman Wilbur, in an address at Stanford University, said: "In these days of range finders, cross hairs, precision instruments, speed, and team play, anything that confuses either mind or body, be it fatigue or drugs, is a menace. The present widespread misuse of alcohol does not go well with the intricate instruments of industry and war, or the cyclonic maneuvers of combat. Five-second relays of bombers demand the clearest of heads and the most dependable of bodies and brains."

Prime Minister Mackenzie King of Canada, though not a prohibitionist, when announcing, in December 1942, severe restrictions on the whole beverage liquor traffic, including the prohibiting of all advertising of spirituous liquor, wine, and beer, for the war, said:

"The lowering of efficiency due to the use of alcoholic beverages is certain to slow down the progress of the recruit in training. In these days when the utmost alertness is needed, whether on land, or sea, or in the air, such lowered efficiency is bound greatly to increase the likelihood of accidents in which others besides the offender may be involved. Just as a defect in a plane or a gun or a ship may cost men's lives, so may some carelessness or neglect in the sailor, the soldier, or the airman endanger the lives of their comrades, and risk grave danger in training, or in combat.

"Then, too, failure to be temperate helps to establish habits which later may lead to a breakdown in morale. It is common observation of seasoned soldiers that intemperate habits lead to reckless exposure when men are under fire, thereby occasioning needless casualties. Only the man who disciplines himself strictly can stand for long the terrific pace of modern war. Those who indulge themselves too frequently and too freely will break down under the strain. That was true in the last war; it is more true in this."

Third. Because the drinking habits of thousands of laboring men not only reduce the output of urgently needed war material, but also reduce the quality of their workmanship.

Men who have been out drinking until late the night before, are not in a fit condition to handle delicate and expensive machinery as they could if they had not been drinking. Many complaints have come in recently of bad workmanship on Government vessels, tanks, and other war material, so much so that it has even caused congressional investigations concerning them. But when they get back to the root of the matter they usually find that the chief cause of the trouble was the drinking habits of those who work on delicate machinery when they were not in condition to work at all.

Fourth. Because liquor drinking has been the greatest of all causes producing absenteeism from work by many engaged on Government jobs.

Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox testifying before the House Naval Affairs Committee, when investigating the shipbuilding industry, was asked what explanation he had for the fact that the figures before the Committee from the Bureau of Ships and the Department of Labor showed 40 percent of unexcused absenteeism occurring over the week ends, and he replied:

"Dissipation is one. More money than they can spend is another. The real major cause is that men go out Saturday and Sunday and indulge and don't feel quite so well on Monday."

The Report on Private Shipbuilding Companies on the Pacific Coast, among other things, said: "All studies indicate the peak of absenteeism is reached over the week ends, with absences on Saturday and Monday accounting for almost 40 percent of the total man-hours lost."

At a hearing before the Senate Military Affairs Committee in March 1943 there was a discussion of the need of manpower and more production in war industry, at which Mr. Grenville Clark, when asked what he thought the trouble was, replied:

"I think it is largely liquor, to be frank. The consumption of liquor in 1942 was the greatest per capita in the history of this country. I mean hard liquor. If the truth was told, if you would bring it out, I think a large proportion of the difficulty is due to an immense consumption of liquor, under the stimulus of enormous wages, twice as much as most of the workers have ever had. They haven't much to spend it on; they cannot buy cars, and you always notice the percentage of absenteeism is twice as large on Monday as on other days."

At a hearing before the House Labor Committee on the problem of absenteeism Assistant Secretary of the Navy R. A. Bard said to the committee:

"During December 1942 approximately 16,700,000 man-hours were lost through absenteeism in the shipyards and navy yards of the country—sufficient man-hours to construct 14 additional destroyers and about 40 times the man-hours lost due to strikes or shut-downs in the shipyards of the United States for the whole year of 1942.

"The chief reasons for unjustifiable absences are probably the desire for recreation and absence due to dissipation over the week-ends, because statistics show approximately 40 percent of all absences occur on Saturdays and Mondays."

At the same hearing S. M. Du Brul, director of the personnel staff of General Motors Corporation, said: "Whatever extent short-term sickness accounts for the increase of absenteeism it is a sort of sickness to which workers are particularly susceptible just after pay day and on week-ends."

Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins at the same hearing testified to the large loss of production of Government materials by absenteeism, and among other things said: "There are undoubtedly men who have been absent from work Monday morning because they were drinking on Sunday." She is also reported to have said that more men have been killed and injured the day after pay day in factories than at the battle front.

M. S. Rukeyser, International News Service commentator, in an article that appeared in many papers last May, thus wrote concerning absenteeism.

"The second cause was hang-overs from drinking. As to this the magazine Management said 'Hang-overs with 12.2 percent is the most horrible example. For every 10 persons out through natural, poor health, 7 are home recovering from bouts from the rum pot. Big bar bills, big losses in pay, and big heads, total up to an awful price for high-jinxing. That is not all. Our men on the fighting line pay for lost production in blood—in life itself.'"

Every man incapacitated by alcohol becomes an extra burden upon a Nation at war.

On Christmas Day, 1943, the New York Times had this United Press dispatch from Detroit:

"Closing of plant laid to Yule drinking parties. Officials charge employees were too drunk to work. Premature celebration of Christmas closed the Continental Motors Corporation plant today as company officials charged that men and women workers on two shifts were too intoxicated even to attempt precision work. So many of approximately 6,000 workers on day and afternoon shifts showed up intoxicated that it was necessary to close the factory. To have worked might have ruined vast quantities of valuable materials, said a spokesman for the company."

Mrs. D. Leigh Colvin, State president of the New York W. C. T. U., in New York Temperance Work.

"While on my recent trip of 4 weeks in upState New York, I visited several cities where large defense projects are located. I talked with a woman physician who had been to the city police court that morning to attend a patient. There she saw drunken men brought in a truck from a defense plant to be sobered up so they would be able to work the following day.

"I talked with a man who is the head of nine big plants and he said that alcohol was the cause of most of the absenteeism in all his plants—week-end drunks can't come back to work on Monday.

"Another man told of an employee in a defense factory who, because of being under the influence of alcohol broke his machine. Two men had to spend a whole day repairing it, only to have the same man break it again because of another lapse.

"A group of men in one plant were dismissed to give blood to the Red Cross blood bank. Only a few could be served at one time, so the others went across the street for a drink while they waited. When they came back the doctors refused to take their blood because of the alcohol in it, and so time was wasted and no blood given to save some boy's life, all because of the drink."

It has often been shown that a large percentage of the cases of venereal diseases in the Army and Navy have been contracted when our boys were out drinking and under the influence of liquor. It is reported that the percentage of venereal diseases in World War No. 2 have been much larger than in World War No. 1, in which the Government kept away from the soldiers and sailors, all liquor, including beer, as far as possible.

In World War No. 2 the Government officially shows alcoholic liquor before the soldiers and encourages them to drink and does little to prevent them going outside of the camp to get stronger liquors than beer, and many become disgracefully drunk. The boys are given beer in the camps by the Government, which in many cases whets their appetites to go outside for stronger liquor and also get into dens of vice.

Fifth. Because war prohibition will help greatly to protect our soldiers and sailors against venereal diseases.

Many conscientious Army officers who see the injurious effects of beer drinking in the camp as well as the drinking of other liquors outside of the camp, have testified that liquor largely increases the venereal disease problem in the Army.

TESTIMONIES OF ARMY OFFICERS AND OTHERS

At the Philadelphia Conference on Social Hygiene during the week of February 7, 1944, Commander Clarence J. Buckley, venereal-disease control officer of the Fourth Naval District, said: "A survey during the past 90 days shows that 58 percent of the social disease contacts among sailors and marines here could be traced to taprooms. A survey of the past year showed that 75 percent could be traced to these places. They are a major problem."

About the same time Dr. Hubley R. Owen, director of public health for Philadelphia, said: "The matter of intoxication of servicemen with respect to venereal-disease control is of double importance. In the first place an intoxicated soldier is less apt to resist the advances of the prostitute or promiscuous girl. In the second place, he is unable to follow out prophylactic procedures when not in full possession of his faculties. Reports received from both the Army and Navy indicate that the majority of exposures leading to venereal infection among servicemen occurred when they had had too much to drink."

Dr. Arthur T. McCormack, secretary of the Kentucky State Board of Health, said: "It has been shown that in World War No. 1 venereal diseases cost the United States Army a loss of almost 7,000,000 days—equal to a full year's absence from duty of 19,000 men. Only battle wounds and influenza cost more in terms of days lost."

The reports from our Army of the increasing number of venereal cases in the present war indicate that that evil is now very serious. Is not that largely because the present administration has steadily opposed war prohibition which was adopted by our Government in World War No. 1?

The experience of many years past shows that alcohol and prostitution are always inseparable partners in iniquity. Proof of this is found in an article by Mr. Bascom Johnson entitled "Prostitution in the United States." Stressing the relation of alcohol to prositution he said:

"Since the repeal of Federal and State prohibition laws, the old alliance between prostitution and the saloon has been renewed with enthusiasm on both sides. The public drinking places definitely favor the traffic in sexual relationships. While it should not be imagined that the conditions described are peculiar to, say, Chicago, a recent report from that city states:

"'Vice in Chicago's saloon taverns flourishes. Some saloons are simply houses of prostitution, having adjacent rooms used for vice. Hostesses solicit at the bars and tables, then retire with patrons to connecting rooms. In other cases street walkers come into the saloons to solicit. Bartenders, doormen, and toilet attendants serve as agents for prostitutes.' All of which presents a picture disturbingly like the bad old days before World War No. 1."

Dr. Milton Rosenau, professor of preventive medicine in Harvard University, in his authoritative book on Public Hygiene, says:

"Alcohol is the bedfellow of syphilis and gonorrhea. The story of many cases of sexual immorality begins with the influence of drink. Alcohol is generally credited with increasing sexual desire. The unquestioned sexual excitement is not due to stimulation of the generative organs, but to the loss of self-control and the anesthetic action of alcohol upon the higher centers of the brain."

E. L. Transeau, of Boston, in writing about the relation of drink to syphilis, said, "Various investigators have found from 75 to 90 percent of venereal infection, including syphilis, to have been contracted under the influence of alcohol. It is particularly noted that the exposure occurs not in the deeper stages of intoxication, but in the early stages in which the weakened higher mental faculties, the loss of self-control, and the sense of responsibility, turn conduct over to passing impulses. This throws still stronger emphasis on the share attributed to alcohol."

Therefore, we need war prohibition to save many thousands of our soldiers and sailors from having to be sent home because of ruined health from drink and venereal diseases. A soldier or sailor whose heart, nerves, and eyesight have been injured by drink or syphilis, cannot stand up under the terrific strain they must endure on foreign battlefields or in naval battles or battles in the air, and must be sent home or kept in service only to meet an early death. The Army, Navy, and Air Force are thus losing many good fighters from the service by venereal diseases.

In March 1937 Secretary of War Stimson wrote to several Governors concerning certain war conditions in their States, in which he said:

"I hardly need to remind you that among these healthy young men of our Army, venereal disease produces more disability than any other single cause, and that among industrial workers it is one of the most serious causes of disability and inefficiency."

Sixth. Because no grain or other food material should be made into alcoholic beverages while millions of people among our allies in Europe and China are starving.

It is brutal; it is inhuman to take the bread out of the mouths of starving children and of adults in the countries now fighting with us and for us against Germany and Japan in order to make intoxicating beverages. Many millions of Chinese have starved to death already and still more millions are starving and will starve to death, if we continue to turn enormous quantities of grain and other food materials into intoxicating beverages which do nobody any good, but which harm all who use it as a beverage, instead of sending it to feed our allies across the sea.

President Roosevelt said: "The entire nation is mobilizing to produce the materials necessary for the defense of democracy. As a part of this production effort, food is just as important as munitions."

Seventh. Because the Government needs all the space on its ships and on the railroads for hauling Government supplies during the war.

The newspapers have told us of many instances where war materials were left in freight houses or on the docks and large space was given on the trains and ships for the shipment of enormous quantities of beer and other liquors. Evidently in the minds of Government officials beer is more important than bullets or other war material. The Chicago Tribune of August 18, 1942, said:

"Delegate ANTHONY J. DIMOND, of Alaska, today termed 'scandalous' the transportation to that Territory of large quantities of liquor while food and other war necessities were left lying on the docks. DIMOND indicated he was hopeful steps would be taken soon to stop it. A recent report, he told a reporter, showed that requests had been made for allotment for space to carry 16 tons of freight on one vessel, and space for only 1½ tons was granted, whereas the same ship carried beer and wine valued at $60,000."

Mr. Murl Vance, in the Signs of the Times, wrote:

"I talked with a man, an evacuee from Singapore, who declared that the alcoholic situation was jeopardizing the stand of the United Nations, and that thousands of lives were being lost which would be saved if the men would keep sober. Alcohol, he declared, was heavily at fault for the loss of Singapore, just as we all know that it accounted for a very large percent of the loss at Pearl Harbor. Even the boat on which we escaped had one large room piled high with alcoholic beverages, in spite of the fact that many refugees had to be left behind at the mercy of the enemy for lack of transportation."

Eighth. Because it will be a great aid to the farmers in keeping their help sober and working, which is desperately needed in these times of shortage of food.

Many farmers have a very serious problem to keep their help from going into town Saturday and getting drunk, so much so that they are often unable to feed the livestock or milk the cows on Sunday or work on Monday.

At a farm labor hearing in California last year President Paul M. Thornton, of the Southern California Vegetable Producers' Association, said 1 farmer reports that from 10 to 20 of his 600 employees are absent every day because of drinking. Mr. Thornton further said:

"If the Government would make it as hard for the farm hand to buy liquor that will make him play into the hands of Hitler or Tojo for 24 hours to a week as it is for me to get gasoline for producing food, we could get somewhere." The applause which greeted that statement was the most hearty noticed during the whole 4 days of the hearing, the Los Angeles Times reported.

Ninth. Because of the loss of enormous sums of money wasted on drink which could and should be devoted to buying War bonds or some such patriotic service.

The latest Government reports show that America's liquor bill for 1943 was over $6,000,000,000. That is terrible to think of, but we should consider to how much better use that money should be put.

The drinking of so much liquor incapacitates physically many thousands of young men for military service. Also war prohibition of the manufacture, distribution, and sale of liquor would release for military service nearly a million liquor employees and thus make it unnecessary to draft young fathers with several children.

Tenth. Because the fathers and mothers who have given their sons to serve their country in war, and are anxious for their moral welfare as well as for their physical safety, deserve to have war prohibition for their moral protection.

Eleventh. Because the wives and children of thousands of soldiers drafted into war services also are entitled to war prohibition for protection of their husbands and fathers.

Twelfth. Because many great military men have opposed drink in the Army.

General Lord Roberts said, "I beg most earnestly that the public generally will prevent our young soldiers from being tempted to drink."

Count von Moltke, Germany's great field marshal, said: "Germany has more to fear from beer than from all the armies of France."

General Lord Kitchener, the great English general, said, "Resist alcohol as you would the enemy."

Generalissimo Joffre, of World War No. 1, said: "Alcohol, by diminishing the moral and material strength of the Army, is a crime against national defense in the face of the enemy."

On Mr. Hull

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial by David Lawrence which appeared in th New York Sun of April 10 and which is a very clear and informative dissertation on the important subject of our foreign policy. I am one of those who believe that our Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, has been doing, and is continuing to do, a masterful job in difficult days, and it is encouraging to note men of the type of Mr. Lawrence recognize that.

The article is as follows:

TODAY IN WASHINGTON

(By David Lawrence)

HULL'S EXPOSITION OF UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY

WASHINGTON, April 10.—An American foreign policy—free from partisan bias and true to the American purpose of serving humanity, by devising the means of preserving peace so that World War No. 3 may be prevented—has just been proclaimed by Cordell Hull, Secretary of State.

It is by far the most comprehensive expression of war aims and peace objectives that has come from any government and constitutes the kind of Americanism which the men in our armed services can honorably support and embodies a cause for which they can fervently make the needed sacrifices.

The document ought to be printed and reprinted widely, for it is a simple explanation of the trials and tribulations of a government that is trying to make worth while the tremendous expenditure of energy and resources being mobilized.

The pronouncement suffers but little that it has not come earlier, though, indeed, impatient critics have been expressing a recurrent insistence during the last several months for something of this kind.

But the declaration of American foreign policy has been made and only those who are concerned with captious or pettifogging detail, those who want to accomplish a reconstructed world by next week or next month, or those who allow the pressures of left or right wing or of this or that national group to impair their objectivity can complain now as to an alleged reticence or a failure to chart the course to peace which our Government has embarked upon.

The underlying counsel of the Secretary's statement is patience and forbearance, and running through it, too, is an implicit caution that we must bear strongly in mind the relationship of military command to civilian affairs in France and Italy, for example, and in other countries where liberation by the armies of the United Nations is to occur. It is clear that General de Gaulle and his followers must not allow their ambitions to mess up a military movement for which the Allies have given vast amounts of equipment and on which our high command is dependent to hold the invasion front.

The Atlantic Charter is "not a code of law from which detailed answers to every question can be distilled by painstaking analysis of its words and phrases," says Mr. Hull, but he adds that "it points the direction, in which solutions are to be sought." The "essential understanding and unity of action" among Great Britain, the United States, China, and Russia, according to the Secretary's statement, is "not in substitution or derogation of unity among the United Nations." He makes it plain that an international organization is desirable, but points out that without "an enduring understanding" between these four nations on fundamental purposes and their obligations to one another, peace organizations are "creations on paper and the path is wide open again for the rise of a new aggressor."

This is common sense and horse sense. Secretary Hull says "it is hardly to be supposed that all the more than 30 boundary questions in Europe can be settled while the fighting is still in progress," but he assures us that "this does not mean that certain questions may not and should not in the meantime be settled by friendly conference and agreement." Most important, however, is this:

"We are at a stage where much of the work of formulating plans for the organization to maintain peace has been accomplished. It is right and necessary that we should have the advice and help of an increasing number of Members of Congress. Accordingly I have requested the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations to designate a representative, bipartisan group for this purpose. Following these and similar discussions with Members of the House of Representatives, we shall be in a position to go forward again with other nations and, upon learning their views, be able to submit to the democratic processes of discussion a more concrete proposal."

This is the American way of doing things and every Republican as well as every Democratic leader, including Governor Dewey, Governor Bricker, and others being mentioned for the Presidential nomination, ought to take this opportunity to second the efforts of Secretary Hull and keep foreign policy out of partisan politics. For if another world war comes because this generation fails to do its duty in establishing an international means of keeping peace the blood of American boys who are sons of present-day Republicans as well as Democrats will have to be shed a third time to defend America.

Lawyers in O. P. A.

REMARKS

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss this morning a highly controversial subject, and that is as to how many lawyers there are in the Office of Price Administration.

Recently I received a communication from Chester Bowles, Administrator, who states that on March 10, 1943, there were 440 attorneys in the Washington office drawing salaries totaling $1,867,470 annually. There were 1,367 attorneys in the field drawing salaries totaling $4,927,605 annually, making a total of 1,807 attorneys in both the Washington office and in the field at an annual outlay of $6.795,075 base pay, without overtime.

As of February 29, 1944, there were 298 attorneys in the Washington office drawing salaries of $1 368,000 annually, and 1,145 attorneys in the field drawing salaries totaling $4,505,095 annually, making a total of that date of 1,443 attorneys in both the Washington office and in the field drawing salaries totaling $5,873,095 annually; I presume this is base pay without overtime.

Recently we have been reading about the great savings effected the American taxpayer by the O. P. A. Now if Mr. Bowles, Administrator of the O. P. A., could be induced to reduce by at least 30 percent the legal minds in this department of the Government, it would be one instance where we would definitely know the O. P. A. was effecting savings for the American taxpayer and at the same time would afford relief to the industrial, business, and agricultural life of the Nation from the barrage of directives thrown at them daily. When the O. P. A. was instituted there may have been need for many legal minds; however, since this organization is now on a working basis there can be no justification for the number now on the pay roll.

One of the most important matters facing Congress is what to do about the O. P. A., authorization of which expires on June 30. There is no disposition in the Congress to do away with price control. It is a necessary instrumentality created by Congress to do a definite work. Their legal department, however, at times, goes far afield.

There is considerable sentiment for making the authority of O. P. A. more specific instead of leaving it with a wide field of bureaucratic discretion. There is also considerable sentiment for providing for court appeals against its decisions.

There has been an abundance of evidence that O. P. A. has abused its authority. Under the Henderson regime the lawyers and economists were using the agency to effect their pet reforms of the American business structure.

If Administrator Chester Bowles actually wants to save the American taxpayer some money he will reduce the personnel of his legal staff another several hundred and not alone save the American taxpayer considerable money but a considerable number of headaches.

The effort should be made in the Congress, when this matter is up for consideration, to impress upon the O. P. A. to return to government by law instead of by bureaucratic directives.

Even though the O. P. A. has reduced the number of attorneys since March 1943, they can still reduce the number considerably more. I feel quite certain it would operate in a more businesslike and efficient manner if surplus legal talent was moved out.

Views of Justice Byrnes on Surplus Property Disposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, there is growing evidence that the Members of both Houses of the Congress are, each day, giving more serious thought to the vital question of providing an orderly program covering the disposal of Government-owned surpluses of all kinds. All of the Members with whom I have discussed this personally feel that it is the definite duty of the Congress to pass appropriate legislation on this matter at an early date in order to provide an official policy statement of the Congress to the agency or agencies to whom this gigantic task of merchandising is to be allocated.

In this connection, I am sure that the Members will be interested in the views of the Honorable James F. Byrnes, Director of the Office of War Mobilization, as given by Mr. Byrnes in an address to the Academy of Political Science in New York on April 12. The subject of Mr. Byrnes' address was Preparation for Peace on the Home Front. In respect to the surplus property question, Justice Byrnes had the following to say:

The constructive report of B. M. Baruch and John Hancock on the problems of postwar readjustments has gone far to dispel the fog of controversy which had hung over the discussions of the termination of war contracts and the disposition of surplus property.

Legislation is necessary to effectively solve these problems. However, from my long experience in the Congress, I realize that delays in legislation are unavoidable. I believe it essential for the Executive to take no chances but to proceed to the fullest extent possible under existing law.

A Surplus War Property Administrator has been appointed. He has called upon the procurement agencies for an inventory. If we wait to get a complete inventory from all war theaters, the inventory will be only of historical value. But we will secure an inventory in sufficient detail to enable us to know what surpluses we have and where they are located. This list of surplus materials will be furnished to each procurement agency and no agency will purchase additional supplies without first consulting that list in order to ascertain if Government supplies are already available.

Our surplus supplies must be disposed of at a fair price, and as rapidly as possible without demoralizing trade and industry. There must be no scrapping or destruction of useful property. Private monopolies must not be created or strengthened. Small independent local businesses must be given preference and industrial loans made available to them on appropriate terms.

The Government's wartime investment in new plants and new machinery amounts to approximately fifteen and one-half billions. But about one-third of this amount is invested in plants especially designed for the manufacture of munitions which could have little or no peacetime use.

The problem of disposition, however, is enormously aggravated because 70 percent of the Government's total plant investment is in projects costing more than $10,000,000 each. The Surplus Property Administrator must be authorized to lease as well as sell these plants if independent and local enterprises are to be given an opportunity to take over any of the larger plants. And, where possible, we must subdivide the larger units.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. HESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

ASSOCIATED WAR PRICE AND RATIONING BOARDS OF SOUTHWESTERN OHIO,
Cincinnati, Ohio, April 7, 1944.

Hon. WILLIAM E. HESS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: At a meeting of the Associated War Price and Rationing Boards of Southwestern Ohio, held on the evening of April 6, 1944, it was unanimously agreed to present for your consideration the following observations and recommendations, based on our practical experience in carrying out the O. P. A. programs, in the hope that they will be of assistance to you in making the O. P. A. a better instrument of true democracy, to the end that more efficient price control and more equitable distribution of rationed necessities may be afforded the American people.

1. Without reservation we here signify our complete devotion to the fundamental purposes of the O. P. A.

2. We believe that as the O. P. A. is at present set up and administered, those purposes are not being fully served.

3. We submit as our considered judgment our conclusion that many of the fundamental purposes are being defeated because Congress has not laid down proper definitions and limitations under which the O. P. A. should function; that it is the duty of Congress to do so in accordance with our American principles of government.

4. The policy of placing rationing and price control in the hands of local boards made up of volunteer citizens is a thoroughly sound one that should be perpetuated. It is the American way that, properly guarded by Congress, will produce an utmost of good will and cooperation on the part of our people.

5. To the greatest degree possible these local boards should be made autonomous, to act without petty interference or political or personal considerations for the purpose of promoting price control and the equitable distribution of rationed goods among our people.

6. That this autonomy no longer exists is obvious to anyone who has served as a member of such boards. This condition has come about through the growth of one of the greatest and most vicious bureaucracies that ever fastened itself on the American people that is composed of salaried employees in the district, regional, and national offices of the O. P. A., whose chief purpose seems to be to defeat the autonomy of the local boards through petty nagging, unjustified interference and the constant issuing of involved regulations that have now grown to such a volume that much time and effort are expended in interpreting those regulations and their many amendments to the point where all semblance of simplicity has vanished.

7. We strongly recommend that the entire structure of the O. P. A. be overhauled to the end that the basic principle of simplicity be regained and that definite lines of procedure and administration be established as a part of the law passed by Congress under which the O. P. A. is to function.

8. As an important part of this law we respectfully suggest that the fundamental purposes to be served by price control and rationing be restated in terms of the greatest possible simplicity; that the status of local war price and rationing boards and their responsibilities and duties be clearly defined by law; that these rules and regulations under which they are to function be made clear; that the rules and regulations be codified; that the extent to which the Government official who is to administer them be severely restricted except with the consent of Congress. In other words, it is our recommendation that Congress fully accept its constitutional prerogative and duty by making of the O. P. A. an agency of well-defined law, instead of one of men as it is now constituted to so great a degree.

9. It is our conviction, based on experience, that neither price control nor equitable rationing will be achieved until all factors, from producer to consumer, are placed under the jurisdiction of some one agency of Government.

10. Should Congress see fit to follow these suggestions in placing the actual operation of the O. P. A. program in the hands of the local boards, it is our conviction that great saving of money could then be effected and greater efficiency be secured by reducing the personnel of district and regional offices to the point where they would be largely occupied in the work of enforcement which, as they are at present constituted, is being sadly neglected, with the result that black markets are flourishing at the expense of law-abiding citizens. Of the many cases of black-market operations and other cases of violation of the regulations that have been referred to the local district office by our boards, we know of practically none where enforcement has been accomplished.

Through failure of Congress to establish the O. P. A. on such lines as herein suggested, thousands of American citizens have been subjected to the humiliation of having their rights abridged or completely denied through vicious un-American kangeroo courts procedures and other forms of bureaucratic rule by men, and the O. P. A. has assumed, in the average citizen's mind, the ugly aspect that brought open rebellion against the prohibition law.

It is our conviction that respect for, and cooperation with, this important agency can be reestablished if all taint of bureaucracy be removed, the dignity of citizenship be recognized, and effective means of removing black-market operations be established to the end that equity and justice may be served in the interest of all citizens alike.

False Implications of Reverse Lend-Lease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, considerable publicity has been given to lend-lease in reverse with the statement that it is a "two-way street." The public reaction has been that we are receiving from members of the United Nations as much as we are sending to them. The facts as shown by the committee report to accompany H. R. 4254 permit of no such implication.

The lend-lease aid rendered other nations from the date of approval of the act in March of 1941 is valued at slightly less than $20,000,000,000. It is of interest to note that two-thirds of this aid was rendered in 1943. The United Kingdom has received about six and one-half billions of dollars in lend-lease goods and services. Russia has received in excess of $4,000,000,000 of these same items. Africa, the Middle East, and the Mediterranean area have received $2,000,400,000. Lend-lease shipments to China and India totaled about $1,000,000,000; Australia and New Zealand got $803,000,000, and other American republics received one hundred and twenty-seven million. So there was an aggregate outgo of approximately $20,000,000,000 all up until December 31, 1943. Now that's a pretty broad street that leads away from home and represents a substantial gift by our taxpayers in the cause for which we fight.

What about reverse lend-lease? Again as shown by the committee report, up until December 31, 1943, it totaled $2,094,872,000. And this was received from the British Commonwealth. No other member of the United Nations family has contributed anything in reverse lend-lease to this country. So this alleged two-way street is a boulevard going out, but a city alley coming back and this is the fact that should be given publicity. The people have a right to know all the facts in connection with this program. It is $20,000,000,000 against two billions and the difference is a considerable sum in any language.

Again referring to the committee report, I was surprised to find that the hearings were conducted on an ex parte basis—that is, only one side of the subject was presented to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and that committee based its conclusions solely on the testimony of individuals favorable to the program. Why were others not called, who have knowledge of the operations under lend-lease, and who have serious doubts about its continuance as presently organized? Less than a year ago a bipartisan committee of the Senate toured the world and returned with amazing stories about the program as it was being administered. In a unanimous report Republican and Democrat alike was critical of what he had observed. None of these men were asked to appear and testify and when the chairman of the committee was asked why this was so, in response to a question by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ELMER]—Report, page 3574, April 17, 1944—he said:

> We did not think it necessary. We have received the true facts from official Government sources.

Now there you have the strictly partisan approach that has been made by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It did not want to hear the other side of this story. The Senate will soon have this matter for consideration and it is to be hoped that the gentlemen who have knowledge of import will speak out and tell the people of this country just how the lend-lease program may be administered efficiently and with due regard for our national interest. There is still too much secrecy in connection with this program.

Rent Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARY T. NORTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following talk by Ben Schlossberg, immediate past president, New Jersey Association of Real Estate Boards, before members of Jersey City Real Estate Board at Jersey City, N. J., Tuesday, April 11, 1944:

As your State president last year, I spoke in every part of the State on many issues which concerned our business, including O. P. A. as a war emergency.

I was always in favor of rent control, but against some of its directives. There were some officials that administered the law arbitrarily, which caused much confusion. However, since Ivan Carson was made Administrator of Rents in Washington, and the dismissal of a few arbitrary subordinates who caused the confusion, there has been a noticeable change for the better.

In recent months, under the able leadership of Chester Bowles, the O. P. A. Administrator, a definite change for the better has taken place.

The O. P. A. has been called everything in the book—but its most violent critics will admit it is necessary and must be maintained. We must not permit the realtors to be the tool of any individual or institution that wishes to increase rents arbitrarily. If there should be a distressed owner, the O. P. A. will give that owner proper consideration.

As realtors, we must fight the battle of inflation. If rent control were done away with, rents would skyrocket overnight, and cause an increase of rent payments to the extent of 100 percent.

Of course, there would be a boom in the selling of properties, but when conditions became normal rents would drop, and property would be valueless.

Recently the Chain Store Age, speaking for food distributors, stated: "Grocers don't like price control or rationing any more than our boys at the front like fighting for their lives. But they know these things are necessary if we are to lick inflation on the home front, as well as our enemies on the fighting front."

Price control to hold down inflation is essential in all fields, and despite its many shortcomings and rules that are difficult to understand at times, the O. P. A. has done a good job. There are billions of dollars in the hands of the American people today, and those hands are itching to spend it. Relax controls and prices would skyrocket, touching off inflation, and creating a condition that would make the 1930 depression seem like a picnic.

The basic purpose of price controls in time of war and in the adjustment period following the war is sound and necessary. When conditions become normal, O. P. A. can be discarded. In the meanwhile, let us continue to fight our enemy at home—inflation, and the causes of inflation.

O. P. A. Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. HESS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WAR PRICE AND RATIONING
BOARD 34-31-9,
Cincinnati, Ohio, March 24, 1944.

CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator, O. P. A.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOWLES: Upon receipt of your letter of March 16, I called a special meeting of our Board, which was held on the evening of March 20, for the discussion of the invitation contained in your letter to me as chairman, as I felt that since all members of our board have shown such devoted interest in the progress and welfare of the O. P. A., my reply to your letter should represent the consensus of the good judgment of these members.

At that meeting we thoroughly discussed your letter and the matters we feel should be brought to your attention. We delegated to our information officer, Mr. Otto Garr Tague, the work and responsibility of preparing our reply with the understanding that a draft of his effort would be submitted for approval at our meeting of this date, which approval has now been unanimously given.

Let me say at the beginning that each and every member of our board is in full and complete accord with what we understand to be the fundamental purposes of the O. P. A. program. As you indicate in your letter, we who are on the firing line and in direct contact with the public should have some very constructive suggestions for betterment.

We believe we have these. We believe that we are all of sufficient executive experience to enable us to avoid expressing to you either petty, carping criticisms, or destructive comment that might have its basis in personal resentments. Some of our members antedate, in point of service, the establishment of the O. P. A.

We are in full agreement with you in your conclusion to the effect that the O. P. A. has saved the people of the Nation untold sums of money and has put a very important check on inflation. We believe that sufficient money should be appropriated by Congress to enable O. P. A. to continue to function on the basis of carrying out those fundamental purposes for which it was established.

The suggestions for betterment which we offer for your consideration fall, loosely, under two main headings, viz: (1) Theoretical, or matters with which we have had no personal or direct experience, and (2) Practical, or those with which we have had personal and direct experience—suggestions which we believe would, if put into practice, result in better understanding and cooperation on the part of our fellow citizens and save large sums of the taxpayer's money while getting far greater results.

Under the former heading we shall offer herein suggestions which we most frankly state may be entirely beyond the powers of the O. P. A. to adopt, as follows:

1. Price control: It is our conviction, based on our observation and contacts with retailers and other marketing factors, that control of prices can never be made effective until that control is aimed more directly at those factors higher up in the scale than the retailer—certainly as high as the wholesaler from whom the retailer must get his supplies, to whom he must pay the straight-out gouges or artificially created prices, demanded of him.

We have overwhelming evidence that retailers are the unwilling victims of what amounts to blackmail sales of worthless or unsalable merchandise on which they have to pay extravagant prices in order to get standard merchandise for which there is a demand and that the prices thus seemingly paid under established ceilings have their above-ceiling character hidden in the fancy prices they are forced to pay for unwanted goods which, when it becomes evident that they cannot be sold, frequently force the retailer to break the ceiling on price-controlled merchandise.

This is especially true in the fresh-vegetable field. We have seen receipted bills which in many cases clearly showed such facts as just related, presented for our examination only after our pledge had been given that the persons involved would not have their names used. We have striven many times to break down this refusal to stand behind the facts, but have always been defeated in our efforts by the fear that the retailers in question would be blacklisted by all wholesalers if it became known that they had made known the facts.

We are under the impression that this condition may be the result of divided authority—that some other agency of the Government controls the prices and other factors up the line toward production to which level O. P. A. cannot reach.

If this assumption is correct, we submit that the remedy for this and similar conditions lies in removing this divided authority and the price control that should extend to all factors of price-making be given to the O. P. A., from origin of the item to the consumer.

We also suggest, that if our price panels and local boards are to be required to supervise and enforce price ceilings at the retail level, they should also have the authority to enforce them at least as high as the wholesale level.

2. Gasoline-rationing control: The figures that represent the amount of gasoline that is escaping rationing strike, with a sense of futility, upon the minds of all conscientious members of local boards. It is very difficult to become acquainted with these figures and then be forced to deny, under the regulations, a few gallons of gasoline to a returning soldier or some other law-abiding citizen.

We are, therefore, in full sympathy with all efforts to eliminate black-market operations. Obviously, there is little that we can suggest in the way of preventing these operations where they depend on counterfeit or stolen ration tokens, other than that steps be taken to create tokens of such a character that any small printing shop could not duplicate.

With reference to that part of the black market that functions without the use of gasoline ration tokens, we believe that we have a suggestion that is worthy of consideration and adoption. And again as we suggested with reference to price control, it is our recommendation that gasoline rationing start at the source.

Our inquiries have developed the apparent fact that no rationing control is enforced upon the refineries where gasoline is produced. If this be the fact, then it is very obvious that the source of supply to wholesale and retail distributors of gasoline who require no tokens from a car operator in order for him to obtain gasoline would be dried up if all factors below the refiner were required to present tokens to the latter for all supplies that are released to the civilian market.

We are under the impression that here again enters the factor of divided authority which gives the O. P. A. the responsibility of rationing gasoline upon a basis of equity of distribution, while placing in the hands of some other government agency the supervision of gasoline at its source, the refinery.

If this be the case, we recommend that O. P. A. be given the authority to control the rationing of gasoline from the source to the consumer. And we include in this recommendation the rationing of fuel oil which we understand to be weakened by the same conditions that apply with reference to gasoline, and we suggest that the same principle be applied to all other rationing. For without control of distribution factors including the source, neither rationing control nor price control will ever be made effective.

SUGGESTIONS FOR IMPROVEMENT IN FUNCTIONING OF O. P. A.

Here we feel that we are on solid ground of experience, both as to our work as practical and important factors of the program, and in the light of our combined many years of experience as executives in other lines of endeavor.

We make the bold and challenging claim that, as at present constituted to function, the entire O. P A. organization is completely upside down.

As a matter of logic and reasoning we offer, in support of this, the fact that there are, in the Cincinnati district, something less than 40 local boards composed of an average of about 10 businessmen each, or 400 volunteer citizens who have been chosen for their work after careful investigation as to their qualifications, and there are some 220 paid personnel in the district office whose chief purpose, real or assumed, is to supervise the work of these 400 businessmen.

That represents approximately one supervisor for each two board members. The latest figures available to us indicate that this average seems to be closely representative of the conditions that obtain with reference to the national set-up—some 57,000 board members and some 30,000 supervisors.

From these figures the mind of any businessman will immediately draw one of two inevitable conclusions:

1. That the businessmen who comprise the 5,700 boards are exceedingly incompetent, or

2. That the paid personnel of the district, regional, and national offices consists of a far greater number of individuals than is necessary.

We strongly recommend that you give most careful consideration to these two statements in the light of your own business experience and that you take steps that will, to whatever extent is possible, remove from the O. P. A. organization the element of improper and inefficient functioning that immediately becomes apparent when these conclusions register on your consciousness.

Solely in the spirit of cooperation and helpfulness, we offer the following observation from our own experience:

It was the originally announced purpose of the O. P. A. to make the local boards practically autonomous. They were to be constituted of men and women who lived in the area of their activities—the neighbors of those citizens whose precious rights as American citizens they would have the responsibility to curtail.

Cooperation of the friendly American nature was to be the keynote of our activities. Sympathetic understanding of the problems offered was to become the very foundation upon which this voluntary relinquishment of those rights was to be built.

The rationing and price control of the necessities of life were to be accomplished on the basis of equity of distribution that would remove all resentments that would inevitably result, unless that equity were clearly established.

Citizens would be dealing with their neighbors who would see that, on the basis of equitable distribution, each of them would receive his full share—without argument, political influence, personal favoritism, or any other factor but that of equity.

Washington would determine the amount of supplies on hand for distribution among the civilian population and the prices that could equitably be charged for them, hand these determinations down to the boards who would then see that the citizens in their respective areas were given access to their rightful shares.

And regardless of all other considerations, Mr. Bowles, that is the very simple premise upon which the rationing and price controls of the O. P. A. were set up. At least that is the premise upon which it was offered to the American people for their voluntary acceptance from which was to spring their voluntary cooperation.

We will not go into the painful review of what the people got. You and we know very well that they got a monstrous thing that in no way resembled what they had been led to expect, or what Congress approved of.

In many ways you have been responsible for changes that have resulted in bringing the O. P. A. back to some resemblance of its original purpose. For some of these changes we take credit for having offered suggestions that you have incorporated in your reforms. Your files will bear witness to this statement.

It is our conviction, based on the reception our suggestions have been received and acted upon by you, that had you been in your present position throughout the building of the O. P. A., much of the un-American character of this very important agency of Government would have been avoided.

But we also submit, with all due respect for your good intentions, that there is still much to be done before the O. P. A. will be functioning efficiently and economically, in such a way that the respect and cooperation of our fellow citizens may be reestablished. And it is our hope that you will accept for careful consideration the observations we now make in the spirit of helpfulness and constructive effort in which we offer them.

We earnestly believe that autonomy of the local boards is the very key to the establishment of all that is desirable to obtain equitable rationing and effective price control. That these boards are not autonomous is clearly evident to all members of this board and to those of other boards to whom we have talked.

Instead of this, there has been a recently constant tendency to concentrate rationing in the district office. Truck tires which formerly were rationed for the county by our board to the eminent satisfaction of the truck owners of the county are not being rationed at the district office on the silly pretext that parking space in the neighborhood of our office was so greatly restricted that rationing should be taken to the Union Trust Building downtown, where there is no parking, with the result that we understand that the truck owners of the county recently sent to you their written protest.

Institutional rationing of food has also been withdrawn from the boards and taken to the district office for no more sound reason that members of boards have been able to discover than that possibly the politically appointed bureaucrats—the "little men rattling around in titles too big for them," as the regional office expressed it in a recent bulletin, are more capable of handling this program than the disinterested businessmen of character and repute who comprise the boards.

And now it has been announced that all issues of gasoline rationing that involve war plants will be taken over by the district office.

This constant encroachment on the prerogatives of the boards is producing a serious feeling of resentment on the part of members of the boards which you, Mr. Bowles, may not yet have detected, but which has assumed such proportions that it could easily result in wholesale resignations that would leave the O. P. A. wholly in the hands of the bureaucrats and materially increase the resentment of the public.

Is it your purpose so to bring the entire O. P. A. program into the field of politics and bureaucratic influence?

Are you willing to go before Congress and frankly state that this is your plan?

The resentment of the law-abiding public over the failure of O. P. A. to put a stop to black-market operations while punishing the innocent law-abiding citizens by cutting his A gasoline rations from 3 to 2 gallons of gasoline per week would, we believe, be increased by this move to such an extent that rationing and price control would become a farce.

Excessive and dictatorial supervision, spiteful nagging, unjustified interference on the part of those two-hundred-and-twenty-odd "supervisors" in the district office still prevail. The only possible inference we can draw from this activity of "little men rattling around in titles too big for them" is that they have to justify drawing the pay for the jobs they hold down and that they have not enough real and necessary work to keep them busy or that they have accepted the theory that board members are of such moronic level of intelligence that they have to be watched over like an old hen looks after chicks.

We could produce conclusive evidence in the nature of hundreds of cases of this tendency, were anyone in authority interested in listening to it. And we are sure that other boards could do likewise. It results in tragic waste of our time and that of the chief clerks and other paid personnel of the boards, in provoking delays in providing attention to the needs of our citizens and resentment in their consciousness and the loss of their willing cooperation, all of which could be avoided, along with waste of the people's money, by reverting to the simple basis of board autonomy, upon which O. P. A. was originally offered to our people.

It has been our observation that 95 percent of our citizens are within the compliance group, while not more than 5 percent constitute the noncompliance group.

If you will reorganize the O. P. A. on the basis of board autonomy we have suggested, and turn the district office into the agency of cooperation with the boards that we have been misled, on many occasions, into believing they were to become, you will be able to reduce the appropriation you ask Congress to grant and, at the same time, secure far greater efficiency of operation than has ever been achieved to date.

This premise is based, of course, on the assumption that members of local boards are of such executive capacity and experience as to enable them to do the really simple job that is assigned them. If they are not, then we suggest that as your first move you improve the personnel of the boards.

It has been our observation that each local board is only about as efficient as the chief clerk whose functions are to represent the board in direct contact with the large majority of the public. If the chief clerk is merely a nincompoop who has been given this important job on the basis of political or personal influence, then service of the board in meeting the public need is slow, inefficient, and tragically lacking in all the elements that create good will, understanding, and cooperation.

We suggest, therefore, that you give special attention to the improvement of the character of these chief clerks who, if lacking in executive attainments and experience, should be replaced by persons who have what it takes to deal with the public as the media through which the boards must function in contacts with the public.

Since rationing and price control are, in their essentials, quite simple, it is but logical for us to suggest that the regulations governing them be simplified, and that, when this simplification has been accomplished, the regulations that govern be permitted to stand at least long enough for those of us who are charged with the final responsibility of executing them can become familiar with them.

The thousands of pages of fine type that provide the regulations under which we are to function have assumed such proportions of complexities that they defy the human mind to embrace them. The changes that reach us almost daily—usually for immediate adoption—tend to add confusion to minds already confused. (On Monday of this week, we received 207 pages of changes in the regulations, all couched in technical terms and printed in very small type.)

Much waste of the people's money could be eliminated and far greater efficiency of application secured if a little thought and effort were given to the reconstruction of the regulations on a simple basis and to their standardization for a sufficient period to enable their uniform application. Waste of paper could also be materially reduced through following this suggestion.

That naturally leads us to the subject of printed matter in the form of multicolored posters, pamphlets, copies of radio speeches to which nobody listens, and all the many hundreds of items of advertising matter which we receive, all of which is apparently based on the mistaken assumption that the American people have to be sold on something which they have to accept anyway, or the equally mistaken assumption that 95 percent of them are disloyal crooks, while only 5 percent of them are willing to comply.

You don't have to sell the American people on rationing and price control, Mr. Bowles. All you have to do is to give them a chance to get what is equitably coming to them with as little as possible of bureaucratic interference with their time and effort and in such a way as will be conducive to their willingness to cooperate with the programs that it becomes necessary to adopt in their behalf.

They know that we are saving them money; they realize that we have done much important work to stop the ravages of inflation. They will go along with us, almost to a man or woman, if you will provide the easiest possible way for their cooperation to become manifested and with the least possible artificially imposed restraints to their freedom of action.

To this end we urgently recommend that the local boards be given the authority to carry out the rationing and price-control programs in the spirit of neighborliness originally conceived and announced to the public; that the suspicion that the vast majority of our citizens are constantly seeking methods to break down our programs, be abandoned; that the district office personnel, instead of devoting so much of its time to dictating to the boards and petty nagging and interference with their efforts, be reorganized on a basis of economy and efficiency and that its time and effort be devoted almost exclusively to doing what the boards obviously cannot do, viz: the enforcement on, and punishment of that small minority of citizens who flagrantly violate the letter and spirit of such simplified regulations as may, from time to time, be found to serve as guides to the equitable rationing and price-control efforts of the O. P. A.; that chief clerks be required to function as executive contacts between the board members and the public with full authorized powers to act, without interference on the part of district office personnel, in all cases where normal, current, and obvious rations are involved, to the end that the public may be served quickly and efficiently and that much of the resentment of the public may thus be removed.

Do these things that we have outlined in rather broad detail, Mr. Bowles, and we are supremely confident that better results will be had with the expenditure of a greatly reduced sum of the taxpayers' money.

In view of the interested effort we have herein made to answer your letter as we believe you wanted it answered, we ask that you show us the courtesy to reply with an indication of your reactions after you have fully considered it.

Sincerely,

O. W. Crane, chairman; Sam Agnew; George M. Bailey; Charles F. Christensen; Morten Carlisle; Robert Maddox, Member of Congress; Clifford McCoy; George Stalf; Clifford Wolf; Otto Garr Tague, board members.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, a most extraordinary incident occurred in the year 133 B. C. It does not seem so extraordinary now that the people of the United States are becoming accustomed to the unusual in government. The legislation by which we transfer money, material goods, battleships, and what not in terms of billions to foreign nations has thus far contained no restraint upon those vested with executive authority from disposing of the United States to some other nation by last will and testament, which may in the light of well-established precedents for such a type of disposition be worthy of some consideration. It is recorded by an eminent English historian that when Attalus, King of the rich country of Pergamum in Asia Minor, died, 133 B. C., he devised and bequeathed his kingdom to the Roman people. The motive for this strange bequest was not disclosed, except as some historians have drawn the inference that Pergamum had at one time been an ally of Rome, and that there then existed an organization promoting the idea of Union Now. Even in the far-off evil days of nationalism the unpardonable sin of loving one's own country—Josephus bears witness to the strong desire for annexation among the rich men of Syria, although this desire ran counter to the wishes of both king and people. In these modern days when both the king and a few rich seek Union Now it may not be treason to inquire whether along with silent and secret commitments, there is a last will and testament drawn in true and ancient form devising and bequeathing the United States with all its treasure and its people to some foreign nation. I would not call attention to this strange bequest of King Attalus were it not for the disturbing fact that his action was followed by several other ancient kings. One of these bequests by will was made in 81 B. C. by Alexander II, King of Egypt.

Lend-Lease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. O. BURGIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial from the Columbus (Ohio) Enquirer:

LEND-LEASE PROGRAM SHOULD BE CONTINUED

There is little doubt that the lend-lease program will be continued for at least another year.

Under existing law, it would expire June 30 and Acting Secretary of State Stettinius last week appeared before the House Foreign Affairs Committee to ask for its continuance.

"Obviously this must and will be done," comments the New York Times. "Lend-lease is the kingpin of our whole war effort. Without it the offensives of the United Nations in every part of the world would go to pieces. Mr. Stettinius did not overstate the case when he told the committee that an extension of this act is indispensable to victory. 'The war,' he said, 'is not over—not even almost over. Lend-lease is a powerful weapon which we must maintain and strengthen. The great battles of western Europe, and of Asia have still to be fought.'

"Lend-lease in another week will be 3 years old. Its adoption was one of the great landmarks in the life of the American people. Still at peace, we wrote this law upon our statute books because we were even then aware—long before the Japanese attacked us at Pearl Harbor—that our fate as a nation was linked indissolubly with the fate of other democracies which had taken up arms in self-defense; that there was no safety for us in isolation; that only through some method of collective security—and lend-lease is collective security—could the peace-loving nations survive in a world in which aggression had run wild.

"It was many months before the stream of goods exported under lend-lease to the nations which were even then our allies, in everything but name, amounted to more than a trickle. But from the day of its enactment lend-lease began to play a part on the great stage of world affairs. It brought fresh courage to the nations fighting for their freedom. It laid the groundwork for what became the grand alliance of the United Nations. It is now the chief inter-Allied instrument of victory.

Of much interest was a statement made public yesterday by Administrator Leo Crowley, of the Foreign Economic Administration, that almost 28,000 American-built planes, valued at $2,300,000,000, have been sent to the air forces of the other allied nations since the passage of the Lend-Lease Act.

Lend-lease is certain to be continued in effect, we believe. This program is vital to the winning of the war.

The Hungry Horse Is Our Only Protection

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the proposed authorization of the Hungry Horse Dam, H. R. 3570, will come before the House soon. It is our only protection in saving Flathead Lake from being tampered with again. This bill, which is so vital to Montana, is one of the most important pieces of legislation which we have ever brought before the Congress for its consideration.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I am inserting in the RECORD another editorial concerning the Hungry Horse. It is from the pen of Harry Kelly, father of the project and publisher of the Flathead Monitor. The editorial is dated June 10, 1943, and was written during the period of grave emergency in the Flathead last summer.

HUNGRY HORSE OUR ONLY PROTECTION

There is little consolation in calling attention to the fact that if the people and business interests of Kalispell had got behind the Hungry Horse Dam project during the past years when the fight was being carried forward by a few, we would not now be faced with the destructive problem of defending Flathead Lake and our farms and homes. It is nevertheless true.

Hungry Horse becomes a more important factor than ever in warding off the disaster of raising the lake levels for storage purposes. At the hearing last week it became evident that at some time in the future it will be necessary to have the great volume of water originating in western Montana regulated so that beneficial use can be made of it downstream, especially at Grand Coulee. In order to secure the beneficial use of this water the excess run-off must be stored in the upper reaches of the Flathead. If this is not done at the earliest date possible, there will be added efforts made to use Flathead Lake as a reservoir. In fact, we will not be safe or protected against such attempts until we find a way to store this water by developing the dam sites above Flathead Lake.

Our first protective measure lies in the construction of the Hungry Horse Dam, although we may later find it necessary to use the fine dam site of the North Fork to hold back sufficient water that can be let down on a related second-feet basis to the water stored in order to give the downstream power plants operating the regulated water they need. The average annual flow from the gathering area above Flathead Lake is 8,000,000 acre-feet. Practically all of that water originates in the upper regions of the Flathead. The South Fork project, known as the Hungry Horse, is already engineered and has successfully made all of the technical and political hurdles from and including the Army engineers to Congress, and is now ready for an appropriation for construction.

The estimated cost of building the Hungry Horse Dam, including a $5,000,000 generating plant, according to the Army engineers' report on the project, is $31,000,000. This, under any circumstances, is not an excessive cost even for the salable power it would generate from the power plant at the dam. But that is practically nothing, at least insignificant, when the benefits to down-stream power plants is considered. This item is impressive and might well have been included in the testimony at last week's hearing. Through regulating the waters held by Hungry Horse Dam alone, Grand Coulee and Bonneville would benefit to the extent of 890,000 kilowatt-hours and all other downstream power developments constructed and planned to be constructed by the Government, together with Grand Coulee and Bonneville, would benefit to the extent of practically 2,000,000 kilowatt-hours, or practically 215,000 kilowatt prime power. This is exclusive of the benefits that would accrue at the Kerr and Thompson Falls Dams. Reducing these benefits to dollars and cents they would be in excess of $2,818,750 on the same charge made at Grand Coulee for power. This increase alone would pay 6 percent interest on an investment of over $45,000,000 per annum, or $14,000,000 more than the total cost of Hungry Horse Dam. At the same time there would be no damages or loss of property, as the water would be held back in the rough, noncultivatable area of the Flathead Forest, where no crops could be raised and there is no individual ownership. The Hungry Horse Dam would hold back 1,500,000 acre-feet of water, which would be sufficient until a dam could be built on the North Fork, and another on the Middle Fork, if needed. Hungry Horse is all ready to start work on. If this could be used as a first alternative, it would forever eliminate the raising of Flathead Lake, as there are other dam sites in the upper Flathead that could and would be built, if the start was made at Hungry Horse to hold the flood waters at or as near the source as possible. The feeling here is, and justly so, that if the Bonneville Administration were permitted to raise Flathead Lake a single inch, their rights would be established and the lake would eventually be raised 27 feet or more if they ever needed the water to increase Grand Coulee power for industrial purposes in Washington or Oregon. We feel the same way about the building of Hungry Horse Dam. Once a start is made on storing the flood waters in the upper Flathead, that will become the permanent plan for water storage in this part of Montana. We firmly believe it is the only sure way of protecting Flathead Lake.

James A. O'Leary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. CAPOZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, nothing which I might say about our late colleague James A. O'Leary could be nearly as eloquent as the poem written by our good friend Horace C. Carlisle.

The manly traits, which I knew our late colleague possessed, are well enumerated in this poem.

He shall be missed on the floor of this House but not in the hearts of his friends.

Pursuant to leave granted to me, I insert Mr. Carlisle's poem:

REPRESENTATIVE O'LEARY

James A. O'Leary of New York has gone—
His fruitful labors among us are done—
Now he is resting in comfort and ease
Under the shade of eternity's trees,
That line the banks of the River of Life,
Where is no sickness, no sorrow, no strife.

James A. O'Leary was loved and revered
By all who knew him, but truly endeared
Was he to Members of Congress, for he Stood ever ready, at all times, to be Spent and to spend, whensoever he could Help in promoting Americanhood.

James A. O'Leary, on down to life's close,
Favored his friends, but respected his foes,
Whose rights were sacred to them as his own
Were to him—truly, he never was known
Wrongly to treat a political foe—
His motto was, "We 'll reap what we sow."

James A. O'Leary, when came the last call,
In meek submission, bade farewell to all
His friends and kinsmen, and went on ahead,
Over the River of Death, unafraid,
Where, far beyond the celestial blue,
He sees the dreams of his heart coming true.

—Horace C. Carlisle.

Uncle Sam's Girls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Horace C. Carlisle:

UNCLE SAM'S GIRLS

Our young men in uniform, seen everywhere,
Should be, and are, highly esteemed;
For them there's ascending full many a prayer
From hearts of which they've never dreamed;
Yet, never must we, as a nation, forget,
Wherever Old Glory unfurls
The Stripes and the Stars, that we owe a real debt
To Uncle Sam's war-working girls.

The Capital's filled with young women today,
At work in war offices here,
As beautiful as are the flowers of May,
Whose fragrance abounds everywhere—
The breezes of h-aven seem happy to glide
Thru their silken, velvety curls—
And all true Americans take special pride
In Uncle Sam's war-working girls.

The smiles on their faces seem lighted with joy,
But down in their souls' secret parts
There lurk unseen sorrows that sadly destroy
The joys of their war-worried hearts.
God only can know what a great sacrifice
Is made by these sweet human pearls—
O God! hear America's prayers, as they rise,
For Uncle Sam's war-working girls.

—Horace C. Carlisle.

The Future of Our Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me over Station WHN Monday, April 17, 1944:

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. I want to thank Station WHN for giving me the privilege of speaking to you tonight.

I want to discuss a most important subject, namely, the future of our American merchant marine. Much has been said during the past few months concerning the perpetuation of this great industry, and during the next few minutes, I want to give you some astounding, nevertheless positive, facts concerning this all-important subject.

This is a war of transportation, both on land and sea, and as a result we Americans have become the strongest and greatest maritime nation in the world, and at this particular point I wish to stress the fact that our American railroads have done a splendid job. The railroads' contribution to the war effort cannot be measured on a cold hard basis of dollars and cents.

Since 1938 we have so amplified and intensified both our immediate and long range shipbuilding program that when this war is over, we Americans will emerge from this conflict the undisputed queen of the seas. I, for one, tell you most emphatically it is my desire, my ambition to see that we keep this title and allow no one to relegate us to an inferior position on the high seas as we were relegated after the last war. This will necessitate eternal vigilance on our part, but you may rest assured we intend to do just that.

I am acutely conscious of the undisputed fact that our allies or at least some of our allies are now making elaborate preparations to take over just as soon as this war is terminated.

You know in 1938 we started to build up a merchant marine under the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, and it might be most interesting for me to inform you that money spent from 1938 and money which will be spent by 1945 will amount to approximately $19,000,000,000. This includes money spent for ships and facilities.

It is my intense belief that having spent that tremendous amount of money it is the absolute desire of the American people that our American merchant marine be perpetuated, and I do not labor under the impression for the slightest fraction of a second that any red-blooded, two-fisted, square-shooting American would want us to be anything but queen of the seas. We have the best officers and crews of any Nation in the world. Our officers and men are well trained and know their business. Not a day passes but what we receive a glowing account of their daring and skill. Surely that alone would be sufficient to strengthen the determination of the American people to keep our heroes and ships flying the American flag on the seven seas. We are capable. This war has added materially to our experience and our efficiency cannot be questioned.

It is not the desire of our country to hog the seas. It is not our purpose to push any country out of the maritime picture. We want to cooperate—yes, cooperate wherever we can for it is my belief that there is room for all.

I, for one, am terrifically impressed by a statement uttered in London by Admiral Vickery, Vice Chairman of the Maritime Commission. I quote: "We will take our place as a maritime power and we want to do it in a cooperative manner, but cooperation or no cooperation, we demand our place." That is a strong statement and it is a remark that meets with my unconditional approval. Now let me quote from a statement by Admiral Land, Chairman of the Maritime Commission. This statement also has unusual significance and I quote: "The United States has no desire to thwart the legitimate operations of other nations at sea."

My friends, you can readily conclude that the American people are determined and they will follow the rules of the game, if others want to abide by the rules.

Both Admiral Land and Admiral Vickery are outstanding figures in the world of shipbuilding, and let me grasp this opportunity to say publicly that they have done a miraculous job. Under Jerry Land we started from scratch to build our marine industry and the accomplishments have been phenomenal.

I also want to pay my respects to the workers in the shipyards throughout the country for their glorious contributions and I also want to congratulate the management on the job they have done in such an efficient manner.

The merchant marine is not only a very valuable adjunct to our national defense in time of war but we can reverse the statement—a strong and powerful merchant marine can be used as a terrifying instrument in peacetime as well. Any country with a well-equipped merchant marine demands the respect of every nation. When hostilities cease in continental Europe and in the Pacific, I hope that we will not forget, and in fact it behooves us to remember, that it will be our duty to see that the Nazis and Japs are allowed only a minimum maritime tonnage.

The Japs and Nazis at the outbreak of this war had between them approximately 17,000,000 tons of marine shipping. After Pearl Harbor and our declaration of war on these two countries they immediately converted their cargo ships into combat ships. This cannot—it will not happen again. We, as Americans, have not scratched the surface of our foreign-trade potential. We must also be in a position to resume normal trade relations with other nations immediately after this war.

Plans are now being formulated and regular discussions are held and ways and means are being devised whereby we can, without too much loss of time, take our place on the high seas immediately after the cessation of hostilities.

Our peacetime ship program will require in the neighborhood of about 20,000,000 deadweight tons. With this tonnage we will be in a position to carry on our commerce and carry it on we will in a most efficient and effective manner.

I am acutely conscious that our American men who are familiar and skilled in the shipping industry are most desirous of carrying on and I give them my word, as I give to you, the American people, my promise that I will labor indefatigably to see that our merchant marine takes its place in world affairs and holds the glorious position as queen of the seas which it so richly deserves.

I am aware of the fact that international conferences on the future of world shipping are being held in this country and I do hope, in fact I insist, that those responsible for these conferences exercise extreme wisdom in formulating our future program which will drastically affect American shipping. May I respectfully suggest that men long experienced in our shipping industry be given conspicuous assignments whereby we can capitalize on their knowledge and pioneering skill. This is the practical thing to do, and because it is practical it may not be done.

One of the most important issues which now confronts the American merchant marine, and which is being debated in Congress, is whether the steamship companies shall be denied an equal opportunity to participate in overseas air service.

It is reasonable to assume that shippers and passengers will prefer an integrated transportation system which can furnish them all types of service. Unless American shipping companies are given the right to engage in air traffic, our merchant marine will be at a great disadvantage in competing with foreign shipping lines which furnish air service as well as shipping facilities. Furthermore, American shipping companies have a great background of experience and trade contracts which can prove most valuable in promoting the interests of American air traffic. Their overseas staffs are familiar with customs and other regulations, and much of their existing organization and knowledge can be utilized to give efficient and economic air service.

The shipping companies have pioneered many overseas routes, and developed trade and commerce, and they should be permitted to continue this trade and commerce by including the use of our latest form of transportation—the airplane.

American shipping is completely engaged at the present time in the war effort. When peace comes, American ships will still be engaged in the transport of American troops for some time. In addition a very considerable time will be required for reconditioning and rehabilitation of American ships, and this is particularly true of our passenger ships.

It is generally recognized that foreign shipping companies will be in a position to resume passenger traffic at a much earlier date than can our American lines. If American shipping lines are permitted to supplement their surface operations with air-borne transport, this disadvantage will be minimized and trade and traffic operations can be at least partially maintained during the interim. Both common sense and equity require that the American merchant marine should not be excluded from participation in air transport. In conclusion, let me leave you this parting thought—the American merchant marine now and always must have its rightful place on the high seas.

St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit to the House a resolution adopted at the seventy-seventh annual session of the National Grange, at Grand Rapids, Mich., November 10-18, 1943, favoring the St. Lawrence seaway and power project bill:

Whereas the National Grange has for years advocated the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway, nearly 90 percent of which is already completed, and opening this wonderful artery of commerce to carry the products of the interior of our country to the markets of the world at reduced costs; and

Whereas the completion of this project would permit the development of vast electrical energy now going to waste in the onrushing waters of this mighty river, resulting in cheaper electric power to all our people; and

Whereas there is legislation now pending in Congress to bring this project to completion as soon as material and labor are available: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Grange reaffirms its position favoring completion of this project for navigation and power purposes.

American Revolution—1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. D. EMMERT BRUMBAUGH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith a timely discourse delivered by Mr. Miles F. Hollister, of Altoona, Pa., before a number of service clubs and civic organizations throughout the United States.

Mr. Hollister is a keen student of economic affairs and his philosophy of thought has received wide acclaim. Among Mr. Hollister's several future speaking engagements are included the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce and the Rotary Club of New York City.

The address, replete with timely observations, is as follows:

I presume it has been years since most of you read Dickens' Tale of Two Cities—but because it is pertinent to the subject of this discussion, I am going to take the liberty of paraphrasing the opening paragraph of that great book:

"It was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the season of light, it was the season of darkness, it was the spring of hope, it was the winter of despair. We had everything before us, we had nothing before us. We were all going direct to heaven, we were all going direct to hell. It was the year of our Lord 1775."

In this unique way, Dickens tells us that in 1775 the people of France were in a very uncertain state of mind. There existed an undertone of doubt which gradually rose to a crescendo and found its climax when the streets of Paris ran red with the blood of revolution. The old order passed to the rhythmic rise and fall of the guillotine at the Bastille of France.

But that was in 1775—what has that to do with us? Well, if we were to carefully analyze Dickens' prelude to the French Revolution we would find that conditions were almost alarmingly like those of the present. If we were to go back only to 1933 every word of the paragraph which I have just quoted could be applied. We could very truthfully have said:

"It is the best of times. It is the worst of times. It is the season of light, it is the season of darkness. It is the spring of hope, it is the winter of despair. We have everything before us." Perhaps. And perhaps we have nothing before us.
